Our Heavenly Father

OUR HEAVENLY FATHER

◇ ◇ ◇

A short meditation on our human relation with God through love
and
His ineffable devotion
to us.

◇ ◇ ◇

Arranged by
Rev. Raymond Sonnek, O.F.M.

Copyright, ©, 1960
CATHOLIC INFORMATION SOCIETY

Published by Catholic Information Society, 214 W. 31st St., N.Y. 1, N.Y.

Nihil Obstat:
JAMES F. RIGNEY, S.T.D., Censor Librorum

Imprimatur:
FRANCIS CARDINAL SPELLMAN
Archbishop of New York
SEPTEMBER 14, 1960

The nihil obstat and imprimatur are official declarations that a book or pamphlet is free of doctrinal or moral error. No implication is contained therein that those who have granted the nihil obstat and imprimatur agree with the contents, opinions or statements expressed.

Our Heavenly Father

by

Rev. Raymond Sonnek, O.F.M.

Of all created beings only man calls God his "Father". Faith taught him to do so after Jesus had revealed this wondrous Truth to the world. The beloved Son of God wished, that through Faith in Him, we, too, might become children of His heavenly Father by adoption in love. Why, we do not know nor understand, for though a little less than the angels, we have been placed by our heavenly Father at the distant edge of the Milky Way upon the third, rather small and insignificant planet from the sun, left spinning in circles, going through space we know not where, partly forgotten until the coming of Christ.

But consider this. He had ordered the heavens to produce myriads of stars together with other heavenly bodies shining in brilliance, but never calling Him "Father". He caused the earth and the sea to bring forth millions of animals, fish, birds and insects without number, none of which call Him "Father". But in creating man He took great pains to personally supervise the formation of the human body and to instill His own breath of life in order to make him a living creature; thus proving beyond doubt, that He was truly our heavenly Father.

It is sometimes hard for us to understand His divine love or even to detect a trace of mercy in Him, hence we must consider these facts in the light of Faith. For He is not a Monster, as our feeble mind might picture Him to be, but the most wonderful of all Beings, our heavenly Father, who cannot by Nature of being God express evil, since He is ALL GOODNESS and can only diffuse Goodness to all His creatures. We may not compare Him to our natural fathers, for He is God, the Father almighty, Creator of all things visible and invisible, and follows NOT the common pattern we have in mind. His love is not the love and devotion of a human father, but divine, eternal and infinite, which has no equal nor example among His created beings.

Jesus has made known to us the Name of the Father and shown how and why we should love Him with our whole heart, our whole mind and with all the strength of our soul. From Jesus therefore we must learn to BELIEVE in the divine goodness of our heavenly Father. What to our natural vision appears to be evil, will in the light of Faith shine brightly as supernatural goodness. If God were evil and if we had sufficient reason to accuse Him of evil, He would not be God, because evil is a defect, and our heavenly Father has no defects.

When without Faith we read the history of horrible punishments as it is unfolded in the Bible, or think of our own personal experiences in pain and suffering, it is difficult to see any real Goodness in our heavenly Father. But we should remember, that our appraisal of Him is entirely wrong and opposed to the appraisal of Jesus, who being His only-begotten Son, knows Him better than the combined minds of angels and men could ever hope to know. If we would only stop our mind from picking out imaginary flaws in our heavenly Father's love, Faith would soon suggest a way, where we could discover for ourselves how ineffably GOOD and GRACIOUS He always is. There cannot be evil in God, since He converts all evil into good. And our heavenly Father is God almighty.

We must, every single moment of our life, rely upon Jesus to understand our heavenly Father. Otherwise we shall worship Him in mortal terror of what might happen, if we did not render unto Him the things that are His. Mind alone is not sufficient; Faith is required, for "without Faith it is impossible to please God. For he that cometh to God, MUST BELIEVE that He is, and is a rewarder to them that seek Him" (Heb. XI-6). Jesus wanted all men to love His divine Father, yet so few "respond to His desire," because they try to understand God without the help of His beloved Son. He said plainly: "No man cometh to the Father but by Me. If you had known Me, you would without doubt have known the Father also" (John 14-6). And elsewhere: "No one knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither doth any one know the Father, but the Son, and he to whom IT SHALL PLEASE THE SON to reveal Him" (Mat. XI-27).

In view of these statements we must refrain from accusing our heavenly Father of any evil or misconduct, and pray to His Son, Jesus, for enlightment and guidance in Faith. The Holy Spirit will then show us the Truth and we shall see the true picture of our heavenly Father so lovingly impressed upon our soul. All other images that our mind stirs up are incomplete or false. The Lord's Prayer makes it easy for us to visualize our heavenly Father as He really IS in the eyes of His beloved Son.

"Our Father, who art in heaven" — this filial invocation allays all fear and trepidation when we stand before the Lord, God almighty, Creator of all things visible and invisible, for with Jesus we address Him not as the Supreme Ruler of heaven and earth, but as our dear Father; and heaven is only His Home and therefore ours also. A child fears not to speak to its Father, but enjoys every moment of conversation with Him, knowing that the Father also enjoys listening to the chatter of His beloved children. No wonder Jesus wished all of us to be converted and become as little children (Luke 18-17).

"Hallowed be Thy Name" — here we express our fond hope of having God's Name honored by all men, cherished and loved above all other names, for it is the Name of our heavenly Father, which we share with Him in love. It is truly a Family Name of which we are proud, for it embraces all mankind, corroborating the joyous fact that we are the sons and daughters of the Most High. Like His Son we too, wish to spread the importance of His Name throughout the world.

"Thy kingdom come"—God's kingdom is supreme and the only one worth having, hence we pray, that it come down from heaven to be received with honor by all the children of our heavenly Father. We have a personal share in this heavenly Kingdom, because each and every one of us has received individual attention, being created individually and sanctified individually. In this respect we seem to surpass all other created beings, who have been brought forth in bulk, as it were, like stars in the heavens above. Is it any wonder then, that our heavenly Father wishes to share His Kingdom with us in a special manner of love, since we are His little children?

"Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven" — this, the most important link of harmony between our heavenly Father and all His children, must be preserved at all costs. For once broken, severe punishment is meted our immediately in order to bring back the wayward children to His divine will. All punishment comes from the hand of our heavenly Father not in anger or vengeance, but in love, because He cannot desire the death of the sinner, only that he convert and live (Ezech. 33-11). How else would He be our Father, if He planned destruction even for the most hardened of His children? We do not, of course, understand, why our heavenly Father's hand becomes so heavy that He threatens with hell and eternal punishment, since life so condemned cannot be restored to His love, but we must BELIEVE that even such punishment comes as an act of His divine goodness. We do not presume to understand our heavenly Father, because He is God, and our little minds are incapable of grasping the vastness of His divine plans. They may appear CRUEL from our standpoint and without any semblance of love, yet Faith insists that they are always good. Hence we should rely on Faith and believe what Jesus tells us about His Father, namely that He is all goodness. When He Himself was once called "Good Master", He immediately answered: "Why callest thou Me good? None is good but One, that is God" (Mark 10-17). This GOODNESS of our heavenly Father must always be uppermost in our mind, for otherwise we would merely fear Him instead of doing His will in love and devotion.

"Give us this day our daily bread" — after having presented our three best wishes, we ask our heavenly Father for necessary sustenance in the form of bread. Of course He knows that we have to eat in order to live, and He does provide food in abundance, but nevertheless we realize that, like any father, He too would like to be asked, so we ask and pray without fear. Especially do we ask for the Bread of Life, that we may live with Him forever in the wonderful mansions His beloved Son had prepared for us in heaven.

"And forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us" — by this humble confession of our weakness we acknowledge not only the Fatherhood of God, but also the Brotherhood of man. We hold before our mind the picture Jesus shown us of our neighbor, and we are ready to share on equal terms any forgiveness received from our heavenly Father. It is truly an expression of brotherly love and an acknowledgment of our heavenly Father's divine justice. We are aware that He is no respecter of persons, and thus we love Him and our neighbors, as if we were one Family, which indeed we are. It points out also our humility in not claiming any exception to His general Rule, by which He governs all mankind, and forgives our trespasses in proportion to our love for the neighbor, the stranger and even the enemy.

"And lead us not into temptation" — we ask our heavenly Father to spare us, if possible, the more difficult experiences of life on this small planet of ours, confessing our weakness and praying for His leadership to direct our steps through the swarm of temptations that threaten our state of grace. Our earthly pilgrimage is beset with temptations of one sort or another, as numerous as the stars in the Milky Way, and it is hard at times not to collide with some of them which obstruct our path. We therefore ask our heavenly Father to have pity and to take us by the hand that we may come out of all distress of darkness and danger into His wonderful Light and eternal Safety. It is a prayer of confidence and filial devotion.

"But deliver us from evil. Amen" — we are naturally terrified at the rapid spread of evil around us, and we beg our heavenly Father to deliver us from the ever threatening fangs of the devil, through whom sin has entered our little world. We cannot easily cope with the evil forces that have been released by our arch-enemy, for once outside of the state of grace, we are almost powerless to do anything in our behalf. "For our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against principalities and powers, against the rulers of the world of this darkness, against the spirits of wickedness in high place" (Col. 6-12). Therefore we plead with our heavenly Father to simply deliver us outright from evil and make us free again. To stress the importance of our need, we add "AMEN", that it may please Him to come to our aid before we perish.

* * *

Who then is the Person whom we lovingly call our Father? It would require many superlatives to describe Him, and still we would know very little, if it were not for Jesus who had revealed Him to us. From Jesus we must learn all about our heavenly Father and be not surprised that He is a Spirit of infinite majesty and grandeur, immense in His divine greatness, almighty in power and eternal in love. He is a God, mysterious and the Source of all mystery, yet He wishes to be known and loved by His children. Compared to Him, we are less than a grain of sand, for we are nothing. Yet through His divine grace we are just a little less than the angels and in some respects even surpass them in the glory, which shall be revealed someday in heaven.

This great Person, our God and Creator has loved us from eternity and desires that we call Him "Father". What an honor and ineffable privilege to be able to stand upon the third, rather insignificant planet from the sun, and shout proudly for all creation to hear, that we are the children of God and He is truly our heavenly Father! On bended knees with tears in our eyes we should be grateful for His love and rise to the very heights of glory by basking in His divine embrace.

Our heavenly Father is all that Jesus said of Him and infinitely more, for only in the light of future glory shall we know Him as He IS, when our hearts will expand like golden chalices of love and devotion. He is a mysterious Spirit, the most incomprehensible Being in existence. No wonder we so often fail to understand His seemingly strange ways. But He knows our weakness and does not therefore require understanding, only Faith and a great deal of love. What we already know about Him from His Son is sufficient to enable us to love Him with our whole heart, mind and soul, more than any one or anything in the world, including ourselves.

Our heavenly Father wishes to be loved, though He needs no one for His happiness, but wants others to be happy. We should then strive to coordinate our little wishes with His divine desire. Frequently we seem to have great difficulty in finding a reason for loving our heavenly Father, because in our estimation He has left us behind to our own resources, as if He did not care what happened to our little planet on the border of the bright Milky Way. But as usual, we are mistaken, for He is closer to us than we are to ourselves, because "in Him we live and move and be" (Acts 17-28). He cares so much for us individually, that He did not hesitate to send His only-begotten Son to bring us back Home. While here Jesus had established a firm Haven upon the Rock of Peter, where all men could find refuge in His catholic Church and have the necessary means of believing, that He was sent to us by the heavenly Father (John 17-21).

We show our love for our heavenly Father when we do His will and comply with every wish expressed by His Son, for action speaks louder than words. Many of us claim to love our heavenly Father, but defy His will, by establishing our own churches instead of affiliating ourselves with the divine Church of Jesus. Pagans, Jews, Protestants, Moslems and who knows what other personal Beliefs, all go their own way, not knowing what they do. They boast of a great love for our heavenly Father, but without Faith they cannot please God. His will must be honored before there can be any real love.

In this respect our heavenly Father always had trouble with His disobedient children. Starting in Paradise the strife against His will has never subsided, and He should have lost patience long ago. Yet, not for a moment has He ever stopped calling men back to His divine will through the Prophets and His beloved Son, Jesus. When shall we learn to really love our heavenly Father and do His will, no matter how strange it may appear to us? He expects us to return to His love; otherwise He would have destroyed the little planet on which we enjoy defying His will. He simply bides His time, for He is eternal and can wait in the hope, that at least most of us, if not all, will learn to love Him as our heavenly Father.

In order to change our mind for the better, we must by all means get rid of the horrid idea, that our heavenly Father enjoys the suffering of His children. We look upon Him as a Tyrant who delights in seeing His only-begotten Son dying in great pain upon the Cross. What horrible thoughts have been spewed through ignorance and misunderstanding, which Faith could never entertain, not even for a moment.

Whenever we find ourselves in pain, and our heavenly Father will not even lift a finger, so to speak, to help us in our distress, let us lovingly gaze upon the Cross, where Jesus in His agony calls out not in accusation, but in love so great that it shames our selfishness, namely: "Father, (into Thy hands I commend My spirit" (Luke 23-46). If a human father condemned his son to be crucified, that would indeed be an act of cruelty, because such a father would have no ulterior motive than suffering and destruction. Whereas our heavenly Father is the Source of life and His ulterior motive in permitting suffering is resurrection and life. Therefore it is not cruel on His part to demand pain and suffering, for He sends such experiences out of love.

All other preconceived ideas against our heavenly Father must be discarded, before we learn to love Him as we should. Jesus is our Guide and living example, which we should follow. That also is the wish of our heavenly Father expressed at the Baptism of His Son and His Transfiguration on Mount Thabor, when He spoke from a cloud: "This is My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye Him" (Mat. 17-5). We must hear Jesus in order to obey our heavenly Father, because Faith insists on taking the words of Jesus as those of God. He asks us for such filial Faith, saying: "You believe in God; believe also in Me. I am the Way, and the Truth, and the Life. No man cometh to the Father, but by Me" (John 13-1; 13-6). Without Jesus we can do nothing.

We must at all times stay close to Jesus, because it is so important for our salvation that we know and love our heavenly Father. The Holy Spirit, whom Jesus had sent from the Father, is forever present in the catholic Church eager to share His lofty inspirations with those who wish to rise to the very heights of love and join the angelic choirs in singing: "Gloria in excelsis Deo —Glory be to God on high, and on earth Peace to men of good will". Then we, who are the children of our heavenly Father, may go a step further in our love, and proudly sing: "We praise Thee. We bless Thee. We adore Thee. We glorify Thee. We give Thee THANKS FOR THY GREAT GLORY, O Lord God, heavenly King, God, Father almighty!"

Such thankful love for our heavenly Father is truly an all-embracing love coming from the whole heart, the whole mind and soul. We cannot rise any higher, for we ask nothing for ourselves, but are exceedingly glad that our heavenly Father is so great, and we thank Him for His divine Greatness. He comes first in our love, and all the various wants can wait. If we could only sustain such admirable love in our daily life, how greatly would we please our heavenly Father. But alas, our wants are so pressing at times, that we forget about our love, and keep groping in the darkness of our misery unable to rise into the sunshine of our heavenly Father's smile radiating goodness and love. Therefore Jesus calls upon us to set aside our petty desires, by joining the Faith of the catholic Church and learn the Truth, namely that "the Father Himself seeketh such, that would adore Him in spirit and in Truth" (John 4-23). Too bad, that so many religions of the world follow their own inclination rather than OBEY the will of our heavenly Father, who desires all men to belong to the catholic Church of His Son. It is sad to see so much worship gone wrong, because of the lack of true love.

Our heavenly Father has sent His beloved Son to teach all men One Way of love that would supplant all other ways, for it is His own divine Way. There can be no other way no matter how pleasing it may appear to us; hence we should leave our personal paths and return to God's Way of love. Only then shall we "taste and see how sweet is the Lord" (Ps. 33-9). And no complaint or accusation against our heavenly Father shall ever dare to suggest itself to our mind. Therefore, whenever we discover a complaint lurking in our heart against our precious heavenly Father, let us be reminded by the Psalmist to render full justification to God when men rise to judge Him as if He were a criminal (Ps. 50-5). He must win His case always, because no creature can accuse Him of any misdoing or injustice. We should also remember the great love of Job for the heavenly Father, when he boldly stated his devotion, saying: "Even though He slay me, I shall confide in Him" (13-15).

Our heavenly Father never deserves the ill-treatment which we so often show Him in our accusations and unending complaints, as if we knew better than He, how to rule the world which He had made to His liking! It is sad to look upon such lack of love in children, who outwardly proclaim their devotion to our heavenly Father, but inwardly refuse to obey His divine will.

In order to really love our heavenly Father, we must constantly bear in mind the filial devotion of Jesus, who prayed thus: "Father, the hour is come, glorify Thy Son, that Thy Son may glorify Thee" (John 17-10). This is truly a prayer of love, for it centers not in any earthly petition, but solely in the love of our heavenly Father. We ask for glorification as a means to glorify Him for His own sake without any selfish motive. It is a cry of love that only a child of God could understand as being most pleasing and acceptable to our heavenly Father. In view of such love, how insignificant are our usual prayers, in which the dominant idea is never our heavenly Father, but always our own selfish ends!

Our heavenly Father longs for human love more than He cares for the adoration of all the other visible beings in the universe. For this purpose, it seems, He gathered the best of the angelic world with the best of the animal kingdom, fused these two together, and made man, admiring His own work and proclaiming that it was "very good" (Genesis). Furthermore, He had lovingly impressed His own Image upon the soul, that all visible creation might know, that man was the masterpiece of His hands. He liked this new creature so much, that He had His only-begotten Son assume human nature in order to encourage all men to follow Him in love.

Since then no human being has any excuse for not loving our heavenly Father, but all men can and should proudly look up to the vast outer space in the brilliance of the Milky Way and from the footstool of heaven, which our small rather insignificant planet supplies, cry out that all creation may hear: "Through Him (meaning Jesus) and with Him, and in Him, IS TO THEE, GOD THE FATHER almighty in unity of the Holy Spirit ALL GLORY AND HONOR, world without end. Amen"

Through Jesus, because He is our Mediator; with Him we unite in homage to our heavenly Father; and in Him, since we are incorporated in Him through Baptism. We may now recite the Lord's Prayer in confidence and filial devotion, having offered to our heavenly Father the acceptable Sacrifice of His own Son. He now invites us to the Lord's Supper at which our Victim, Jesus, will give Himself as Food. We prepare by praying according to His "method", to hallow our heavenly Father's Name, to spread His Kingdom, to do His will. Then will He give Bread sufficient for our body, forgive our trespasses of the soul, and save us from the evil of hell. Oh, how easy it is to develop our love!

Our heavenly Father has been very patient with us, waiting for our love to develop, but usually met with more of our demands, which we considered pressing, while He looked upon them as foolish and sometimes sinful. We now realize our poverty in wanting things solely for ourselves, when it was so easy to become rich by discarding all selfish desires for the greater Desire of truly loving our heavenly Father. We have lost so many opportunities in our daily struggle for things without value, that it is time and the hour has come, that we rise toward the distant Milky Way and far beyond calling with a loud voice through the vast outer space for our heavenly Father. We might astound the heavens by such a cry of love, for no other visible being has ever called God its Father, but in our case it is truly the voice of our heart, our mind and our soul. How proud we should feel, having this ineffable love for our heavenly Father implanted in our soul at creation; delivered from the bondage of selfishness by Jesus, and sanctified by the Holy Spirit unto Life everlasting! We are indeed the temple of God and love must reign supreme.

In times of doubt always lean toward Jesus and listen to the loving throb of His Sacred Heart for our heavenly Father, and you shall feel the warmth of divine love spreading to your own heart, and soon with all the strength of your human composition of body and soul you will rally in time to uphold this wonderful love for our heavenly Father.

Above all else however always obey the will of our heavenly Father, for that is essential and proof of your love. Through Jesus He wanted all men to belong to One Fold under One Shepherd. Try to fulfill His wish in this respect, because He cannot change His mind to approve another Fold. Jesus is the only safe Guide, and we must forego our personal Beliefs, and strictly adhere to the Faith He left us in the catholic Church. The Holy Spirit will do the rest, and you will finally know that you do really love our heavenly Father.

One last word: pray, pray in this fashion: "God, that I may see the truth and have the strength to accept it!" — "God, grant that I may see the Catholic Church as you see it." Stop in as you are passing your next Catholic Church. It will be open. Make it the occasion of a prayer for religious truth.

If I am right Thy grace impart
Still in that right to stay.
If I am wrong, then give me heart
To find a better way.

The Catholic religion is worth studying, isn't it? How would you like to investigate it by mail, in the privacy of your own home? A short, yet complete and interesting course of instruction, which can be fitted into the busiest life, is yours for the asking.

This involves no cost or obligation on your part. Simply drop a "penny" post card to the address below saying: "I am a non-Catholic. Please enroll me in your free instruction course, without cost or obligation."

CATHOLIC INFORMATION SOCIETY
214 West 31st Street
New York 1, N. Y.

THE NEGRO VOTER DRIVE—NO. 1

Growth in Registrations Parallels That of Whites

By HAL GULLIVER

Georgia's Negro voter registration has soared in some urban areas during the past year, but for the most part the increase has been about the same as the growth in white voter registration.

This is true, despite the concentrated efforts of at least one statewide registration committee to coordinate Negro voter registration campaigns, all over the state.

This committee is affiliated with Southern Christian Leadership Conference, which is also pushing Negro voter registration in other Southern states.

In April, 1962, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., president, named Atlanta businessman J. H. Calhoun, longtime Negro Republican leader, chairman of the Georgia committee.

"We now visualize the doubling of the number of Negro registered voters within the next 2 years," Dr. King said at that time.

The results in Georgia in a year have fallen far short of approaching that ambitious goal.

Exact voter registration figures by race are available for less than half of Georgia's 159 counties, since many counties have abandoned the practice of reporting to the secretary of state separate totals for Negro and white voters.

Only 42 of the 73 counties for which 1962 figures are available, however, showed any increase at all in Negro registration since 1960.

And in most cases, the increase was slight and roughly equivalent to the growth in white voter registration.

MAJOR SPURTS in Negro registration came chiefly in the larger cities such as Savannah, Albany, Columbus, Atlanta, Macon and Augusta. But there were also rural counties with low Negro registration which more than doubled their total number of Negro voters last year.

In an annual report last month, Mr. Calhoun gave the following approximate figures for the 1962 increase in urban registration: Savannah, 1,000; Albany, more than 2,000; Columbus, 3,640; Atlanta, 6,000; Macon, 6,000; and Augusta, 3,500.

The effect of the Negro voter registration drive on local politics in some areas as well as the active interest of the U.S. Justice Department in voter registration in certain Georgia counties, will be discussed in later articles.

Monday in The Constitution: The Drive in Terrell County.

file J-C

SUNDAY, APRIL 28, 1963

Duff. Ga.

Among Negroes

SHARP VARIATIONS IN REGISTRATIONS

The following table shows, county by county, the sharp variation in Negro voter registration in Georgia counties.

Registration figures filed in either 1960 or 1962 are available by race for 104 of Georgia's 159 counties and were supplied by Secretary of State Ben Fortson's office.

Figures for other counties come from 1958 registration figures or from more recent estimates of the number of Negro voters in a county.

Population figures are those of the State Health Department's 1962 estimate.

| | White Population | White Registration | Negro Population | Negro Registration |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Atkins | 4,500 | 2,498 | 1,800 | 692 |
| Appling | 10,500 | 7,705 | 3,100 | 1,359 |
| Bacon | 7,500 | 6,184 | 1,100 | 101 |
| Baker | 1,900 | 1,631 | 2,700 | 24 |
| Baldwin | 13,600 | 5,353 | 8,900 | 1,477 |
| Banks | 6,200 | 3,696 | 400 | 30 |
| Barrow | 12,200 | 5,848 | 2,600 | 312* |
| Bartow | 25,900 | 11,239 | 4,900 | 1,208* |
| Ben Hill | 9,200 | 3,292 | 4,500 | 740 |
| Berrien | 10,500 | 5,078 | 1,800 | 561 |
| Bibb | 97,200 | 26,827 | 49,300 | 3,042 |
| Bleckley | 7,100 | 3,346 | 2,800 | 45* |
| Brantley | 5,200 | 3,500 | 800 | 265 |
| Brooks | 7,900 | 3,097 | 7,400 | 445* |
| Bryan | 4,100 | 1,972 | 2,300 | 817* |
| Bulloch | 15,600 | 7,780 | 9,000 | 1,403 |
| Burke | 7,100 | 3,664 | 13,700 | 427* |
| Butts | 4,800 | 4,086 | 4,200 | 1,582 |
| Calhoun | 2,600 | 1,685 | 4,800 | 145 |
| Camden | 6,200 | 2,428 | 4,100 | 1,176 |
| Candler | 4,400 | 2,989 | 2,400 | 1,066 |
| Carroll | 30,900 | 11,789 | 7,000 | 797 |
| Catoosa | 21,500 | 7,876 | 300 | 73* |
| Charlton | 3,800 | 1,096 | 1,700 | 204 |
| Chatham | 125,400 | 36,072 | 46,000 | 10,068 |
| Chattahoochee | 600 | 338 | 600 | 17 |
| Chattooga | 18,700 | 8,733 | 1,900 | 906 |
| Cherokee | 22,800 | 14,300 | 900 | 325* |
| Clarke | 34,000 | 8,907 | 11,400 | 1,451* |
| Clay | 1,700 | 900 | 2,800 | 150* |
| Clayton | 46,900 | 15,094 | 4,600 | 544 |
| Clinch | 4,200 | 2,293 | 2,500 | 339 |
| Cobb | 116,700 | 29,662 | 8,600 | 1,808* |
| Colquitt | 24,600 | 11,362 | 8,100 | 1,117 |
| Coffee | 16,500 | 8,000 | 6,000 | 2,000* |
| Columbia | 9,100 | 4,061 | 4,800 | 659 |
| Cook | 8,600 | 5,400 | 3,500 | 600* |
| Coweta | 19,300 | 9,108 | 10,200 | 1,594 |
| Crawford | 2,500 | 1,403 | 3,400 | 284 |
| Crisp | 10,400 | 5,179 | 7,600 | 890 |
| Dade | 8,800 | 4,100 | 100 | 26* |
| Dawson | 3,700 | 1,835 | ---- | ---- |
| Decatur | 12,300 | 7,841 | 10,700 | 1,016 |
| DeKalb | 259,400 | 64,450 | 22,500 | 2,153* |
| Dodge | 12,100 | 8,794 | 4,600 | 2,180 |
| Dooly | 5,500 | 4,252 | 6,100 | 722* |
| Dougherty | 52,000 | 13,700 | 26,700 | 4,800* |
| Douglas | 14,800 | 8,489 | 2,500 | 916 |
| Early | 6,400 | 3,729 | 6,800 | 261 |
| Echols | 1,400 | 838 | 500 | 19 |
| Effingham | 6,800 | 2,618 | 3,500 | 188* |
| Elbert | 12,000 | 8,787 | 6,100 | 934 |
| Emanuel | 12,200 | 7,864 | 5,900 | 2,098 |
| Evans | 4,500 | 2,206 | 2,600 | 483* |
| Fannin | 13,800 | 8,649 | ---- | 18 |
| Fayette | 5,900 | 2,760 | 2,400 | 26* |
| Floyd | 58,200 | 21,045 | 10,600 | 1,653 |
| Forsyth | 12,500 | 5,418 | ---- | ---- |
| Franklin | 12,000 | 7,500 | 1,500 | 100* |
| Fulton | 361,100 | 109,262 | 203,600 | 35,834 |
| Gilmer | 9,100 | 4,106 | ---- | 4 |

| | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Glascock | 1,900 | 1,283 | 800 | 1 |
| Glynn | 32,400 | 7,701 | 11,900 | 2,133 |
| Gordon | 18,500 | 8,423 | 1,200 | 321 |
| Grady | 11,600 | 4,080 | 6,700 | 629 |
| Greene | 5,300 | 2,665 | 5,800 | 1,538 |
| Gwinnett | 42,400 | 20,628 | 3,500 | 1,301 |
| Habershaig | 17,900 | 8,223 | 900 | 200* |
| Hall | 46,400 | 13,174 | 5,500 | 733* |
| Hancock | 2,500 | 1,409 | 7,500 | 853 |
| Haralson | 13,600 | 7,162 | 1,200 | 384 |
| Harris | 5,100 | 3,340 | 6,100 | 263 |
| Hart | 11,700 | 5,978 | 3,700 | 281 |
| Heard | 4,200 | 2,321 | 1,200 | 325 |
| Henry | 19,400 | 7,225 | 7,600 | 2,377 |
| Houston | 34,200 | 7,799 | 8,600 | 413* |
| Irwin | 5,800 | 3,500 | 3,500 | 1,300* |
| Jackson | 16,600 | 6,679 | 2,400 | 408 |
| Jasper | 2,800 | 2,044 | 3,300 | 653 |
| Jeff Davis | 7,300 | 6,130 | 1,800 | 56* |
| Jefferson | 7,700 | 4,050 | 9,900 | 283 |
| Jenkins | 4,700 | 2,837 | 4,600 | 704 |
| Johnson | 5,400 | 3,208 | 2,700 | 262 |
| Jones | 4,300 | 2,570 | 4,200 | 923 |
| Lamar | 6,300 | 3,590 | 4,100 | 992 |
| Lanier | 3,700 | 1,794 | 1,500 | 359 |
| Laurens | 20,900 | 9,590 | 12,500 | 2,231 |
| Lee | 2,400 | 1,210 | 3,900 | 29* |
| Liberty | 6,500 | 2,800 | 5,700 | 2,014* |
| Lincoln | 3,000 | 2,487 | 2,800 | 3* |
| Long | 2,700 | 2,201 | 1,300 | 1,061* |
| Lowndes | 30,600 | 8,943 | 15,300 | 1,637 |
| Lumpkin | 7,400 | 2,886 | 100 | 43* |
| Macon | 5,000 | 3,052 | 8,300 | 443 |
| Madison | 9,400 | 4,588 | 2,100 | 55* |
| Marion | 2,200 | 1,508 | 3,300 | 85* |
| McDuffie | 7,500 | 4,046 | 5,400 | 251 |
| McIntosh | 2,800 | 1,396 | 3,700 | 1,219* |
| Meriwether | 10,100 | 4,508 | 9,700 | 950 |
| Miller | 5,000 | 3,220 | 2,100 | 6 |
| Mitchell | 9,900 | 7,928 | 10,100 | 375* |
| Monroe | 5,500 | 3,938 | 5,000 | 738 |
| Montgomery | 3,800 | 2,385 | 2,600 | 715 |
| Morgan | 5,500 | 1,576 | 4,900 | 892* |
| Murray | 10,600 | 4,520 | 100 | 27* |
| Muscogee | 106,600 | 27,595 | 36,700 | 4,801 |
| Newton | 14,100 | 5,883 | 7,300 | 901* |
| Oconee | 5,000 | 2,317 | 1,400 | 86 |
| Oglethorpe | 4,400 | 2,763 | 3,500 | 259 |
| Paulding | 12,200 | 7,626 | 1,200 | 543 |
| Peach | 5,900 | 2,539 | 8,200 | 679* |
| Pickens | 8,800 | 5,124 | 400 | 140 |
| Pierce | 7,700 | 3,876 | 2,100 | 380 |
| Pike | 4,000 | 2,520 | 3,200 | 496* |
| Polk | 23,700 | 10,490 | 14,600 | 1,395 |
| Pulaski | 4,700 | 3,020 | 3,600 | 235 |
| Putnam | 3,700 | 2,303 | 4,200 | 563 |
| Quitman | 900 | 793 | 1,600 | 38 |
| Rabun | 7,600 | 5,089 | 100 | 29 |
| Randolph | 4,200 | 2,495 | 6,800 | 423 |
| Richmond | 81,700 | 26,097 | 42,300 | 6,747 |
| Rockdale | 8,000 | 4,641 | 2,900 | 731 |
| Schley | 1,400 | 893 | 1,800 | 134 |
| Screven | 7,200 | 3,530 | 7,800 | 863 |
| Seminole | 4,300 | 3,500 | 2,600 | 11 |
| Spalding | 26,300 | 9,370 | 10,500 | 1,391 |
| Stephens | 16,400 | 8,242 | 2,500 | 627* |
| Stewart | 2,100 | 1,656 | 5,100 | 136 |
| Sumter | 11,900 | 5,481 | 13,000 | 548* |
| Talbot | 2,200 | 1,448 | 4,900 | 219* |
| Taliaferro | 1,300 | 946 | 2,000 | 828 |
| Tattnall | 9,900 | 6,630 | 3,800 | 1,310 |
| Taylor | 4,400 | 2,940 | 4,000 | 389 |
| Telfair | 7,900 | 3,959 | 4,000 | 325 |
| Terrell | 4,600 | 2,935 | 8,300 | 98* |
| Thomas | 20,500 | 8,422 | 14,700 | 1,579* |
| Tift | 17,000 | 6,681 | 7,000 | 1,113* |
| Toombs | 12,500 | 5,962 | 4,800 | 431 |
| Towns | 4,600 | 3,514 | —— | ——* |
| Treutlen | 4,000 | 2,638 | 2,000 | 45 |
| Troup | 31,800 | 11,759 | 15,600 | 1,732* |
| Turner | 5,400 | 3,530 | 3,200 | 464 |
| Twiggs | 3,200 | 1,698 | 4,800 | 246 |
| Union | 6,700 | 5,662 | —— | —— |
| Upson | 17,500 | 6,404 | 6,700 | 655 |
| Walker | 46,300 | 24,928 | 2,600 | 1,019 |
| Walton | 14,700 | 6,381 | 6,200 | 458 |
| Ware | 24,900 | 12,365 | 8,800 | 2,391 |
| Warren | 2,800 | 1,640 | 4,600 | 188 |
| Washington | 8,200 | 5,269 | 10,800 | 1,542 |
| Wayne | 14,700 | 7,171 | 3,900 | 809 |
| Webster | 1,200 | 766 | 2,100 | 9* |
| Wheeler | 3,600 | 2,302 | 1,700 | 474 |
| White | 6,900 | 4,220 | 300 | 242 |
| Whitfield | 43,900 | 17,259 | 2,100 | 898* |
| Wilcox | 5,300 | 3,059 | 2,600 | 230* |
| Wilkes | 5,400 | 3,529 | 5,500 | 493 |
| Wilkinson | 4,900 | 3,041 | 4,500 | 411* |
| Worth | 8,900 | 5,855 | 8,100 | 296* |

*1958 registration figures, or a more recent approximate figure.

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

hold info for similar request

Note: This letter has been referred to you by the Commission on Civil Rights, Washington 25, D.C.

note: no return address!

April 30, 1963

Southern Regional Council
5 Forsyth Street
Atlanta, Georgia

Gentlemen:

I am writing you in reference to the voting rights of minority groups, especially Negroes, in the South. From your own point of view, I would like to know whether these groups enjoy the normal privileges. Here in the North, I am sure we receive a very distorted view of the situation. I realize, of course, that this is a very touchy subject, but I am doing a term paper on it. Any information would be very helpful.

1961
CR & Voting
#1

Prospective voters, as well as voters themselves, must be schooled in the needs of the people. I would like to put forth the following questions:

1. What is the actual Southern feeling toward Negroes as voters?
2. What do you think the Northern feeling is? - look -
3. What progress is being made?

Justice suits - 37

Your cooperation will be greatly appreciated.

Yours truly,

Sandy Straus

Miss Sandy Straus

Fed
Exec
M. Price
VEP
64 Acts

Mon Aug. 5th

Dear Mrs. Albright:

Please forgive me for not answering your kind letter sooner. And I can't thank you enough for all the vitally interesting literature. I had wanted to attend some meetings and evaluate the situation here before writing.

I believe the greatest need today - especially in areas of crisis - is to provide a climate for communication and education. Violence seems to arise when lines of communication are broken. Therefore it seems to me the need in Tampa is for a sounding board - an organization which would make available to all concerned individuals the opportunity for expression of their viewpoints - such an organization would be composed of people dedicated enough to the principles of brotherhood, that they would be willing to put aside their personal prejudices and projects in order that they might provide for others a climate ~~of~~ and opportunity for communication.... and understanding. With understanding would come the lessening of fear which appears to me to be at the root of much of our difficulties.

At the meeting of the Tampa branch of the F.C. on Human Relations the other night - only committee heads present by design - conversation and planning centered on the need for an "explosive and controversial general meeting in Sept." in the acting chairman's words. Then a number of individuals made plea for help in registering negro Jr. High students in here-to-fore white schools - corralling non-voters for registering - finding a suitable Negro student for attendance at U.S.F. etc. all activist in design ... and all falling in areas already being handled by active and well ordered groups. I am an active member of the Urban League - and although our work is not spectacular, its aims (ULO) are slowly being realized.

Perhaps I've misunderstood the work and aims of the S.R.C. & the J.C.H.R. - By the above activities it has become pro-something or agst something else - forsaking forever the opportunity for mediatorship - Under the present circumstances, I'm afraid that I don't fit too well ... and I'm sorry. I've written Mr. Mitchell to this effect.

Everyone speaks so highly of you and your work - Namaskar!

Sincerely
Margot Kenyon

U.S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE
DIVISION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20402

OFFICIAL BUSINESS

RETURN AFTER 5 DAYS

PENALTY FOR PRIVATE USE TO AVOID PAYMENT OF POSTAGE, $300

Name _____

Street address _____

City, State, and Zip Code _____

TO INSURE PROMPT, ACCURATE SHIPMENT, PLEASE PLACE CORRECT ADDRESS ON MAILING LABEL ABOVE

MAIL ORDER FORM To:
Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402

Enclosed find $..... (check, money order, or Supt. of Documents coupons. Do not send postage stamps). Please send me the publications I have checked below.

1T ..... $0.05 ea., $3.25 per 100. Strictly for Teenagers. FS 2.2:T 22/2

2T ..... .05 The Narcissus Bulb Fly, etc. A 1.35:444/2

3T ..... .20 Pellet Seeding on Western Rangelands. A 1.38:922

4T ..... .20 Timber, etc. A 1.68:545

5T ..... .10 Recent Motion Pictures, etc. A 1.76:14/supp.963

6T ..... .20 What We Get From Trees. A 13.20/3:T 71/6/963

7T ..... .25 Why a Nuclear Test Ban Treaty? AC 1.12:N 88

8T ..... .20 Do You Know Your Economic ABC's? C 1.2:Ec 7/3

9T ..... .20 The Cotton Textile Cycle, etc. C 1.2:T 31

10T ..... .25 Economic Effect of Textile Mill Closings, etc. C 1.2:T 31/2

11T ..... .25 Radiobiological Dosimetry, etc. C 13.11:88

12T ..... 1.50 Manual of Radiosonde Observations (WBAN). C 30.4:P/963

13T ..... .70 Characteristics of the Hurricane Storm Surge. C 30.28:48

14T ..... .10 Metallic Cartridges. C 41.20:62–63

15T ..... 2.25 Metallic Materials and Elements for Flight Vehicle Structures. D 7.6/2:5/3

16T ..... $0.40 Value Engineering, Handbook H–111. D 7.6/2:111

17T ..... 1.50 Machine Accountant 3 and 2. D 208.11:Ac 2/2

18T ..... 2.50 Dental Technician, Prosthetic. D 208.11:D 43/962

19T ..... 6.50 Register of Commissioned and Warrant Officers of the U.S. Navy and Marine Corps, and Reserve Officers on Active Duty, etc. D 208.12:963

20T ..... 1.25 Small Arms Ranges. Catalog No. D 301.7:50–25

21T ..... .75 Survey of Funding and Expenditures, etc. FS 2.22:M52/32/960–61

22T ..... 4.00 (Cloth) Perspectives in Materials Research. D 210.15:ACR–61

U.S. Navy Marine Climatic Atlas of the World:

23T ..... 10.00 (Cloth) Vol. VI, Arctic Ocean. D 202.2:At 6/v.6

24T ..... 8.00 (Cloth) Vol. I, North Atlantic Ocean. D 202.2:At 6/v.1

25T ..... 8.00 (Cloth) Vol. II, North Pacific Ocean. D 202.2:At 6/v.2

26T ..... 8.00 (Cloth) Vol. III, Indian Ocean. D 202.2:At 6/v.3

27T ..... 8.50 (Cloth) Vol. IV, South Atlantic Ocean. D 202.2:At 6/v.4

(Over) Order form continued on reverse side ⟶

Please charge these publications to my Deposit Account No. _____

1963 No. 17

Name _____

Street address _____

City, State, and Zip Code _____

SUPPLIES OF SOME PUBLICATIONS ARE LIMITED. TO INSURE AVAILABILITY OF PUBLICATIONS DESIRED, PLEASE RETURN THIS ORDER FORM PROMPTLY

FOR USE OF SUPT. DOCS.

____Enclosed
____To be mailed later
____Subscription
Refund
Coupon refund
Postage

PLEASE DETACH ALONG THIS LINE

1963 No. 17
Aug. 16, 1963

To order, check publications desired on above order form, complete the form, detach and return to the Superintendent of Documents, United States Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402, with remittance . . .

An invaluable aid for all . . .
Over 500,000 copies sold . . .

STRICTLY FOR TEENAGERS

1T. This leaflet which presents some important facts about venereal diseases has been prepared to answer many of the questions modern teenagers ask about this important topic. 1962. [8] p. il.
Catalog No. FS 2.2:T 22/2 5¢

13T. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE HURRICANE STORM SURGE. This Technical Paper, divided into two parts, begins with a discussion of the principal characteristics of the coastal flooding produced by hurricanes and of the physical processes which are believed to account for the observations. It is followed by a discussion of the assembled data, the methods used in processing the data, and the resulting uncertainties in the final figures. The assembled data from a number of the best documented hurricane storm surge cases are presented in Part Two of this report. 1963. 139 p. il.
Catalog No. C 30.28:48 70¢

14T. METALLIC CARTRIDGES. The purpose of this Simplified Practice Recommendation is to establish, as a useful standard, a list of the metallic cartridges that are currently in general demand and widely used with various types of firearms. It covers rim-fire cartridges (ball, shot, and blank) and center-fire cartridges (ball and blank). 1963. 6 p. il.
Catalog No. C 41.20:62–63 10¢

15T. METALLIC MATERIALS AND ELEMENTS FOR FLIGHT VEHICLE STRUCTURES. Since many aircraft and missile manufacturers supply products for both commercial and military use, standardization of the requirements of the various governmental procuring or certificating agencies is of direct benefit to the manufacturer. Although the types and purposes of military products often differ greatly

To order, check publications desired on above order form, complete the form, detach and return to the Superintendent of Documents, United States Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402, with remittance . . .

An invaluable aid for all . . .
Over 500,000 copies sold . . .

STRICTLY FOR TEENAGERS

1T. This leaflet which presents some important facts about venereal diseases has been prepared to answer many of the questions modern teenagers ask about this important topic. 1962. [8] p. il.
Catalog No. FS 2.2:T 22/2 5¢

For those interested in purchasing quantities of this pamphlet a special quantity price of $3.25 per 100 copies is allowed on orders to be mailed to one address.

2T. THE NARCISSUS BULB FLY, HOW TO PREVENT ITS DAMAGE IN HOME GARDENS. Describes the damage this insect does to narcissus bulbs, the signs of infestations, how the fly develops, ways to protect bulbs from damage, and precautions to be observed in the use of insecticides. Rev. 1963. [6] p. il.
Catalog No. A 1.35:444/2 5¢

3T. PELLET SEEDING ON WESTERN RANGELANDS. This review of information on seeding pelleted seed on rangelands is presented by the U.S. Departments of Agriculture and Interior. It covers reports of laboratory and greenhouse tests on seeds pelleted by the various processes, as well as experimental field tests and large-scale seedings where pelleted seeds were used. Information is given on the locations, the procedures followed, the results obtained, and the effectiveness of using pelleted seed as a range-improvement practice. 1963. 34 p. il.
Catalog No. A 1.38:922 20¢

4T. TIMBER, STORY OF A TIMBER SALE ON A NATIONAL FOREST. This story of a timber sale on a National Forest, told against a background typical of Forest Service Ranger Districts in the Pacific Northwest, is a factual accounting of the many activities involved wherever National Forest timber is harvested. Describes a timber sale on a National Forest from its inception to completion of actual removal of the trees. 1963. [20] p. il.
Catalog No. A 1.68:545 20¢

5T. RECENT MOTION PICTURES OF THE U.S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, JUNE 1963. This publication is a 1961–1963 cumulative supplement to Agriculture Handbook No. 14, and contains all motion pictures released by the Department of Agriculture since May 1960. 1963. 9 p.
Catalog No. A 1.76:14/supp.963 10¢

6T. WHAT WE GET FROM TREES. Colored poster depicting the many products which come from trees and the multiple uses derived from them. The poster measures 28 x 40 inches. Rev. 1963.
Catalog No. A 13.20/3:T 71/6/963 20¢

7T. WHY A NUCLEAR TEST BAN TREATY? This pamphlet has been prepared so as to bring together, with minor editorial changes, statements of the President, the Secretary of State, the Director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, and those of other key officials. The intent is to insure broader public understanding of U.S. policy on this vital issue. 1963. 46 p. il.
Catalog No. AC 1.12:N 88 25¢

8T. DO YOU KNOW YOUR ECONOMIC ABC's? See special block on front panel for description of this publication.
Catalog No. C 1.2:Ec 7/3 20¢

9T. THE COTTON TEXTILE CYCLE: ITS NATURE AND TREND. This U.S. Department of Commerce publication, exploring the nature of the textile cycle, emphasizes statistical indicators and their relationships, especially for the short run, and describes a new method by which textile series may be analyzed for anticipating upturns and downturns. It also analyzes fluctuations in which various possible influences on the cycle are simulated by an analog computer, and the results studied in the light of past statistical relationships. 1963. 42 p. il.
Catalog No. C 1.2:T 31 20¢

10T. ECONOMIC EFFECT OF TEXTILE MILL CLOSINGS; SELECTED COMMUNITIES IN MIDDLE ATLANTIC STATES. This study examines eight communities in which textile mills closed and in which textile employment declined. Each case presents peculiarities of its own and serves as an example of possible effects of declining mill activity. Major attention is given to changes occurring in the period 1950–60. Economic repercussions are analyzed in relation to the general decline of employment in the textile industry and in relation to local conditions affecting total employment in each community. 1963. 58 p.
Catalog No. C 1.2:T 31/2 25¢

11T. RADIOBIOLOGICAL DOSIMETRY, RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION ON RADIOLOGICAL UNITS AND MEASUREMENTS. Deals primarily with radiobiological dosimetry, and considers methods of improving the accuracy and intercomparability of absorbed dose measurements in radiobiology. It is in effect a handbook for the experimental radiobiologists. It emphasizes the great importance of planning the experimental work in a way which makes the dosimetry easier and more accurate and it illustrates how this can be done. 1963. 26 p. il.
Catalog No. C 13.11:88 25¢

12T. MANUAL OF RADIOSONDE OBSERVATIONS (WBAN). Circular P, Seventh Edition, 1957. This manual, prepared by Weather Bureau personnel, in collaboration with representatives of the Air Force and the Navy, to secure uniformity in the taking and recording of radiosonde observations, has been reprinted to include Changes 1 through 5. Reprinted 1963. 192 p. il.
Catalog No. C 30.4:P/963 $1.50

13T. CHARACTERISTICS OF THE HURRICANE STORM SURGE. This Technical Paper, divided into two parts, begins with a discussion of the principal characteristics of the coastal flooding produced by hurricanes and of the physical processes which are believed to account for the observations. It is followed by a discussion of the assembled data, the methods used in processing the data, and the resulting uncertainties in the final figures. The assembled data from a number of the best documented hurricane storm surge cases are presented in Part Two of this report. 1963. 139 p. il.
Catalog No. C 30.28:48 70¢

14T. METALLIC CARTRIDGES. The purpose of this Simplified Practice Recommendation is to establish, as a useful standard, a list of the metallic cartridges that are currently in general demand and widely used with various types of firearms. It covers rim-fire cartridges (ball, shot, and blank) and center-fire cartridges (ball and blank). 1963. 6 p. il.
Catalog No. C 41.20:62–63 10¢

15T. METALLIC MATERIALS AND ELEMENTS FOR FLIGHT VEHICLE STRUCTURES. Since many aircraft and missile manufacturers supply products for both commercial and military use, standardization of the requirements of the various governmental procuring or certificating agencies is of direct benefit to the manufacturer. Although the types and purposes of military products often differ greatly from those of commercial products, necessitating certain differences in the structural requirements, the requirements for strength of materials and elements are nearly identical. This publication is issued, therefore, to provide uniform data and to eliminate the necessity for referring to materials, handbooks, and bulletins to obtain the allowable stresses and other related properties of materials and structural elements. With few exceptions the data are acceptable to the Air Force, the Navy, the Army, and the Federal Aviation Agency. (Issued in looseleaf form.) 1963. [444] p. il.
Catalog No. D 7.6/2:5/3 $2.25

16T. VALUE ENGINEERING, HANDBOOK H–111. Experience has demonstrated the effectiveness of Value Engineering in reducing cost without compromising the quality and reliability of defense hardware. This Handbook has been developed to aid Government Activities and contractors in expanding and accelerating their Value Engineering programs to achieve meaningful cost reductions. (Issued in looseleaf form.) 1963. 58 p. il.
Catalog No. D 7.6/2:111 40¢

17T. MACHINE ACCOUNTANT 3 AND 2. This Navy Training Course provides the fundamental concepts of punched card accounting; covers the operation and control panel wiring specific unit record machines (card punches, verifiers, and data transceivers, card sorters, interpreters, automatic punches, collators, electronic statistical machine, accounting machines, and calculating punches) used in punched card accounting; and contains an introduction to electronic data processing systems, in which components and functions of electronic data processing equipment are discussed. 1963. 267 p. il.
Catalog No. D 208.11:Ac 2/2 $1.50

18T. DENTAL TECHNICIAN, PROSTHETIC. This Navy Training Course has been completely revised to give step by step portrayal of the fabrication of each type of prosthetic appliance. The chapters on complete dentures; removable partial dentures; and inlay, crowns, and fixed partial dentures give procedures in the fabrication of a prosthetic restoration from impression to completion. A number of illustrations giving detailed pictorial descriptions of techniques are included. Rev. 1962. 355 p. il.
Catalog No. D 208.11:D 43/962 $2.50

19T. REGISTER OF COMMISSIONED AND WARRANT OFFICERS OF THE UNITED STATES NAVY AND MARINE CORPS, AND RESERVE OFFICERS ON ACTIVE DUTY, 1 JANUARY 1963. Provides lists of officers on active duty, shown in three categories; lineal list officers defined in Title 10, U.S. Code, Sec. 5504; officers of the Naval Reserve assigned active duty in connection with training, administration, and recruiting of the Naval Reserve (Training and Administration of Reserves); and women officers appointed under Title 10, U.S. Code, Sec. 5590, and nonlineal list Women Reserve Officers. A change in the format of the publication is the separate listing of the various restricted line categories. Each category of the restricted line, as well as the staff corps, is listed separately by designators. 1963. 1254 p.
Catalog No. D 208.12:963 $6.50

20T. SMALL ARMS RANGES. This Department of Air Force manual provides detailed guidance for planning, constructing, and operating small arms ranges. It outlines the duties and responsibilities of various personnel, and recommends policies for the use of small arms ranges to help achieve and maintain small arms skill and proficiency. The manual also will serve as a reference text for resident course training, individual on-the-job and unit training, and refresher or proficiency training. 1963. 163 p. il.
Catalog No. D 301.7:50–25 $1.25

21T. SURVEY OF FUNDING AND EXPENDITURES FOR TRAINING OF MENTAL HEALTH PERSONNEL, 1960–1961. Provides information on one aspect of financing in mental health and should be of interest to persons and organizations concerned with mental health training. 1963. 149 p. il.
Catalog No. FS 2.22:M 52/32/960–61 75¢

22T. PERSPECTIVES IN MATERIALS RESEARCH. Under a program sponsored by the Office of Naval Research, the National Academy of Sciences—National Research Council invited some 60 leading scientists and engineers working in various phases of modern materials to report on the current status of research in their respective specialties. This volume is part of the effort of the Office of Naval Research to bring to the attention of the scientific community important resource material that can serve the needs of graduate students and mature scientists in the conduct of their research and development. Considering the great volume of scientific publications today, an analysis represented by Perspectives in Materials Research brings into clear perspective the many facets of research activity. 1963. 771 p. il.
Catalog No. D 210.15:ACR–61 Cloth, $4.00

Prices subject to change without notice • All supplies limited • Many more titles on other side →

1963 No. 17 • Issued Biweekly by the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402 • August 16, 1963

DO YOU KNOW YOUR ECONOMIC ABC's?

87. To encourage the growing interest in economic matters among thoughtful Americans, the Department of Commerce has just issued an attractively illustrated booklet called Do You Know Your Economic ABC's? It explains in simple terms the gross national product as it mirrors the Nation's economy. If you would like to know more about the basic forces that make our economy work, you will find this booklet well worth reading. 1963. 40 p. il.
Catalog No. C 1.2:Ec-7/3 20¢

SPECIAL INFORMATION—QUANTITY DISCOUNTS. For the convenience of those who are interested in purchasing quantities of this booklet, a 25 percent quantity discount is allowed on all purchases of 100 or more copies to be mailed to one address.

SELECTED UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS

28T ..... $8.00 (Cloth) Vol. V, South Pacific Ocean. D 202.2:At 6/v.5
29T ..... .10 Teaching About Human Rights. FS 5.231:31004
30T ..... .25 Educational AM and FM Radio, etc. FS 5.234:34016–63
31T ..... .70 Public Social Welfare Personnel—1960. FS 14.2:P 96
32T ..... .45 Institutions Serving Delinquent Children, etc. FS 14.111:360
33T ..... 1.00 Research Relating to Children, Bull. 16. FS 14.114:16
34T ..... .50 Water Requirements and Uses in Arizona, etc. I 28.27:8162
35T ..... .15 National Capital Parks. I 29.6:N 21/11/963
36T ..... .10 Camping Facilities, etc. I 29.71:963
Union Wages and Hours:
37T ..... .30 Building Trades, etc. L 2.3:1355
38T ..... .25 Motortruck Drivers and Helpers, etc. L 2.3:1356
39T ..... .25 Private Pension Plans and Manpower Policy. L 2.3:1359
40T ..... .15 Research and Development in the Aircraft and Missiles Industry (1956–1961), etc. NS 1.11:39
41T ..... .05 Inquiries Into Industrial Research, etc. NS 1.11:38
42T ..... $0.65 Research and Development in Industry 1960, etc. NS 1.22:In 2/960
43T ..... .10 Better Housing for the Future, etc. PrEx 8.2:H 81
Foreign Relations of the U.S., Diplomatic Papers, 1942:
44T ..... 3.25 (Cloth) Vol. IV, the Near East and Africa. S 1.1:942/v.4
45T ..... 3.00 (Cloth) Vol. V, the American Republics. S 1.1:942/v.5
46T ..... 3.25 (Cloth) Vol. VI, the American Republics. S 1.1:942/v.6
47T ..... .30 Program Guide, Nursing Service, Nursing Care of the Long-Term Patient. VA 1.18:2/pt.5/G–8
48T ..... 1.00 White House Conference on Conservation, etc. Y 3.W 58/6:2 P 94/962
49T ..... .40 Bank Holding Companies, etc. Y 4.B 22/1:B 22/5
Interagency Coordination in Drug Research, etc.:
50T ..... 1.00 Part 1. Y 4.G 74/6:D/84/pt.1
51T ..... 1.25 Part 2. Y 4.G 74/6:D 84/pt.2
52T ..... .80 Interagency Coordination of Information, Pt. 1. Y 4.G 74/6:In 3/2/pt.1
53T ..... 6.25 (Cloth) Communicable Diseases—Malaria. D 104.11:P 92/v.6

When ordering these publications, please fill in the other side of this form

23T. U.S. NAVY MARINE CLIMATIC ATLAS OF THE WORLD, VOLUME VI, ARCTIC OCEAN. Presents meteorological information for the surface and upper air over the Arctic Ocean in a modern manner suitable for wide use and adaptation. This volume deals with the Arctic Ocean and its adjacent coasts and seas. It also offers the first summarization of several years of dropsonde observations, i.e., radiosondes dropped from aircraft. Volumes 1–5, previously issued, are still available in limited supply, as listed below. 1963. 293 pages of charts.
Catalog No. D 202.2:At 6/v.6 Cloth, $10.00

24T. Volume I, North Atlantic Ocean. 1955. 275 pages of charts.
Catalog No. D 202.2:At 6/v.1 Cloth, $8.00

25T. Volume II, North Pacific Ocean. 1956, published 1957. 275 pages of charts.
Catalog No. D 202.2:At 6/v.2 Cloth, $8.00

26T. Volume III, Indian Ocean. 1957. 267 pages of charts.
Catalog No. D 202.2:At 6/v.3 Cloth, $8.00

27T. Volume IV, South Atlantic Ocean. 1958. 267 pages of charts.
Catalog No. D 202.2:At 6/v.4 Cloth, $8.50

28T. Volume V, South Pacific Ocean. 1960. 267 pages of charts.
Catalog No. D 202.2:At 6/v.5 Cloth, $8.00

29T. TEACHING ABOUT HUMAN RIGHTS. This reprint from

41T. INQUIRIES INTO INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT AND INNOVATION. Reports on special studies relating to the program of the Office of Economic and Statistical Studies of the National Science Foundation. 1963. 4 p.
Catalog No. NS 1.11:38 5¢

42T. RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT IN INDUSTRY 1960, FINAL REPORT ON A SURVEY OF R&D FUNDS AND R&D SCIENTISTS AND ENGINEERS. Analyzes in detail the results of the 1960 survey of industrial research and development conducted for the National Science Foundation. This survey provides economic data on the magnitude, financing, and other characteristics of research and development in industrial firms. 1963. 118 p. il.
Catalog No. NS 1.22:In 2/960 65¢

43T. BETTER HOUSING FOR THE FUTURE, A REPORT TO THE PANEL ON CIVILIAN TECHNOLOGY, OFFICE OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY, EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT, FROM ITS SUB-PANEL ON HOUSING. This report was prepared in response to a request by the Panel on Civilian Technology for information on opportunities for and obstacles to technological innovation in the housing field. The report is being made public in the hope that it will contribute to the thinking of all those concerned with this vital sector of our economy. 1963. 15 p.
Catalog No. PrEx 8.2:H 81 10¢

FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES, DIPLOMATIC PAPERS, 1942. These publications constitute the official record of the foreign policy of the United States. They include, subject to necessary security considerations, all documents needed to give a comprehensive record of the major foreign policy decisions within the range

23T. U.S. NAVY MARINE CLIMATIC ATLAS OF THE WORLD, VOLUME VI, ARCTIC OCEAN. Presents meteorological information for the surface and upper air over the Arctic Ocean in a modern manner suitable for wide use and adaptation. This volume deals with the Arctic Ocean and its adjacent coasts and seas. It also offers the first summarization of several years of dropsonde observations, i.e., radiosondes dropped from aircraft. Volumes 1–5, previously issued, are still available in limited supply, as listed below. 1963. 293 pages of charts.
Catalog No. D 202.2:At 6/v.6 Cloth, $10.00

24T. Volume I, North Atlantic Ocean. 1955. 275 pages of charts.
Catalog No. D 202.2:At 6/v.1 Cloth, $8.00

25T. Volume II, North Pacific Ocean. 1956, published 1957. 275 pages of charts.
Catalog No. D 202.2:At 6/v.2 Cloth, $8.00

26T. Volume III, Indian Ocean. 1957. 267 pages of charts.
Catalog No. D 202.2:At 6/v.3 Cloth, $8.00

27T. Volume IV, South Atlantic Ocean. 1958. 267 pages of charts.
Catalog No. D 202.2:At 6/v.4 Cloth, $8.50

28T. Volume V, South Pacific Ocean. 1960. 267 pages of charts.
Catalog No. D 202.2:At 6/v.5 Cloth, $8.00

29T. TEACHING ABOUT HUMAN RIGHTS. This reprint from School Life, November–December 1962 issue, discusses the Declaration of Human Rights and presents suggestions to follow in commemorating Human Rights Day and Week. 1963. [6] p. il.
Catalog No. FS 5.231:31004 10¢

30T. EDUCATIONAL AM AND FM RADIO AND EDUCATIONAL TELEVISION STATIONS BY STATE AND CITY. This list of educational AM and FM radio and television stations includes the call letters of the stations, and gives information on the frequency power, or channel, licensees, and the general managers, and/or program directors. 1963. 29 p.
Catalog No. FS 5.234:34016–63 25¢

31T. PUBLIC SOCIAL WELFARE PERSONNEL—1960. This report of a survey conducted in early 1960 presents a summary of the findings as related to all social welfare personnel in public welfare programs and a more detailed analysis of the findings related to public assistance and child welfare programs, respectively. 1963. 140 p.
Catalog No. FS 14.2:P 96 70¢

32T. INSTITUTIONS SERVING DELINQUENT CHILDREN, GUIDES AND GOALS. The practices recommended or discussed in this publication are accepted by and are already part of the program of a number of the training schools in the country. Many others may have to revise their procedures, add staff, and be given greater community support—financial and otherwise—before these recommendations can be put into effect. It should be noted that this publication is primarily applicable to public institutions serving delinquent children, although much of the material could also be appropriate to private institutions carrying similar responsibilities. 1962. 141 p.
Catalog No. FS 14.111:360 45¢

33T. RESEARCH RELATING TO CHILDREN, BULLETIN 16. Includes reports of research in progress, or recently completed, on growth and development; personality and adjustment; educational process; exceptional children; the child in the family; social, economic, and cultural influences; health services and surveys; and social services and surveys, reported to the Clearinghouse for Research in Child Life between July 1, 1962–January 31, 1963. 1963. 146 p.
Catalog No. FS 14.114:16 $1.00

34T. WATER REQUIREMENTS AND USES IN ARIZONA MINERAL INDUSTRIES. Describes the effects of water shortage on Arizona's mineral industries. The information presented was obtained in interviews with company representatives. Operations covered included all State metal mines using substantial quantities of water and all concentrators and smelters. 1963. 97 p. il.
Catalog No. I 28.27:8162 50¢

35T. NATIONAL CAPITAL PARKS. Describes briefly the Mall, the White House, Lincoln Memorial, Jefferson Memorial, Washington Monument, the Marine Corps War Memorial, and other areas in nearby Virginia and Maryland under the jurisdiction of the National Capital Parks. Pictures of many of the statues and memorials are included, as well as a complete listing of all the statues and memorials in the Washington area. 1963. 31 p. il.
Catalog No. I 29.6:N 21/11/963 15¢

36T. CAMPING FACILITIES IN AREAS ADMINISTERED BY THE NATIONAL PARK SERVICE. Containing informational and descriptive material of interest to campers, this booklet lists camping accommodations in each area, and gives definitions of categories of these accommodations. It also briefly discusses Mission 66—a long-range conservation program for the National Park System, and lists some general regulations which have been established for the protection of natural features and for the comfort and safety of the camper. Rev. 1963. 15 p. il.
Catalog No. I 29.71:963 10¢

UNION WAGES AND HOURS. The Bureau of Labor Statistics conducts annual surveys of wage rates and scheduled hours of work for specific crafts or jobs. These studies present the wage rate in effect as of July 1 of each year, as reported to the Bureau by the appropriate local labor organization in each of the cities included in the survey. Recently issued studies are listed below.

37T. Building Trades, July 1, 1962, and Trend 1907–1962. 1963. 43 p. il.
Catalog No. L 2.3:1355 30¢

38T. Motortruck Drivers and Helpers, July 1, 1962, and Trend 1936–62. 1963. 30 p. il.
Catalog No. L 2.3:1356 25¢

39T. PRIVATE PENSION PLANS AND MANPOWER POLICY. Reviews the effects of corporate pensions on various aspects of manpower policy, including labor mobility, the employment opportunities of older workers, and retirement and withdrawal from the labor force. 1963. 37 p. il.
Catalog No. L 2.3:1359 25¢

40T. RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT IN THE AIRCRAFT AND MISSILES INDUSTRY (1956–1961), R&D FUNDS AND R&D SCIENTISTS AND ENGINEERS. Presents statistics on funds for R&D performance in the aircraft and missiles industry for the years 1956 through 1961. 1963. 11 p.
Catalog No. NS 1.11:39 15¢

41T. INQUIRIES INTO INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT AND INNOVATION. Reports on special studies relating to the program of the Office of Economic and Statistical Studies of the National Science Foundation. 1963. 4 p.
Catalog No. NS 1.11:38 5¢

42T. RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT IN INDUSTRY 1960, FINAL REPORT ON A SURVEY OF R&D FUNDS AND R&D SCIENTISTS AND ENGINEERS. Analyzes in detail the results of the 1960 survey of industrial research and development conducted for the National Science Foundation. This survey provides economic data on the magnitude, financing, and other characteristics of research and development in industrial firms. 1963. 118 p. il.
Catalog No. NS 1.22:In 2/960 65¢

43T. BETTER HOUSING FOR THE FUTURE, A REPORT TO THE PANEL ON CIVILIAN TECHNOLOGY, OFFICE OF SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY, EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT, FROM ITS SUB-PANEL ON HOUSING. This report was prepared in response to a request by the Panel on Civilian Technology for information on opportunities for and obstacles to technological innovation in the housing field. The report is being made public in the hope that it will contribute to the thinking of all those concerned with this vital sector of our economy. 1963. 15 p.
Catalog No. PrEx 8.2:H 81 10¢

FOREIGN RELATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES, DIPLOMATIC PAPERS, 1942. These publications constitute the official record of the foreign policy of the United States. They include, subject to necessary security considerations, all documents needed to give a comprehensive record of the major foreign policy decisions within the range of the Department of State's responsibility, together with appropriate materials concerning the facts which contributed to the formulation of policies. Recently released volumes in this series are listed below.

44T. Volume IV, the Near East and Africa. 1963. 854 p.
Catalog No. S 1.1:942/v.4 Cloth, $3.25

45T. Volume V, the American Republics. 1962. 838 p. (Limited supply still available.)
Catalog No. S 1.1:942/v.5 Cloth, $3.00

46T. Volume VI, the American Republics. 1963. 773 p.
Catalog No. S 1.1:942/v.6 Cloth, $3.25

47T. PROGRAM GUIDE, NURSING SERVICE, NURSING CARE OF THE LONG-TERM PATIENT. This guide has been written to help the professional nurse develop guidelines for the nursing care of patients with prolonged or chronic illnesses. It should also be of assistance to the professional nurse in teaching and directing nursing personnel under her supervision and in determining those activities which she may safely delegate to nonprofessional workers. While this guide is written primarily for those who are responsible for the nursing care of the long-term patient, it should be of interest and value to all personnel involved in patient care services. 1963. [39] p.
Catalog No. VA 1.18:2/pt.5/G–8 30¢

48T. WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON CONSERVATION, OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS, MAY 24 TO 25, 1962. Contains the official proceedings of the White House Conference on Conservation held in Washington, D.C., on May 24 and 25, 1962. Its central purpose was to stimulate the exchange of ideas about the future course of American conservation policy. 1963. 103 p. il.
Catalog No. Y 3.W 58/6:2 P 94/962 $1.00

49T. BANK HOLDING COMPANIES, SCOPE OF OPERATIONS AND STOCK OWNERSHIP. This report to the members of the House Committee on Banking and Currency gives data on the structure and extent of bank holding company operations; concentration of ownership in bank holding companies; and multiple stockholdings among registered bank holding companies. 1963. 131 p.
Catalog No. Y 4.B 22/1:B 22/5 40¢

INTERAGENCY COORDINATION IN DRUG RESEARCH AND REGULATION. These hearings, held August 1 and 9, 1962, before the Subcommittee on Reorganization and International Organizations of the Senate Committee on Government Operations, 87th Cong., 2d sess., an agency coordination study, presents a review of the cooperation on drug policies among the Food and Drug Administration, National Institutes of Health, Veterans' Administration, and other agencies. Issued in two parts as listed below.

50T. Part 1. 1963. 308 p. (Limited supply still available.)
Catalog No. Y 4.G 74/6:D 84/pt.1 $1.00

51T. Part 2, Supplementary Exhibits and Index to Parts 1 and 2. 1963. p. 309–774, il. (Just released.)
Catalog No. Y 4.G 74/6:D 84/pt.2 $1.25

52T. INTERAGENCY COORDINATION OF INFORMATION, PART 1. Presents the hearings held September 21, 1962, before the Subcommittee on Reorganization and International Organizations of the Senate Committee on Government Operations, 87th Cong., 2d sess., an agency coordination study on Federal plans for improvement in the design, management, and use of scientific engineering, and other information systems. 1963. 242 p. il. chart.
Catalog No. Y 4.G 74/6:In 3/2/pt.1 80¢

Just released . . .

Preventive Medicine in World War II, Volume VI
COMMUNICABLE DISEASES—MALARIA
Edited by Ebbe Curtis Hoff, M.D.

Authors: JAMES O. GILLESPIE, M.D., PAUL A. HARPER, M.D., PAUL F. RUSSELL, M.D., M.P.H., Sc. D. (Hon.), and others

53T. Written by men who took an active part in the struggles, this volume presents the story of the difficulties as well as the triumphs in the constant fight against malaria during World War II. Discussed in detail is the monumental task performed by the Medical Department survey teams which were located in many parts of the world. Their reports on the physiography, climate, native population, general health situations, habits, and distribution of the mosquito vectors were the essential factors used by preventive medicine authorities to improve malaria prevention. As with other volumes in the Preventive Medicine series of this medical history, this book should provide excellent reference material for both civilian and military physicians, nurses, and others concerned with preventive medicine. The epidemiology of malaria and the technical application of control measures are basically the same in military and civilian communities. 1963. 642 p. il.
Catalog No. D 104.11:P 92/v.6 Cloth, $6.25

U.S. GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE : 1963—O-695-511

11

BETTER SCHOOLS - ATLANTA

PO Box 4451, Atlanta, Georgia 30302

October 8, 1968

Mr Bill C Wainwright
Mr Ed S Cook
Mrs LeRoy A Woodward
Dr Asa G Yancey
Mr Fred M Shell
Mr T Charles Allen
Mr Robinson W Schilling
Dr Horace E Tate
Mrs Sara P Mitchell

Dear Mr Wainwright:

Enclosed is a comprehensive report on the state of Atlanta Public Schools prepared under the auspices of Better Schools - Atlanta, a citizens' organization committed to better schools for all Atlanta citizens. We find the inequities in the Atlanta Public schools thoroughly alarming and request your prompt action to remedy the problems we have exposed.

Our research has revealed that desegregation, both student and faculty is almost nonexistent. The following figures graphically illustrate the meager progress that has been made:

> If we define as integrated a school with 5% or more students of the opposite race from the majority, then 95.4% of all black elementary school students this spring were in segregated schools.
>
> Only 7.6% of black high school students were in integrated schools.
>
> No less than 97% of Atlanta's black public school teachers are in "black" schools.

Our findings with regard to the equality of education were equally distressing. For example, 44% of black elementary schools (95% or more black pupils) have pupil-teacher ratios of 29 to 1 or above while only 14% of the white schools (95% or more white) are similarly handicapped. To our dismay, this type of situation prevails when black schools are compared with white schools using any number of yardsticks.

By as early as the 7th grade, students in black schools are 3 years behind students in white schools based on 1967-68 median reading scores. How can Negroes compete for the jobs now opening up for them with that kind of an education? How can we reduce the economic gulf between the white and black communities with such an educational differential prevailing.

Do not misunderstand us. The responsibility for the present state of affairs does not rest solely with the Atlanta Public schools. But you have an obligation to play a much more aggressive role in assisting with the solution of these problems. An equitable distribution of bricks and mortar is not enough. Even more important is an equitable distribution of teachers and teacher skills, enlightened administration, textbooks, tailored curricula, and effective integration, ~~etc.~~

It is our intention as concerned citizens both white and black to press for a greatly accelerated effort to improve Atlanta's schools. We hope our exposure of the problem will be sufficient incentive for you to take the corrective action needed. We consider it our responsibility to inform the community of the size of the problem and the need for adequate taxes to insure investment in the kind of school system that Atlanta needs and deserves.

We will be looking for your response to this call for action.

Sincerely,

Robert F Tuve, Chairman
Better Schools - Atlanta

cc John W Letson

B E T T E R  S C H O O L S - A T L A N T A

P. O. Box 4451, Atlanta, Georgia 30302

October 8, 1968

Mr. Bill C. Wainwright
Board of Education
Atlanta Public Schools
224 Central Avenue, S. W.
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

Dear Mr. Wainwright:

Enclosed is a comprehensive report on the state of Atlanta Public Schools prepared under the auspices of Better Schools - Atlanta, a citizens' organization committed to better schools for all Atlanta citizens. We find the inequities in the Atlanta Public Schools thoroughly alarming and request your prompt action to remedy the problems we have exposed.

Our research has revealed that desegregation, both student and faculty, is almost nonexistent. The following figures graphically illustrate the meager progress that has been made:

> If we define as integrated a school with five per cent or more students of the opposite race from the majority, then 95.4 per cent of all black elementary school students this spring were in segregated schools.
>
> Only 7.6 per cent of black high school students were in integrated schools.
>
> No less than 97 per cent of Atlanta's black public school teachers are in "black" schools.

Our findings with regard to the equality of education were equally distressing. For example, 44 per cent of black elementary schools (95 per cent or more black pupils) have pupil-teacher ratios of 29 to one or above, while only 14 per cent of the white schools (95 per cent or more white) are similarly handicapped. To our dismay, this type of situation prevails when black schools are compared with white schools using any number of yardsticks.

By as early as the seventh grade, students in black schools are three years behind students in white schools based on 1967-68 median reading scores. How can Negroes compete for the jobs now opening up for them with that kind of an education? How can we reduce the economic gulf between the white and black communities with such an educational differential prevailing?

Do not misunderstand us. The responsibility for the present state of affairs does not rest solely with the Atlanta Public Schools. But you have an obligation to play a much more aggressive role in assisting with the solution of these problems. An equitable distribution of bricks and mortar is not enough. Even more important is an equitable distribution of teachers and teacher skills, enlightened administration, textbooks, tailored curricula, and effective integration.

It is our intention as concerned citizens, both white and black, to press for a greatly accelerated effort to improve Atlanta's schools. We hope our exposure of the problem will be sufficient incentive for you to take the corrective action needed. We consider it our responsibility to inform the community of the size of the problem and the need for adequate taxes to insure investment in the kind of school system that Atlanta needs and deserves.

We will be looking for your response to this call for action.

Sincerely,

Robert F. Tuve
Chairman
Better Schools - Atlanta

cc: John W. Letson
Encl. - 1.

Same letter also sent to:

Mr. Bill C. Wainwright
Mr. Ed S. Cook
Mrs. LeRoy A. Woodward
Dr. Asa G. Yancey
Mr. Fred M. Shell
Mr. T. Charles Allen
Mr. Robinson W. Schilling
Dr. Horace E. Tate

Better Schools - Atlanta
P. O. Box 4451
Atlanta, Georgia 30302

For Release:
9:30 A. M. Wednesday
October 9, 1968

---

Better Schools - Atlanta, a group of concerned citizens, requests the Atlanta Board of Education and the school administration to eliminate educational disparities in the schools.

We recognize changes are being made. However, the city of Atlanta is advertised as the commercial center of the South, the place where progress is being made; new business comes to the city, new buildings go up daily; increasingly there are more opportunities for culture and entertainment.

Yet, across the nation, school systems are in open conflict because of demands by community, teacher, and student groups. We are aware that the grievances expressed elsewhere in the country exist here in Atlanta. We are aware that various individuals in the community are interested in working together toward solution of these grievances now. Better Schools - Atlanta urges the Board of Education and the school administration to exert the leadership it has been delegated by the community and to work closely with the total community for quality education.

Because of concern for quality education, Better Schools - Atlanta has analyzed existing data from the Atlanta Public School system. This analysis has revealed shocking inequities in the schools. A report has been published summarizing the findings of the study. Copies of the report have been sent to all members of the Atlanta Board of Education, the Superintendent of Schools, and to interested citizens.

The report shows that a total of 92.3 per cent of black elementary school students attend all-black schools. An additional 3.1 per cent are in schools with token integration, and only 4.6 per cent are in integrated schools, i.e., schools with more than five per cent students of the opposite race.

It was found that students in black schools attend larger elementary schools, attend larger first grade classes, attend schools with larger pupil-teacher ratios in succeeding grades, and have fewer textbooks per student. Students in the black schools attend schools with less site area per student, attend classes in buildings of less value per student which contain less valuable furniture and equipment.

Fourth grade pupils in black schools are more than one year behind pupils in white schools based on median reading scores. By the eighth grade, pupils in black schools are four years behind.

Because of the gravity of the educational needs, Better Schools - Atlanta requests the opportunity to be heard at the Monday, October 14, regular meeting of the Atlanta Board of Education.

Listed below are five areas in which Better Schools - Atlanta requests immediate changes:

1. Although the Atlanta Board of Education is under court order to desegregate students and faculty in the Atlanta Public Schools, the court order itself and the results of its implementation have resulted in a school system where the amount of desegregation is proportionately lower than many rural and small town communities. To achieve better education for all Atlanta children, the Board of Education is requested to take the leadership position and make immediate revision of its program for school desegregation, incorporating whatever variety of desegregation techniques are needed to accomplish the task. Meaningful desegregation, not token desegregation, must be achieved by 1970. To show good faith with this request, there should be plans to implement more desegregation at mid-year 1968-69.

2. Atlantans can be proud of a school system willing to participate in some of the educational experiments now undertaken in many school systems across the United States. However, historically there has been disparity between the educational opportunities provided black and white children in this city. To begin meaningful improvement in the education provided all children, there must be prompt elimination of existing inequalities in such areas as class size, teacher-pupil ratios, the number of books available per child in each school, the quality and quantity of furniture and equipment, the size of school recreation and athletic areas, and the availability of special services.

3. Recognizing that the school system has a public information office, created three years ago, Better Schools - Atlanta requests immediate improvement of communication between the system and the wider Atlanta community. The Board of Education can no longer afford to make decisions affecting the community without involving it in planning discussions. Education can no longer be treated as a process to be accomplished with the teacher and children locked up in a box, sheltered from the nitty-gritty of life.

4. Recognizing the Atlanta School System provides in-service programs and cooperates with local colleges and universities to help teachers deal with individual differences, learning styles, cultural backgrounds, and achievement levels, Better Schools - Atlanta requests immediate expansion of these programs. Since the success of any teaching program depends on the teacher's attitude toward his students, an immediate survey must be made of teacher and administrative attitudes about race and poverty. The survey should be administered by an outside agency and used as a basis for planning future in-service programs.
5. Recognizing the Atlanta School System has begun to include new curricula in some areas of instruction, Better Schools - Atlanta requests the inclusion of new curricula at all levels in socio-economic subjects, and increased interaction among student groups concerning the culture of poor black and poor white Americans. The term "disadvantaged" refers to a lack of experience in situations which derive from middle class experiences; poor black and white Americans are not devoid of culture. Middle class teachers and students, black and white, must be provided with an opportunity to learn the culture of Afro-Americans as they have Euro-Americans, and they must also learn the culture of American poverty. Schools have long provided learning units on England, Alaska, and Japan while refraining from honest discussions about America. The school system must provide opportunities for all children at all levels to learn about our multi-cultural American society.

B E T T E R  S C H O O L S  -  A T L A N T A

P. O. Box 4451, Atlanta, Georgia 30302

October 9, 1968

Dear Fellow Atlantan:

Did you know that seventh grade students at over one-half of Atlanta's elementary schools are reading at a median level equivalent to the fourth grade?

Did you know that when Atlanta public schools are grouped by race, black elementary schools average 10 textbooks per student and white schools average 16 textbooks per student?

Did you know that 44 per cent of the black elementary schools (95 per cent or more black pupils) have pupil-teacher ratios of 29 to one or above, while only 14 per cent of the white schools (95 per cent or more white) are similarly handicapped?

Read the enclosed report (reading time: 20 minutes) to find the true condition of Atlanta's public schools based on official public school records. We believe you will be shocked and distressed to find out how poorly Atlanta is preparing its young citizens for adulthood.

A citizens' group has been formed to press for action that will remedy the conditions this report exposes. Will you join us? We need the support of every concerned citizen. Better Schools - Atlanta is committed to better schools for all Atlanta citizens.

Are you interested in the work of this organization? If so, please return the enclosed card. (Extra copies of the report may be obtained by writing Better Schools - Atlanta, Post Office Box 4451, Atlanta, Georgia 30302).

Sincerely,

R F Tuve

Robert F. Tuve
Chairman
Better Schools - Atlanta

Encls. - 2.

B E T T E R  S C H O O L S  -  A T L A N T A

P. O. Box 4451, Atlanta, Georgia 30302

Yes, I am interested in better schools for Atlanta.

Name: _____

(Please print)

Address: _____

Number  Street

_____

City  State  Zip

Telephone: _____

Signature: _____  Date: _____

Memo from MONTEZ ALBRIGHT

Natl Opinion Research Center

San Negro Higher Educ.

ings or current studies

also unpublished or unusual studies

Memo from MONTEZ ALBRIGHT

Negro Higher Educ.

U.S News & World Report
11-25-63

"Negroes in College: What Figures Show"

---

Sat Evening Post 1-19-63

"The Diversity of Integration"
by Carl T. Rowan
(Keep hearted Complainers frustrate the law of the land.)

Memo from MONTEZ ALBRIGHT

Commencement Address by
Hon. Berl I. Bernhard, Staff
Director, U.S. Commission on Civil Rights at Central State College, Wilberforce, Ohio
June 2, 1963

"Equality & 1984"

Memo from MONTEZ ALBRIGHT

Report - 1963 73 p. mimeographed

US Natl Student Assn

347 Chestnut St, Phila 4, Pa.

"Higher Education in the South

Compiled & edited by Dennis

R Yeager

---

The Negro Student at

Integrated Colleges 1963

by Kenneth B. Clark 57 p.

and Lawrence Plotkin

Dept. of Psychology, the City College of the City Univ. of N.Y.

Natl Scholarship Service and Fund for Negro Students

Memo from MONTEZ ALBRIGHT

State Legislature Affecting Higher Edn in the South, 1963

Prepared as a service by the Sou. Reg Edn. Bd, 130 6th St NW Atlanta 13, Ga.

---

Journal of Negro Education Vol. XXXII Fall, 1963, The Relative Progress of the Negro Since 1950, Chapters XIV XXV on Negro education.

Post card

Better Schools - Atlanta:

Yes, I am interested in better schools for Atlanta.

Name: _____
please print

Address: _____
number street

_____
city zip

Telephone: _____

Signature: _____ Date _____

Data Sources for Tables 4a. and 4b.

Population: 1960 U.S. Census Reports

Registration: Alabama - Compilation made by the Birmingham News, June 10, 1962, from various sources. Chilton County not included.

Arkansas - Report of Arkansas State Auditor, 1962

Florida - Report of Secretary of State, April 19, 1962

Georgia - Atlanta Journal, April 16, 1962

Louisiana - New Orleans Times Picayune, May 5, 1962

Mississippi - CRC Report, 1961 (69 of 82 counties)

North Carolina - North Carolina Advisory Committee, 1960

South Carolina - Negro: Report of South Carolina Progressive Democrats, April, 1962; White: Washington Post, July, 1961

Tennessee - CRC Report, 1961 (63 of 95 counties)

Texas - Compiled by Robert S. Calvert, Comptroller of Public Accounts; Racial breakdown estimated statistically by VEP

Virginia - Letter from Levin Nock Davis, Secretary, Virginia State Board of Elections, August 3, 1962

TABLE 4a.

| State | Total Voting-Age Population | % of South-wide Total | No. Non-White VAP | % of South-wide Total | No. Negroes Reg. | % of South-wide Total | No. Negro VAP Not Reg. | % of South-wide Total |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Alabama | 1,924,936 | 8.2 | 509,731 | 10.1 | 68,317 | 5.1 | 441,414 | 11.9 |
| Arkansas | 1,089,358 | 4.0 | 202,593 | 4.0 | 68,970 | 5.1 | 133,623 | 3.6 |
| Florida | 3,207,238 | 14.7 | 495,420 | 9.8 | 182,456 | 13.5 | 312,964 | 8.4 |
| Georgia | 2,549,352 | 11.4 | 656,047 | 13.0 | 175,573 | 13.0 | 480,474 | 13.0 |
| Louisiana | 1,892,402 | 8.2 | 544,997 | 10.8 | 151,663 | 11.3 | 393,334 | 10.6 |
| Mississippi | 1,235,072 | 5.1 | 449,296 | 8.9 | 23,920 | 1.8 | 425,376 | 11.5 |
| North Carolina | 2,700,778 | 11.9 | 586,219 | 11.6 | 210,450 | 15.6 | 375,769 | 10.1 |
| South Carolina | 1,344,466 | 5.9 | 396,848 | 7.8 | 90,901 | 6.7 | 305,947 | 8.3 |
| Tennessee | 2,193,799 | 9.7 | 329,630 | 6.5 | 150,869 | 11.2 | 178,761 | 4.8 |
| Texas* | 2,010,034 | 8.8 | 414,233 | 8.2 | 111,014 | 8.2 | 303,219 | 8.2 |
| Virginia | 2,437,328 | 10.7 | 460,081 | 9.1 | 110,113 | 8.2 | 349,968 | 9.4 |
| | 22,584,763 | | 5,045,095 | | 1,344,519 | | 3,700,849 | |

*All Texas figures include only those 65 counties in East Texas which have more than 15% non-white population.

Statistical Estimate

TABLE 4b.

| State | No. White VAP | % of South-wide Total | No. White Reg. | % of South-wide Total | No. White VAP Not Reg. | % of South-wide Total | % of State NVAP Reg. | % of State WVAP Reg. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Alabama | 1,415,205 | 8.1 | 883,732 | 8.4 | 531,473 | 7.6 | 13.4 | 62.4 |
| Arkansas | 886,765 | 5.9 | 506,799 | 4.8 | 379,966 | 5.4 | 34.0 | 57.1 |
| Florida | 2,711,818 | 15.3 | 1,819,342 | 17.2 | 892,476 | 12.7 | 36.8 | 67.0 |
| Georgia | 1,893,305 | 10.1 | 1,152,707 | 10.9 | 740,598 | 10.6 | 26.7 | 60.8 |
| Louisiana | 1,347,405 | 7.1 | 934,862 | 8.8 | 412,543 | 5.9 | 27.8 | 69.3 |
| Mississippi | 785,776 | 4.1 | 390,000 | 3.6 | 395,776 | 5.6 | 5.3 | 49.6 |
| North Carolina | 2,114,559 | 12.0 | 1,861,330 | 17.6 | 253,229 | 3.6 | 35.8 | 88.0 |
| South Carolina | 947,618 | 5.4 | 480,793 | 4.5 | 466,825 | 6.6 | 22.9 | 50.7 |
| Tennessee | 1,864,169 | 10.6 | 930,198 | 8.8 | 933,971 | 13.3 | 45.7 | 49.8 |
| Texas* | 1,595,801 | 9.0 | 658,293 | 6.2 | 937,508 | 13.4 | 26.7 | 41.2 |
| Virginia | 1,977,247 | 11.2 | 940,115 | 8.9 | 1,037,132 | 14.8 | 24.0 | 47.5 |
| | 17,539,668 | | 10,566,111 | | 6,981,497 | | | |

*All Texas figures include only those 65 counties in East Texas which have more than 15% non-white population.

Statistical Estimate

Southern Regional Council, Inc.
5 Forsyth Street, N. W.
Atlanta 3, Georgia
June 25, 1963

THE CIVIL RIGHTS CRISIS: A SYNOPSIS OF RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

(This is a synopsis of racial protest and reaction in the South from April 1963 through June 24, 1963, prepared by the Research Department of the Southern Regional Council. It is neither a press release nor a detailed analysis of recent events. It is meant to serve only as background information. Additional data or corrections are invited.)

ALABAMA:

Attalla -- April 24 -- William Moore, a Baltimore postman hiking to Jackson on a one-man civil rights crusade, found murdered near here. His bullet-pierced body, still carrying anti-segregation signs, was discovered along U. S. Highway 11.

Alabama-Georgia Border -- May 3-10--Freedom marchers arrested as they entered Alabama to continue ill-fated march of William Moore. Found guilty of breach-of-peace charges in Fort Payne, June 3, fined $200 each and court costs. Their attorneys filed immediate notice of appeal.

Anniston -- May 12--Negro homes and a church fired into by a carload of whites. Former Ku Klux Klan member convicted for shooting into church (May 30), sentenced to 180 days in jail. City commission formed bi-racial committee of 4 Negroes, 5 whites, May 18.

Birmingham -- April 3 - June 21--Weeks of mass Negro demonstrations in which thousands were arrested ended May 10, when a truce was reached between prominent white businessmen and Negro leaders. Truce almost came apart May 11-12, when a riot broke out following 2 bombings of Negro property. Federal troops were alerted, remained near city until May 31. Initial steps taken in June to implement desegregation agreement included dropping of racial barriers in the fitting rooms of major downtown department stores and promotion of some Negro employees. Though unrelated to the agreement, three of City's four public golf courses slated to re-open June 29.

Gadsden -- June 18-21--More than 450 Negroes, many of them children, arrested June 18 for defying an injunction against sit-in demonstrations. Forty-two more arrested June 21. Several downtown churches accepted Negroes for services without incident June 16.

Mobile -- June 1 --Sheraton Hotel announced it will desegregate.

Montgomery -- May 27--Montgomery Advertiser-Journal announced that papers will cease to print Negro editions, incorporate Negro news with white news, effective immediately.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

ARKANSAS:

Fayetteville -- June 17--Local restaurant association began a 60-day desegregation test.

Hot Springs -- April 4--Negroes attempted to integrate local bath house, 4 arrested.

Little Rock --- June 3--Arkansas Supreme Court ruled unconstitutional 4 state laws that NAACP contended had been adopted to suppress its activities. Theatres desegregated the following week.

Pine Bluff -- April-June--1,300 Negroes participated in a march protesting all segregation (April 1). Thirty-nine arrested April 25 in demonstration to integrate local theatre. Four Negroes served at Woolworth's and Walgreen lunch counters May 5. Bi-racial committee formed in early June.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

FLORIDA:

Bradenton -- Plans have been announced to picket stores and theatres.

Cocoa -- Late May - early June--Peaceful picketing of restaurants and hotels. Mayor has been meeting with owners.

Daytona Beach-- June 1-9--At least 7 street demonstrations, also picketing and sit-ins, involving in one instance over 100 persons, at least 12 arrests. Targets are theatres, hotels, recreation facilities and restaurants (beaches and some lunch counters are desegregated). Mayor has formed a bi-racial committee.

Gainesville -- June 2--Attempt of Negroes to buy movie tickets led to gathering of 1000 persons, some violence, 1 shooting, and mayor formed bi-racial committee during the 4-hour disturbance. Picketing of theatres and stores subsequently peaceful, continued.

Melbourne-- No demonstrations. Mayor has named bi-racial committee.

Miami -- May 25 - June 1 -- Peaceful picketing of chain stores for employment. All municipal facilities are desegregated. No demonstrations.

Palmetto -- Plans have been announced to picket stores and theatres.

Orlando -- June 8 -- City government forming a committee to meet demands and avert demonstrations, none to date.

Sarasota -- June 1 -- Picketing stores and theatres, peaceful, continuous to date.

St. Petersburg -- Theatre picketing threatened. No demonstrations. Has bi-racial committee.

Tallahassee -- May 23 - June 8 -- Large scale (75 pickets 1st day) demonstrations began, primarily aimed at theatres, but also chain stores (for employment). By May 28, 29, 30 protest marchers numbering 300 and 400, 500 arrests in 3 days, tear gas used. During the first week of June Court upheld the right to picket, limited number of pickets. Picketing subsequently continuous and with police guard.

Tampa -- Has had a bi-racial committee for some time, most facilities are desegregated, employment demands being met. No demonstrations.

Winter Haven -- June 1-7 -- Swim-ins, hostile white crowds, beaches closed.

* * * * * * * * * * * * *

GEORGIA:

Albany -- May 7 - June 24 --Picketing and boycotting began May 7, with Negro employment the goal and lasted for three consecutive days, then sporadically through May 25, with over 100 arrests. On June 14, after Negro leaders had legally contested the sale and lost, the city sold one pool and tennis court to James Gray for $72,000, kept others closed. Early in day of June 19, 47 Negro ministers issued manifesto asking peaceful negotiation of differences. Late in day of June 19, 20, and 21, gathering to march and demonstrate, at least 140 Negroes were arrested, there was some violence. Negro stores were closed.

GEORGIA (continued)

Atlanta -- April 12 - June 24--After first sit-in attempt April 12, Atlanta had demonstrations - sit-ins, a prayer march (estimated 200 participants), kneel-ins, picketing - on at least 32 days from April 27 to the present, with at least 103 arrests. Demonstrations were usually in small groups, by June 7 drawing some crowds of hostile whites and occasioning one stabbing. Targets were restaurants and cafeterias. Highlights: 2 Negro Metropolitan Opera singers denied restaurant service May 5; Journal and Constitution dropped racial designations from obituaries, want-ads and amusements;and a night club integrated second week of May; students agreed to suspend demonstrations for bond issue vote May 15; Chamber of Commerce made public statement urging desegregation of accommodations May 29; city pools opened integrated June 10; 14 leading motels and hotels announced integrated policy June 20; leading restaurants expected to follow suit week of June 24. Some churches which previously turned away Negroes have admitted them to services. Mayor has met with Negro and white leaders without an official committee. Atlanta has a private, staffed Council on Human Relations.

Augusta -- April 5 -- A group of young people picketed municipal recreation facilities.

Brunswick -- June 20 -- Howard Johnson motel desegregation.

Columbus -- Demonstrations threatened, none to date.

Macon -- April 2 and 3 -- Two rows initiated by whites resulted in one stabbing, two arrests in integrated park. Mayor declined to close park, his mailbox bombed April 6. April 22, 5 Negro girls sat-in at segregated (some are integrated) lunch counter and were arrested. Has a Negro committee which has negotiated with whites with some success in past.

Marietta -- By mid-May reported to have a bi-racial committee. No demonstrations .

Rome -- April 2 -- Sixty-two high school students stood trial (51 of age received sentences) for lunch counter sit-ins of previous week, the first such activity in the northwest area of Georgia. June 12, 13, 14 - 15 students sat-in again.

GEORGIA (Continued)

Savannah -- June 3 - June 24-- Current wave of demonstrations -- marches, picketing, sit-ins, began June 3,continued daily through June 14, when the city announced some restaurants, theatres, and hotels had agreed to desegregate. (On June 4, 3 movies had desegregated for a few hours, then re-segregated after a protest demonstration by whites.) June 13 -- Negro home shot into. When owners reneged demonstrations resumed June 18, 19, 20. Over 1000 arrests in 2½ weeks. Four restaurants have been granted injunctions against demonstrators on their property. Mayor has been meeting with a recognized bi-racial committee formed during the month. June 20 -- Howard Johnson's desegregated.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

KENTUCKY:

Louisville -- April 9---May 16 -- The 11-member Louisville Human Relations Committee submitted to the Board of Alderman on April 9, an ordinance outlawing racial discrimination in public business places. The ordinance provided for fines up to $100 for violations. After three convictions, the City could get an injunction against the violator which could lead to jail sentence for contempt of court. The ordinance was passed on May 16, to go into effect in mid-September.

The new ordinance will include all remaining restaurants, barber shops, pool halls, and any other segregated public facilities. Public schools, parks, swimming pools, hotels, theatres and 268 of 410 restaurants have been desegregated in the past eight years, the restaurants two years ago after mass demonstrations and a Negro shopping boycott.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

LOUISIANA:

Baton Rouge -- May 28 - June 4 -- City created a bi-racial committee, the first such group to be appointed in Louisiana (May 28). Committee met for first time May 31, following a march by 21 Negroes around the state capitol (May 29), and a sit-in (May 30). Negroes agreed to a 30-day truce June 4.

New Orleans -- April 3 -- Louisiana State University -- medical school cafeteria closed following a walkout by Negro employees after a Negro pre-med student was refused service.

April 26 -- State Attorney General Jack F. P. Gremillion declared there is no law in Louisiana which prohibits Negroes from occupying hotels or motels. But no hotels or motels accept Negro guests at the present time, with the exception of the airport hotel at New Orleans airport.

Shreveport -- June 1 -- Negro demonstration held.

Winnsboro -- May 30 -- Beaten by whites, a Negro teacher resigned his post.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

MISSISSIPPI:

Clarksdale -- May 4--June 22-- State NAACP President Aaron Henry's drugstore was damaged by an explosion which ripped a hole in the roof; no one injured (May 4). A similar firebomb was tossed into Henry's home April 12 during a visit there by Negro Congressman Charles L. Diggs (D., Mich.). Negroes threatened to broaden their boycott of downtown merchants May 26, unless bi-racial talks were held. Henry announced the launching of a series of spot picketing and demonstrations in the city (June 22).

Greenville -- May 25 --City Council voted unanimously to consider the possibility of forming a bi-racial commission.

Jackson -- May 27 - June 24 -- After talks between 13 Negro leaders and Mayor Allen C. Thompson broke off, a series of demonstrations began May 28, resulting in more than 600 arrests by June 6, when a state judge issued an injunction barring further demonstrations. Same day two Negro men integrated the municipal golf course, teeing off without incident. Local NAACP leader Medgar W. Evers murdered June 12. Following his funeral services June 15, Negroes clashed with police in downtown area; Justice Department Attorney John Doar helped bring demonstration under control. Next day four young Negro women were admitted to a white Protestant church without incident. Mayor Thompson announced June 18 that city will hire 6 Negro policemen, Negro school-crossing guards, and seven Negro sanitation workers. A 42-year old fertilizer salesman, Bryan de la Beckwith of Greenwood, was charged with the murder

MISSISSIPPI (Continued)

Jackson -- of Medgar Evers June 23. Jackson District Attorney William L. Waller said June 24 that he will seek the death penalty for Beckwith.

Lexington -- May 8 -- A Negro who attempted to register to vote reported that white men threw "Molotov cocktails" into his home about 3 a. m.; no one was injured.

McComb -- May 15 -- Injunction against CORE forbidding it to back sit-in demonstrations at local bus station struck down by Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

Winona -- June 9--Two Negro women and a 15-year old girl beaten by police at the local jail after trying to use the white facilities at town's bus station. The women, who were released a few days later, have been active in voter registration work in Mississippi.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

NORTH CAROLINA:

Asheville -- Mayor's bi-racial committee of 12 formed this spring. Five lunch counters and 3 drive-in restaurants desegregated in late June.

Charlotte -- April 19-May 30--Proprietors of segregated hotels, restaurants, and theatres warned of mass picketing unless they agreed to desegregate (April 19). Chamber of Commerce urged immediate desegregation of all public facilities May 23, and eight major hotels and motels dropped all racial barriers four days later. A permanent bi-racial committee was formed by the mayor in May.

Chapel Hill -- May 24-25--Chamber of Commerce issued statement opposing discrimination May 24. Two hundred and fifty Negroes demonstrated next day.

Concord -- June 7--Bi-racial committee appointed. Seven drug stores and 9 restaurants desegregated.

Durham -- May 18-June 5--1,400 were arrested during demonstrations May 18-20. Temporary truce agreed upon May 21, with the appointment of a bi-racial committee by the mayor. City Council desegregated swimming pools May 30. Twelve motels and hotels, 55 restaurants desegregated June 4. Following day mayor's bi-racial committee announced that 31 retail businesses and several industrial concerns would institute or continue practice of hiring and promoting without regard to race. Public accommodations ordinance currently being considered. Charges against some 1,400 students arrested were dropped.

N. C. (Continued)

Enfield -- May 30--Local theatre picketed.

Edenton -- April 5--Three Negroes arrested for picketing a theatre in March were acquitted.

Fayetteville -- May 14-June 19--Police dispersed mobs of Negroes and whites with tear gas May 14. Demonstrations lasting over a week began May 19, with some 1,500 persons participating in daily marches. Mayor's coordinating committee recommended immediate desegregation of restaurants and theatres May 27. Demonstrations resumed June 11, continued several days. Nine-man bi-racial committee appointed by mayor following week. 12 Motels and hotels desegregated June 19.

Goldsboro -- Four parades of demonstrators staged during week of May 30.

Greensboro -- May 10-June 23--Mass demonstrations began May 10, resulted in the arrest of some 440 persons by May 15. 420 arrested May 19 for sitting-in at a Howard Johnson parking lot. Demonstrations continued through May 24, with approximately 1,500 arrested. Mayor appointed a 16-member committee on Human Relations May 22 and two days later city's governing body unofficially endorsed an 11-point resolution urging integration of businesses. Truce arranged May 25, but demonstrations resumed June 2. Official end of truce came June 6, was marked by another demonstration in which 278 were arrested. S&W cafeteria desegregated during week ending June 22. Earlier four indoor theatres had tentatively agreed to desegregate.

Hickory -- June 6--Mayor formed a bi-racial Community Relations Council.

High Point -- May 28-30--Mass demonstrations began May 28, mayor's bi-racial (11-member) committee appointed two days later.

Lenior -- May 24--Mayor appointed five-member bi-racial committee.

Lexington -- June 3-6--Mayor Sink appointed bi-racial committee of 10 members. June 3, 15 or more Negroes requested and received service at drug store lunch counter June 5; but they were turned away at theatre and bowling alley. Demonstration by approximately 50 Negro students met by anti-desegregation group of 500 whites; one person killed and seven arrested June 6. The First Methodist Church recently admitted Negro worshippers.

Lumberton -- June 6--Mayor Hedgpeth appointed tri-racial committee of Indian, Negro and white members.

Monroe -- Mayor's bi-racial committee of 12 members formed sometime in May.

Mount Airy -- May 30--3 Negroes served in a drug store.

Oxford -- June 16--Truce declared after previous demonstrations.

Raleigh -- April 4-June 5--Demonstrations began April 4, continued for over a month. By May 10 some 250 had been arrested. Following day 1,000 demonstrated; May 14, 750 marched, were mocked and cursed by about 200 whites. 347 were arrested, with 15 charged with assault and one for carrying a concealed weapon. A 15-member bi-racial committee was appointed by the Mayor May 14, and the Raleigh Merchants Bureau adopted a resolution same day urging its 400 members to serve all persons. Demonstrations continued through June 3. Some 76 food and amusement concerns desegregated June 5.

Roxboro -- June 23--Mayor appointed a 20-member bi-racial committee.

Statesville -- June 9--Some restaurants and cafeterias voluntarily desegregated.

Thomasville -- May 10-June 1--Spontaneous sit-in by a group of teen-age Negroes at a restaurant May 10 followed by planned demonstrations beginning May 24. Two day later Negroes called off demonstrations until June 1, but 300 demonstrated May 30. City-owned pools opened on an integrated basis June 1; no incidents.

Wadesboro -- June 5--Windows of 2 business establishments, including one restaurant which had recently desegregated, were shot out in a pre-dawn shooting spree; no injuries.

Wilmington -- June 7--Some 75 high school students staged a protest demonstration at cafeterias and theatres; a bi-racial commiteee is studying the problem.

Winston-Salem -- May 21-June 5--About 25 students picketed theatre May 21, and mayor appointed an 18-member bi-racial committee. Demonstrations continued through May 27. Fourteen of 15 major restaurants, many smaller restaurants, and all hotels and motels desegregated June 5.

OKLAHOMA:

Oklahoma City -- May 31-June 4--Following sit-ins May 31 and June 1, Bishop's, a local restaurant, agreed to desegregate, was joined June 3 by city's largest downtown cafeteria. Three city hotels desegregated June 2, were joined by one other and 20 suburban motels June 3. City council approved appointment of a 15-member Community Relations Commission June 4. Two days later the board of managers of the Central YMCA recommended that Negroes be allowed to rent rooms at the downtown YMCA.

SOUTH CAROLINA:

Charleston -- During the week of June 17-22, Kress, Woolworth and W.T. Grant department stores desegregated their facilities, two weeks after marches, sit-ins, stand-ins, and picketing. No official bi-racial committee has been formed as yet. Local groups have announced that pressure for additional desegregation will continue.

Columbia -- June 7--City Council began meeting with Negro leaders.

Greenville -- On May 27 city officials met with Negro leaders, and on May 28, in less than 15 minutes, City Council repealed segregation laws but passed a "trespass" city ordinance making it unlawful not to leave a business after being asked to do so by the owner. The new law does not mention race.

On June 3, 11 lunch counters were voluntary desegregated, two weeks after the Supreme Court made a Greenville case the key to a series of sit-in rulings by overturning the trespass convictions of ten Negroes arrested at a lunch counter in 1960. Small groups of Negroes ate in the 11 places without incident.

Greenville is the second South Carolina city to desegregate lunch counters, Columbia having opened some lunch counters on a non-racial basis last August. The Greenville stores affected were: S.H. Kress, W.T. Grant, H.L.Green, Walgreen Drugs, Eckerds Drugs, and Belk-Simpson; in shopping centers, the K-Mart discount store and a Woolworth and Walgreen store. Desegregation was effected by a committee of variety and drug stores, and restaurant operators.

Rock Hill -- June 1--16 Negroes demonstrated in front of drive-in restaurant.

Spartenburg -- June 1--Unofficial meetings were held to consider desegregation. On June 5 most downtown lunch counters and restaurants desegregated and Negroes ate in several places without incident.

Sumter -- A suit to integrate the Carnegie Public Library (class action) was filed June 5 in U.S. District Court by three Negro plaintiffs.

TENNESSEE:

Chattanooga -- June 7--Following a series of demonstrations by Negroes at 4 local restaurants and 1 theatre, mayor appointed a bi-racial committee, and Negro leaders agreed to a truce.

Clarksville -- May 28-June 7--300 Negroes sought service in a drive-in restaurant, were turned away (May 28). All public parks and pools desegregated June 7.

Knoxville -- May 9-28--Demonstrations began May 9, resulted in arrest of about 100 by May 11. Three hospitals agreed to desegregate May 19, and mayor appointed a bi-racial commission same day. Two thousand citizens signed a petition May 22, to desegregate all public facilities; petition sponsored by Chamber of Commerce. Four leading hotels and 2 motels voted to desegregate May 28.

Maryville -- June 24--A mountain training camp sponsored by CORE was found burned to the ground; no injuries reported. Camp had been raided by sheriff's deputies previous week; 28 whites and Negroes arrested.

Memphis -- May 1-June 10--Normad corporation announced May 1, that it will build an integrated motel. All first-class hotels and motels desegregated May 20, followed by desegregation of all public recreational facilities May 30, except swimming pools (as a result of Supreme Court decision May 27). Voter registration drive began June 10. Has permanent bi-racial committee.

Nashville -- May 8-June 5--Following demonstrations May 8 and 9, a clash between Negro students and white hecklers May 10, another demonstration May 13 in which two persons were hospitalized, a permanent bi-racial Metropolitan Human Relations Council was appointed by the mayor May 16 "to recommend actions by the business community." City parks and wading pools opened to all on June 5. Earlier (May 13), seven motels and hotels, eight restaurants desegregated.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * *

TEXAS:

Dallas -- June 2--South's first integrated hospital opened here, will have completely integrated facilities including an open staff of Negro and white physicians. Following day insurance executive George L. Allen became the first Negro named to an important City Hall appointive body, the City Planning Commission.

TEXAS (Continued)

Denton -- April 6-Fifty Negro and white students from North Texas State University, picketed in the downtown area, carrying banners calling for the integration of local theatres.

Houston -- June 10--All city pools and municipal facilities desegregated.

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

VIRGINIA:

Alexandria -- May-June--City Council banned discrimination in all municipal public facilities May 27, and instituted a merit hiring and promotion program for all city employees regardless of race. Movie theatres and some bowling alleys quietly desegregated June 14.

Arlington -- April-June--County Board established in Arlington County Human Relations Council in April. Arlington City Council eliminated all mention of race on job questionnaires June 3.

Charlottesville--May 25-30--Sit-ins began at La Paree restaurant May 25, but the main target became Buddy's restaurant near the University of Virginia, with groups of about 50 Negroes and whites demonstrating through May 30, when a local Negro leader was beaten up by two white men and hospitalized. The "stand-ins" were temporarily called off as a result of this incident. City's first Negro policeman was appointed in the midst of the demonstrations in which 5 persons were arrested. Efforts are being made to form a bi-racial committee, but have been unsuccessful this far.

Danville -- May 31-June 22--Fifty-sixty Negro youths started demonstrations to force hiring of a Negro policeman. Demonstrations continued through June 10, when 50 Negroes were arrested and a rally broken up by police using firehoses;about 45 persons were injured. City passed ordinance June 14 limiting number allowed to participate in demonstrations to 6; the following day 35 more Negroes were arrested. Ten leaders in the demonstrations, including 3 whites, were indicted by a special grand jury June 21 on a criminal charge of inciting to riot. Police seized three other leaders who had taken sanctuary in a local church June 22. Thus far, about 150 persons have been arrested. June 19, 29 demonstrators broke three-day truce by marching downtown; all were arrested. Mayor Stinson announced 10 Negroes had been assigned to white schools. Motel operators met to discuss desegregation.

VIRGINIA (Continued)

Farmville -- May 18--Small sit-ins staged, with no violence and no arrests.

Hampton -- April-May--A petition of 1000 signatures was sent to mayor April 1 charging "racial discrimination" and "police intimidation" after Hampton Institute students,10 of whom were arrested, attempted sit-ins. An 11-member bi-racial Council on Community Relatinns was formed May 18.

Lawrenceville -- May 29-30--Students quietly picketed downtown lunch counters.

Lynchburg -- May-June--Patterson's drug store announced May 22, following prolonged sit-in demonstrations,that it would serve anyone. Following week 10 restaurants voluntarily desegregated. In early June, 2 movie theatres and 2 bowling alleys also voluntarily desegregated.

Martinsville -- June 7--Martinsville - Henry County Christian Civic League called on local business leaders to voluntarily desegregate public facilities and employment, and requested City Council appoint official bi-racial committee.

Norfolk-Portsmouth-- Late May--Major movie theatres agreed May 25 to lower all racial bars after private meetings between white businessmen and Negro leaders. Norfolk City Council asked mayor to form a bi-racial committee May 28.

Petersburg -- April 25--Three Virginia State College students fined $25.00 and given 30-day suspended sentences for picketing.

Richmond -- May 28-June 18--Parker Field, local athletic stadium quietly admitted 9 Negroes to previously all-white section. All downtown movie theatres announced June 15, that they will desegregate by July 10. Three days later 35 of city's better restaurants agreed to serve all customers without regard to race. Another 25 restaurants had previously desegregated.

STATE ACTION

FLORIDA:

During the 1960 demonstrations there - Governor Fowler appointed the Statewide Fowler Commission on Race Relations. The Commission was not continued by Governor Bryant.

KENTUCKY:

Commission on Human Rights established under a General Assembly Act of March, 1960. Eleven members are appointed by the governors. Governor Combs stated June 4 he would "ask the General Assembly to pass a general civil rights act."

NORTH CAROLINA:

June 18--Governor Sanford moved on several fronts to head off North Carolina's growing racial crisis. In a statewide radio and television address (June 18) the Governor spoke sympathetically of Negro "requests and aspirations." He also asked for a halt to Negro demonstrations "to help avoid strife, ill will, danger to life and property, and damage to our state."

He announced he had called Negro leaders to the Capital for a meeting on June 25, "to place before the public in an orderly manner their requests and aspirations." He appointed retired Major General Capus M. Waynick, former commander of the N. C. National Guard and experienced in negotiating racial conflicts, to represent his office in continuing negotiations with Negro leaders. Two immediate targets are sought by the Governor's negotiators: statewide application of the "Durham Plan"; daily progress reports to local Negro leaders by city officials.

Also under intense negotiation: employing more Negroes in state jobs. In January of this year the Governor began naming of 24 prominent Negro and white citizens to the statewide North Carolina Good Neighbor Council.

VIRGINIA:

May 29--Governor Harrison rejected a proposal for a statewide bi-racial commission.

SUMMARY

CITIES WHERE SOME DESEGREGATION HAS OCCURRED SINCE APRIL 3, 1963

ALABAMA:

Birmingham
Gadsden
Mobile

ARKANSAS:

Fayetteville
Little Rock
Pine Bluff

FLORIDA:

Miami

GEORGIA:

Atlanta Brunswick
Savannah

MISSISSIPPI:

Jackson

NORTH CAROLINA:

Asheville
Charlotte
Concord
Durham
Fayetteville
Greensboro
Lexington
Mount Airy
Raleigh
Statesville
Thomasville
Wadesboro
Winston Salem

OKLAHOMA:

Oklahoma City

SOUTH CAROLINA:

Charleston
Greenville
Spartenburg

TENNESSEE:

Clarksville
Knoxville
Memphis
Nashville

TEXAS:

Austin
Houston

VIRGINIA:

Alexandria
Arlington
Falls Church
Lynchburg
Norfolk
Portsmouth
Richmond

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

ESTIMATED NUMBER OF ARRESTS IN 11 SOUTHERN STATES SINCE APRIL 3,1963

10,420

(The Southern Regional Council estimated the number of arrests during the February 1, 1960 through September 1, 1961 period of demonstrations in southern and border states at 3,600.)

NUMBER OF FATALITIES RELATED TO DEMONSTRATIONS SINCE APRIL 3, 1963

3

CITIES WHERE SOME DEMONSTRATIONS HAVE OCCURRED SINCE APRIL 3, 1963

ALABAMA:

Birmingham
Gadsden

ARKANSAS:

Hot Springs
Pine Bluff

FLORIDA:

Cocoa
Daytona-Beach
Gainesville
Lakeland
Miami
Sarasota
Tallahassee
Winter Haven

GEORGIA:

Albany
Atlanta
Augusta
Macon
Rome
Savannah

LOUISIANA:

Baton Rouge
Shreveport

MISSISSIPPI:

Biloxi
Clarksdale
Greenwood
Jackson

NORTH CAROLINA:

Charlotte
Chapel Hill
Durham
Enfield
Fayetteville
Goldsboro
Greensboro
High Point
Lexington
Oxford
Raleigh
Thomasville
Wilmington
Winston-Salem

OKLAHOMA:

Oklahoma City

SOUTH CAROLINA:

Charleston
Rock Hill

TENNESSEE:

Chattanooga
Clarksville
Knoxville
Nashville

TEXAS:

Denton

VIRGINIA:

Charlottesville
Danville
Farmville
Hampton Lawrenceville
Lynchburg
Petersburg

* * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * * *

ADDENDA

FLORIDA:

Lakeland -- June 6 -- movie theatre picketing.

Miami -- June -- leading hotels desegregated, (comparable to Miami Beach where they have been desegregated for some time).

KENTUCKY:

Covington ) Henderson ) Hopkinsville )--- Lexington )--- Louisville ) Paducah )

Local commissions on civil rights sponsored in these cities by the statewide commission.

MISSISSIPPI:

Biloxi -- June 23 -- attempted wade-in.

Greenwood -- June 24 -- six Negro girls attempted sit-in (the city's first) at a drugstore.

NORTH CAROLINA:

Sanford -- June -- bi-racial committee formed.

TENNESSEE:

Athens -- ) both cities have official bi-racial commissions Oak Ridge -- ) and have had no demonstrations.

TEXAS:

Austin -- June 10 -- 38 restaurants (estimated 70% of total) desegregated.

VIRGINIA:

Arlington -- June 17 -- 4 movie theatres desegregated.

Danville -- June 13 -- moderate business leaders from Chamber of Commerce and Retail Merchants Association outvoted Mayor Stinson and formed new bi-racial committee to replace collapsed white City Council Committee. On the same date Negroes picketed a local mill for the first time, and pickets subsequently applied for jobs.

Falls Church --June 17 -- a movie theatre desegregated.

Front Royal )
Harrisonburg )---- Mid-April--Howard Johnson's in these cities desegregated.
Waynesboro )

Newport News -- June -- a bi-racial committee in operation.

Roanoke -- June -- a race relations sub-committee of the Citizens Committee for Greater Roanoke in operation. There have been no demonstrations.

Woodstock -- June -- has a bi-racial commission of 8.

R + R Rel.

The Bourbon South And Its Curses on the American Negro

By Dr. D. D. FOOTE, D. D. S.
3902 State St., Chicago

After years of oppression, Jim-crowism, (the white man's stamp of inferiority) mob-violence and other forms of lawlessness, many Negroes South had practically conceeded this to be a white man's country and that they should be thankful for being permitted to live there.

In the state of Mississippi, the Negro has made an unconditional surrender of all rights of citizenship. He has given up suffrage, liberty, in many instances, his women and in fact, everything but Jesus.

Since this is generally true thru-out the entire south it was quite natural that the following expression, at the beginning of the world's war, should escape from an old colored man's lips. "Dey say dat dis is a white man's country and now since dis here war done broke out I don't keer if tis. Since he is fust in everything I wants to see him fust in battle. I am perfectly willing to remain in the rear and guard ole Missus an the chillens."

War time is no time for argument and again the "cracker" had to change his slogan and admit that this was the black man's country as well as the white man's. From the pulpit and theatres they were impressed with the fact and it was rather risky for a Negro to say that this was not his country. As I listened to one of the speakers, Ex Mayor Griffith I could scarcely refrain from exclaiming, good Lord! do you mean it? I afterwards found out that it was just a salve for Rheumatism. For the duration of the war the Negroes were acknowledged cropped wing citizens of the United States.

In order to raise the quota for the City of Vicksburg during the Liberty Loan drives, the Negroes were told that great changes were going to come after the war. Old things would pass away and other rot that it is needless to mention. Hints were made, but nothing promised that would change the present status of the Negro. At this time I raised a feeble cry and began a propaganda for Democracy at Home. The right of suffrage, equality before the law, the abolition of Jim-crowism and Southern concubinage. The result was, I was branded as a disloyalist, charged with making seditious remarks, blocking the government in the sale of war stamps and Liberty Bonds, last but not least, an educated Negro and therefore a bad Negro. For this "awful" crime I was banished from "Bam" for the remainder of my natural life. Can you beat it? I might add here that I have borne up well over the harsh sentence. Gained about ten lbs. in weight and added two gary hairs from worry.

The south is so strong with her lies that secret service men were on my trail here in Chicago, having been informed by the "red necks" that I was disloyal. Altho for thirty eight years "behind the sun" I have kept aglow a spark of patriotism that Jim-crowism, Disfranchisement, Segregation and Lynching failed to extinguish. With the "cracker's" heel upon my neck I would feebly say that "this is my own, my native land." I know no other, next to the American Indian I am an original American.

Now that the war is over and boys are returning victoriously from Eastern battlefields, having traveled over 3000 miles to fight for a principle denied them at home, what is the government going to do towards righting the wrongs of an oppressed race? A race in which there are no Benedict Arnolds, no I. W. W's., bomb-throwers or labor[redacted]s. A race of 12,000,000 people, the peasantry and industrial back-bone of the South. A race 100 per cent American. Continue to fiddle while Negroes burn? Continue to learn on the crutches of "State rights"? Let us earnestly hope not.

What is the obstinate and backward South going to say concerning a "square deal" for the Negro? Judging from past history she will not yield an inch from traditions handed down from slavery.

"Wise men sometimes change, fools never". The white South will not change unless pressure is made on her heart, stomach or pocket-book. General Grant obtained results by making pressure on their stomach. We must make pressure on their pocket-book. "God helps those who help themselves". The change must be made by the Negro. He must migrate, that is, "get up and git," get out of the rain and seek some sunshine." He must continue to scatter North, East and West. There is work for the workers, nothing for "shirkers". Leave the plantations, let them grow up in weeds and some sort of a change will take place in the Land of Bondage.

Nothing is to be gained by "watchful waiting" or writing "peace notes" to Southern newspapers The Negroes North and South together with their white friends should keep up a constant agitation demanding the enforcement of the 13th, 14th and 15th amendment.

We have proven to the world that we are Loyal American Citizens and as such are entitled to every right guaranteed by the constitution of the United States.

Let it not be said by this great government that we FIRST in war, LAST in peace and LAST in the hearts of our countrymen.

D. D. FOOTE

2 | 24 | 19

The New York Times Magazine

April [illegible] 1960 SECTION 6

A SOUTHERN VIEW OF THE SOUTH

A liberal Southerner sees the racial turmoil as part of revolutionary, forward-moving changes — changes that must be better explained to foreign critics.

by HAROLD C. FLEMING

The other side of the picture—Negroes and whites work side by side. The scene is a television antenna plant in Tuscaloosa, Ala.

ATLANTA.

THE turbulence accompanying Negro student demonstrations has thrust the South, once again, into the glare of publicity. Not since the tension in Little Rock subsided has the United States faced as great a danger of international scandal over the region's racial problems.

The stolid young faces of the Negro demonstrators, the grimaces of white rowdies, and the mouthings of white-supremacist politicians are made to order for Communist propagandists. Not that they need strain at the task; the normal functioning of the democratic press will do most of the work.

Coincidentally, President Eisenhower has just created a committee of leading Americans to survey our overseas information programs and policies. It may be hoped that they will concern themselves to some degree with the effectiveness of American efforts to counter exploitation of the periodic eruptions in the South. A fair number of Southerners have had some opportunity of their own to make such a judgment. For the years since the Supreme Court's school decision of 1954 have brought a steady flow of overseas visitors to the South. A turban in Atlanta, a fez in Montgomery or a sari in New Orleans—to say nothing of a British or German accent—is no longer the rarity it once was.

WHAT do these foreign visitors volunteer about our racial problems? Very little, indeed. But, more often than not, behind a courteous and noncommittal demeanor lies a well-developed set of preconceptions. Visitors from the emergent young nations of Asia and Africa are especially likely to harbor strongly negative views. To most of them, Southern racial incidents are atrocities of an undemocratic and unchanging society. Here, to their mind, is the archenemy colonialism in American dress and on the ascendancy.

As one young Nigerian expressed it, "How do your people expect to win our friendship when they exalt the very evils we have been fighting against?"

For the Negro or liberal white Southerner—the only ones likely to be asked such a question—a persuasive answer comes hard. It takes more time and interpretation than is afforded by an hour's conversation, or even a two-day stopover, to remold a sharply defined image of a whole region. The process has to start earlier, and continue later.

Admittedly the only satisfactory way to answer criticisms of our racial practices is to eliminate discrimination and segregation. Yet even the most optimistic prophets calculate the time this will require in years rather than in days or months. Let us, by all means, redouble our efforts. Meanwhile, more concern for the image we project to the rest of the world is imperative.

The violence, injustices and political excesses that have fouled the wake of the Supreme Court's desegregation rulings cannot be denied or suppressed. To try to do this will only earn us the distrust and contempt of those whose goodwill we seek. But we can honestly present a more positive picture of the South; if we are accurate, we will do so.

THE disturbances of the past few years are symptomatic not of regression, but of forward movement, bitterly contested but inexorable. The South's troubles are not caused by a resurgence of an old order; they are the results of an old order's last desperate rally against new forces it can neither understand nor control. It is a disheartening fact that as the pressures for change mount in the Deep South, more severe reactions may be expected. But these, too, will represent the backlash of a mortally strick- en system of inequality, not a rebirth of oppression.

ON THE EDUCATION FRONT—In Georgia a state commission is inviting both Negroes and whites to give their views on school integration. Above, a Negro leader in Atlanta is heard by the commission.

A middle-aged Southerner can remember a time when race relations stagnated peacefully, at least on the surface. There was occasional violence, to be sure, but it was mainly the ritual brutality of lynching, so common that it caused little public outcry. Segregation in its multitudinous forms was virtually unchallenged. Even the grossest inequalities —in schools and teachers' salaries, in trains and buses, in sanitation and medical care—were accepted by all but a few as part of the natural order.

AS for the Negro's right to cast a meaningful ballot, to attend a high school or university, to swim in a municipal pool, in many areas there was no question of inequality—such opportunities for Negroes simply didn't exist. There were occasional gains within the rigidly separate framework, but these were so slight and scattered as to be almost imperceptible.

Many Southerners, scarcely aware of the cruel injustice of those years, look back on them as "the good old days" of race relations. Yet even they, hurled suddenly backward in time, would be shocked at the price in human suffering and denial that was paid for interracial peace.

During the last twenty years, a high price of another kind has been exacted of Southerners, white and Negro. Homes schools and churches have been bombed by small bands of hate-filled marauders. Mobs have rioted in the streets of Clinton and Tuscaloosa and Little Rock. Negro children have walked the gantlet of jeering adults and suffered abuses from bullying classmates. A few Negroes have died at the hands of the rabble who interpreted the inflammatory words of their betters as license to kill.

THIS is far from a complete tally; nor has it yet ceased to mount. But at least it is a price paid for something worth having—the elimination of injustice systematically practiced against a large segment of Americans. As a result, in Little Rock and elsewhere, countless children still unborn will get a better and more democratic education; some children already are. A mob drove Autherine Lucy out of the University of Alabama, but the same general effort peacefully opened the doors of more than 200 colleges and universities to Negroes.

Americans a hundred years hence may well look back on the race relations changes of our day as a major social revolution. While many may wonder what all the fuss was about, the more thoughtful will marvel that it was accomplished as rapidly and peacefully as it was. In any case, without minimizing the harsh costs of these changes, we can appreciate the value of what is being won by and for Americans.

It should not be assumed that the new aspirations and rising status of the Negro are the sole cause of the traditional South's malaise. The region is also shaken by the chills and fever of profound economic change, of huge population shifts, of big-city growth and rural decay.

Within a few short years the South has experienced an industrial revolution that was spread over generations in the rest of the country. In the decade following World War II, the South added 4,000 new manufacturing plants. A third of this new industrial growth was accounted for by only thirty - seven metropolitan areas; the lesser cities showed similar gains. By 1955 the average per capita income of Southerners had climbed to 257 per cent of its 1929 level, as compared with 141 per cent for the rest of the nation.

Population changes have been equally spectacular. During the Forties, the number of Southerners living in cities swelled by 39 per cent, as against only 15.4 per cent elsewhere in the country. At least four million native Southerners, more than half of them Negroes, have moved out of the region entirely. A smaller but sizable group of Northerners and Westerners have moved in with the new industry.

AS these trends continue, the South is being abruptly transformed from a rural agricultural society to an urban, industrial one. But factories can be built and people shifted about far more speedily than attitudes and customs can be changed. Old roots have been torn up and new ones not yet put down. Outworn patterns of decision-making and political power have still to be reshaped to drastically changing circumstances. The central cities are choked with rural newcomers, under-educated, unskilled, and uninitiated in urban ways.

It is no wonder that widespread feelings of insecurity and anxiety lie close to the surface. Even the stabler elements of the society are uneasy in the face of rapid changes whose magnitude and significance they can only dimly perceive.

Racial antagonism is a ready outlet for the fears and frustrations bred by economic and social upheaval. The old isolation has broken down, leaving the South unprotected against the influx of people and ideas alien to its once impervious way of life. Seeking to hold on to the familiar, to a sense of continuing identity, many a white Southerner has rallied to the call for solidarity on the segregation issue. But to even the most recalcitrant it daily becomes clearer that this cause, too, will be lost. The racial patterns of the South cannot remain fixed and immutable while all else is in flux.

THESE are the realities of the Southern revolution—and he who tries to find the meaning of racial discord apart from them is on a fool's errand.

The dark-skinned peoples of Asia and Africa are peculiarly well-equipped to understand the conflict of old and new that disturbs the peace of the South. For, though different in detail, in essence it is not unlike the revolutionary ferment they know in their own countries. The upthrust of a people long denied, the fearful and sometimes cruel resistance of the privileged group, the clash of new technology and ancient custom—in one form or another, these are the common realities of our time, in southeast Asia and southeast United States alike.

One need only consider the persistence of caste and religious intolerance in India, tribalism in Nigeria, internecine strife in Indonesia, ethnic and language barriers in Malaya, revolt in Algeria, unrest in the Belgian Congo — and everywhere the stumbling blocks of ignorance and superstition, poverty and disease, inexperience and apathy. The path of progress, there no less than here, is clogged with this detritus of the past.

The failure to see the South's difficulties in these terms, a failure shared with foreign observers by many Americans, betrays a lack of historical perspective.

The South is perpetually being rediscovered in times of crisis by reporters and pundits and moralists. But in the obscure intervals between these moments, the flow of history continues. The outbreaks in Little Rock, Clinton or Tuscaloosa must be viewed against a backdrop, as part of a drama of sweeping transition rather than as self-contained incidents.

In Atlanta not long ago, a sensitive and well-informed visitor from India addressed himself to this problem.

"In my country," he said "we try to conceal the difficulties we face in eradicating caste. I regret this. But we are not the self-appointed leader of the free world, like the United States. My people measure your anti-Negro acts against the high democratic standards you yourselves profess. At the height of the Little Rock disorder, the American information bulletins I read made almost no mention of it; instead, they talked of the exceptional American Negroes who have won fame or acceptance in spite of discrimination. So we were left to the simplification and sensationalism of the press."

PERHAPS the obstacles to creating abroad a more mature understanding of the South are insuperable. But it might be worth trying bold analysis, rather than silence or embarrassed mutterings, when our domestic revolution spills over into violence. After all, most of the uncommitted peoples of the world also know what it is to live through a revolution.

SEPARATION—Police, one on horseback, hold back a crowd near a Negro meeting in Montgomery, Ala.

INTEGRATION—A missile part is subjected to a shock test by workers in a plant in Winston-Salem, N. C.

HAROLD C. FLEMING is executive director of the Southern Regional Council, an organization in Atlanta that has been working to improve race relations in the South since 1919.

Research

YOU SAW IT IN SEVENTEEN — OCTOBER, 1961

Race + Race Relations

HERB BREUER

teen-agers talk about RACE, RELIGION and PREJUDICE

The Panel of Americans is exactly that: a panel of five young Americans—three of them white (a Protestant, a Roman Catholic, and a Jew) one a Negro and one a member of an ethnic group whose views are either little known, particularly timely, or both—for example, a Puerto Rican now living in New York. There are many Panels of Americans in the United States today. Most are university-sponsored and each has the same objective: to bring together people of varying racial, religious and cultural

EUNICE SANTANA is twenty years old, a junior majoring in English at City College of New York. Eunice was born in Vega Alta, Puerto Rico, but she has lived in New York since 1950. She plans to become an English teacher.

LYLE GUTTU is twenty-four, a graduate of Harvard University, where he majored in history. Lyle was raised in Thief River Falls, Minnesota; he is now a resident of Manhattan, attending Union Theological Seminary. He wants to be either a minister or a teacher. Lyle was the Protestant member of the Panel.

GERARD (GERRY) WEBER is twenty-two, a graduate student at Columbia University. Gerry is from Brooklyn, New York. He was a history major at Fordham University, where he did his undergraduate work. He would like a career with the government, particularly in the international field. Gerry was the Roman Catholic member of the Panel.

PRISCILLA HILLIARD is twenty, a senior at Hunter College in New York City; her major, too, is history and, like Gerry, Priscilla was also born in Brooklyn, where she still lives. She intends to be an elementary school teacher. Priscilla was the Negro member of the Panel.

GORDON GENEK is nineteen, a freshman pre-law student at City College of New York. He was born and raised in the Bronx. Gordon's plans for the future are tentative, but he thinks he would like to be a government lawyer. Gordon was the Jewish Panel member.

Moderator at the Caldwell High School assembly was Marion Hargrave, national associate director of the Panel of Americans.

And now, at right is a transcript of the question-and-answer period of the Caldwell assembly—a frank discussion of race, religion and prejudice between the Panel of Americans and students like yourselves.

Q. "I'd like to ask Gordon how much allegiance he feels toward Israel. What I mean is, if this country and Israel should ever go to war, which side would he fight on?"

A. (Gordon) "I'm an American. I'd be sorry if Israel and the United States were enemies, but naturally, my loyalties would be with my country—the United States."

Q. "Lately in Caldwell, we've had a problem. The farmers in the valley have hired some Puerto Rican workers and now when we walk to town at night, the men say things you don't understand and sometimes they try to stop you. We know that customs are different in Puerto Rico, but even so this flirting presents a big problem. We can't decide if we should try to be polite or run to the nearest policeman or just stay home. I'd like to know how the Panel thinks we should handle this."

A. (Eunice) "Well, first of all, you're right about customs being different in Puerto Rico — and in most Latin American countries. Nobody there thinks anything about casual flirting; it's very common and girls understand it's meant as a compliment. But things are different here and it takes a while for newcomers to learn that flirting on the street isn't considered nice. In answer to your question, backgrounds so that they may examine their differences and similarities as citizens of the United States. The Panel of Americans appears before an audience to stimulate people to think—to talk openly about subjects that are often considered taboo. All Panel appearances follow the same format: after making clear that they speak as individuals, not as spokesmen for their race, religion or ethnic group, the members give a brief statement about their lives and views, and then the audience participates by asking direct questions. It is not unusual for a Panel to make seventy-five appearances a year, and many Panels have been on radio and television. Recently, Panel of Americans was invited to appear before two hundred junior and senior students of Caldwell High School in Caldwell, New Jersey. And there to record and photograph the assembly was SEVENTEEN. But first, on the opposite page, meet the Panel—five young people who feel that all Americans share an interest in human dignity

I'd suggest you just ignore the men who flirt. You don't have to be polite to them. And there isn't any reason why you should stay at home. As for calling the police—well, I wouldn't think that would be necessary. As I said before, these men don't know yet that customs are different in the States. They're not dangerous—just confused."

A. (Lyle) "I agree with Eunice, but I'd like to add something too. It's true that casual flirting isn't as common here as it is in some other places, but things really aren't that different. What I'm getting at is that I think the problem—or at least part of the problem—stems from the fact that Puerto Ricans are new here. And because they come from a different culture, they frighten people a little. Which, in turn, makes people suspicious of them and quick to criticize what they do. My point is, I think what bothers girls most is not the amount of flirting but who's doing it."

MODERATOR: "Are there any comments on that from the audience?"

COMMENT (from a senior girl): "Well, I hadn't thought about it that way before, but I can see what Lyle means. I am more nervous when a Puerto Rican says something to me than when a local boy does. You know, I'm used to boys here and I'm not afraid to freeze one who acts smart. But with the Puerto Ricans—well, whenever one of them says anything, I'm not sure how to react. I always worry that he might get mad and really nasty."

MODERATOR: "Any further comments? No? All right then, to sum up the answer to this particular problem, it seems that the way to handle Puerto Rican men who flirt is by treating them as you treat strangers who flirt—by ignoring them. Now, next question?"

Q. "This is addressed to the whole Panel. If you could be born again, would any of you choose to be born of a different race or religion—so you'd belong to the majority group?"

A. Each member of the Panel replied with a flat 'No.' Priscilla added, "If you had asked me that question when I was younger, there were days when I'd have been tempted to answer 'Yes.' "

Q. "I'd like to ask Gerry and Gordon if they'd marry girls of another religion if the girls agreed to convert to their religions."

A. (Gerry) "Well, assuming that I loved the girl, yes, I'd marry her. After all, if she converted, we'd both be of the same religion so that wouldn't be a problem."

A. (Gordon) "I agree with Gerry. If a girl I wanted to marry decided to become Jewish, I can't see why religion would be a worry."

Q. "I'm interested in knowing if Gordon and Gerry would marry outside of their religions if the girls refused to convert."

A. (Gordon) "I honestly can't answer that question now. For one thing, I don't plan to marry anybody for a long time—at least until I finish school—and for another thing, I don't believe people can predict accurately what they'd do in a situation like that. I know I can't. I think you have to be actually faced with the problem to find out how you'd handle it. The only thing I can say definitely is that my religion is very important to me and I know if I did fall in love with a girl of another faith, it would mean a big problem to me."

A. (Gerry) "I go along with everything Gordon said. The only thing I want to add is that I don't believe a couple can be happy unless they solve any religious difficulties they may have. I don't necessarily mean that I think one person has to convert to the other person's faith; I just mean that I don't believe a marriage can succeed if two people disagree about something as basic as religion."

Q. "I'd like to ask whether any member of the Panel would consider marrying anyone of another race."

A. (Priscilla) "I'm glad someone has raised that question. It's important because, particularly in the South, that's the big qualm many people have about integration—that it'll result in intermarriage. Therefore, even if we don't agree, I think it's good to talk openly about the subject. Both integration and intermarriage present many problems and I feel that the more people talk intelligently—and, yes, the more they pray too—the closer we'll come to solving all the problems involved. As to whether I personally would marry someone of another race, I wouldn't know that until I was faced with the question. But I have dated members of other races and I've found that when you get to know people, they're all pretty much the same. Break down the barrier of prejudice and you see that most people have similar feelings, similar likes and dislikes, similar everything."

MODERATOR: "Before other members of the Panel give their views on intermarriage, does anyone in the audience wish to comment on Priscilla's remarks?"

COMMENT (from a junior girl): "Well, suppose Priscilla were in love with a white man and she did want to marry him; wouldn't she worry about the children they might have? I mean, the children of interracial marriages aren't either white or Negro and they're usually despised by both groups."

A. (Lyle) "I know that comment was directed to Priscilla, but if nobody minds I'd like to answer it. What I want to say is this: I'm white myself and if I'm able to love and accept a wife who's black, why shouldn't other people be willing to accept my child?"

A. (Gerry) "I think people should accept the children of interracial marriages. But let's be realistic; most people frown on both the marriages and the children. This is still a big problem. I'd say that couples who intermarry racially have to be twice as strong and twice as mature as other couples. They have to be real pioneers."

A. (Gordon) "It seems to me this is a subject you just can't reach any conclusion on. So much depends on the two people involved—where they live, what kind of life they want, the attitude within their particular community, all those things and more. It's a complicated problem and there isn't any one pat answer to solve it."

MODERATOR: "All right, are there any last comments from the audience before we move on to another question?"

COMMENT (from a senior girl): "I'd just like to say that I agree with Priscilla—with what she said about all people being a lot the same when you get to know them. I think that's true. And for that reason, I believe racial intermarriage is probably inevitable. It's bound to happen more and more as the races begin mingling."

Q. "We were talking about the Freedom Riders in our history class last week, and I'd like to ask Priscilla what she thinks of them; in particular, if she believes that all the riots they've provoked can really help to make things better in the South."

A. (Priscilla) "Well, first, I think it's important to remember that the aim of the Freedom Riders isn't to provoke riots; it's to exercise their rights as citizens of the United States. Unfortunately, when a Negro tries to exercise his rights in most sections of the South, there are some people who'll do almost anything to stop him. I don't believe you can blame the riots on the Freedom Riders—not unless you believe that to ask to be treated like a human being is just provocation for beatings and setting fire to a bus—all the things that have happened so far. But to answer what I think you're really trying to ask me—do I believe that this kind of trouble can help the Negroes' cause—I say yes. I think it accomplishes two things. First, it forces a lot of Southern moderates to see that they can't just sit on the sidelines during this segregation struggle. You know, it makes them realize that if they don't step in, the mobs will take over completely and then everyone will lose. And second, trouble like this makes the Negroes see that they've got to be determined if they're going to win even the most basic rights. Don't misunderstand, I'm not glad there was trouble, but I do think people on both sides have profited from what's happened."

Q. "But what about the North—this is directed to Priscilla too—isn't there as much racial discrimination here as there is in the South?"

A. (Priscilla) "No, I don't think so. There's a lot of discrimination in the North, of course, but that's been improving lately too. Or I guess what I mean is, I think the situation is getting better everywhere—South and North—because it's being forced into the open. Remember, right after his inauguration, President Kennedy said something to the effect that our economy might get worse before it got better? Well, I believe that theory applies to race relations too. On the surface, it may seem that things are worse, but at least now we're headed in the right direction. And eventually things will get better."

MODERATOR: "Before we take another question from the audience, Gerry has requested that he be allowed to ask you something. All right? All right, go ahead, Gerry."

Q. (Gerry) "Well, while we've been talking about integration and racial problems around the rest of the country, I've been wondering what the situation is in Caldwell—right here in school, in fact. For instance, I notice that most of the Negro students are sitting with other Negroes. Is this just coincidence or did it happen by choice or what?"

MODERATOR: "Would anyone in the audience care to answer Gerry?"

A. (from a Negro girl, a junior) "Well, about the seating arrangement, that's accidental. The room was overcrowded and Mr. Thompson, our principal, had to move everybody around and this is how it happened to end up. Usually, Negroes and whites sit together without anybody thinking about it. I'd say race relations in Caldwell—and here in school—are pretty good. I've lived in Caldwell for a long time and I've never had any bad problems; most of the white kids are nice to the Negro kids. But there is prejudice and that's a fact. For instance, there are a lot of clubs and things that Negroes can't join just because they're Negroes. That's how it is."

MODERATOR: "Would anyone in the audience care to comment on this?"

COMMENT (from a senior girl): "I don't think Hilda's right about there being prejudice here. I mean—well, there's separation among the white students too. People travel in different cliques whether they're white or Negro and nobody gets asked everywhere or belongs to everything. Even if the school were all-white, there would still be this kind of separation. It's natural."

COMMENT (from a junior girl): "I agree that nobody gets asked everywhere or belongs to everything, but I think Hilda's right about there being prejudice in school. We've never talked about it or admitted it until now, but in our hearts we all know it exists."

COMMENT (from a junior boy): "I just wanted to say that I used to be prejudiced against Negroes—before I knew any. Then, in the fourth grade, I was transferred to a school where there were Negro students and I haven't had any prejudice at all since—because I got to know Negroes, understand? In a way, I was lucky. I was young when I was transferred to that school. I think when you're young you're a lot better able to see people the way they really are—not the way you've been told they are."

COMMENT (from a senior girl): "I'm a member of the Student Council here at Caldwell and while I know I can't speak for the whole Council, I'm positive the other members feel as I do. I know I'm not prejudiced against Negroes. And if the Negro students in school would come out for the clubs and things they want to join, I'm sure they wouldn't find any prejudice. It may be that because the Negroes are in the minority here, they think prejudice exists when it actually doesn't."

COMMENT (from a Negro girl, a senior): "I've been around white people all my life and from what I've seen—especially in the South—prejudice starts with older people. I think if parents would leave their children alone, there almost wouldn't be any prejudice problem. Usually it's the older people who act as if being colored is the same as being dirt—being just nothing, you know? And they shouldn't do that; it's wrong. But I do want to say that as a Negro in this school, I've been very happy; the white kids have always treated me as if I were one of them. As a matter of fact, I think that bringing more colored people into schools and colleges is one of the best ways of ending prejudice. It gives all of us a chance to start knowing each other."

MODERATOR: "We've heard comments from two Negro girls, now what about the Negro fellows? Would any of you like to say something? No? All right, then let's take a new question from the floor."

Q. "This is to the white members of the Panel. How would they feel if they were married and living in a nice suburb like Caldwell and a Negro or a Puerto Rican family tried to move into the neighborhood? Wouldn't they be upset about their property values going down? And if that didn't bother them, how would they cope with the pressure their neighbors would put on them?"

A. (Gordon) "Well, first, I want to say that it's a mistake to assume that property values fall automatically when a neighborhood stops being all-white. I know that's what a lot of people believe, but it isn't always true. If you're interested, read the study UCLA did on the subject—it shows that when Negroes moved into an all-white neighborhood somewhere in California, the property values didn't go down. So that's my answer to your first question—I wouldn't worry about my property because I don't believe that real estate always depreciates when Negroes—or Puerto Ricans or Jews or Mexicans—move into a neighborhood. Now, as for the second question, I guess if my neighbors put pressure on me, I'd do exactly what I'm doing now: I'd talk to them. I'd try to make them see that living with members of a minority group isn't anything to be afraid of."

A. (Lyle) "I think Gordon put his finger on the root of the whole problem just then: It's fear—not dislike—that makes people show prejudice toward minority groups. And it's such a vicious circle. People are taught to be afraid of minorities so they avoid knowing them and because they don't know them, they never learn there's nothing to be afraid of."

COMMENT (from a senior girl): "Recently, something happened in our neighborhood that I'd like to mention. I live in a section of town that's considered nice, and not long ago a rumor was going around that Elston Howard, the Negro ballplayer, was trying to buy a house there. Well, I'd never heard of him then, but the only reaction I had was, 'Good; maybe now I can get into Yankee Stadium free!' But that wasn't how other people around us reacted—especially the older people. Some of them came to my father and tried to get him to contribute money so they could buy the house before Elston Howard could! It was just like that movie Raisin in the Sun. Well, anyway, as it turned out, no one bought the house—maybe the rumor wasn't even true—but I still can't see why the idea of a Negro in the neighborhood bothered people. I wouldn't have minded living next to Negroes. And—I'm proud to say—neither would my parents."

MODERATOR: "Thank you for telling us that story. And I imagine if Elston Howard heard it—whether he had wanted the house or not—he'd thank you too. Now, next question from the floor?"

Q. "I wonder if Gerry as a Catholic and Gordon as a Jew can tell me why they think so many people are prejudiced against Catholics and Jews."

A. (Gerry) "Well, if you mean can I give a valid reason for this prejudice, the answer's no. Of course I've seen and felt the prejudice—I've been called a Black Papist a couple of times and I've heard Jews called kikes, a lot of things like that—but people never have rational reasons for prejudice. For instance, under the first amendment to the Constitution the right of any religion to set up its own educational system is guaranteed—yet some people dislike Catholics simply because the Catholic Church has chosen to exercise this right. To hear these people talk, you'd think Catholic education was subversive—and that Catholic parents had to send their children to parochial schools. And believe me, you can talk yourself blue trying to explain the truth, but with most bigots, it's hopeless. Their feelings are irrational and 'mere facts' won't change them."

A. (Gordon) "As a Jew, the most common excuse for anti-Semitism I've heard is the old routine about Jews-and-money. And as Gerry said, most bigots don't want to be bothered with facts. Yes, for a long time—even before the Middle Ages—Jews were associated with money. But not because they worshiped the almighty dollar, but because they were discriminated against. You see, for centuries in both the Middle East and Europe, Jews were forbidden by law to own property or hold office or even to become citizens. During one period in most of Europe—around the eleventh century, I think—all professions were closed to Jews. Believe it or not, in those days handling money was considered a dirty, undignified job. And because Jews were discriminated against, they got the dirty job. In other words, the current association between Jews and money has a historical basis, but bigoted people distort—or don't know—the facts. Jews aren't money-mad; they got involved with banking and commerce because they had to."

Q. "I'd like to ask Gerry why it is that so many Catholics have prejudice toward Jews. I mean—well, Christ was a Jew, so if a Catholic is against Jews isn't that the same as being against Christ?"

A. (Gerry) "Well, first, I have to say I'm not aware that 'so many' Catholics are prejudiced against Jews. And second, I wonder if your question isn't a way of asking if I blame the Jews for Christ's death; usually, that's what people are trying to say when they ask about Catholics' prejudice toward Jews. If that is what you mean—and if it isn't, maybe somebody else in the audience is interested—this is my answer: Throughout my whole Catholic education, from elementary school through college, I was taught that the reason for Christ's death was a moral one; that insofar as we're all sinners, we're each of us the cause of His death. I wasn't ever taught that Jews are Christ-killers—and neither, by the way, were any of my friends who attended other Catholic schools. Maybe there are schools that stress how Christ died, but the schools I know stress why He died."

Q. "This is for Lyle. I was wondering if he could tell us how to handle parents if they object to our wanting to know people of another race or religion. I guess what I'm trying to say is, how do you stop parents from being prejudiced?"

A. (Lyle) "I wish I could answer that, but I can't. From what I've seen, there's very little you can do to change prejudiced parents. Talking—not arguing—is one thing to try, of course, but if your folks are dead set against your having friends of a different race or religion, you probably won't get very far. You'll just have to wait until you're older and more on your own—and even then, it isn't always easy. For instance, I know lots of people from the Middle West who are in college now in the East; and though they have some very good friends of another faith or another race, they know they can't ever invite those friends to visit back home. It's too bad, but well, that's how it is. You have to try to follow that prayer—you know the one I mean: 'God grant me the strength to change those things I can change, the courage to accept those things I cannot change—and the wisdom to know the difference.' "

Q. "I have a question for Priscilla. I'd like to know if she feels any ties with the people of Africa—or with Africa itself."

COMMENT (from a junior boy, a foreign exchange student): "Excuse me for interrupting, but before Priscilla answers that, may I ask a question of the girl who asked it?"

MODERATOR: "Yes, of course. That's the point of this assembly—to encourage you to question yourselves and others."

Q. "Well, I happen to know that the girl who asked Priscilla about Africa is of German descent. So I'd like to know if she feels any ties with Germans or Germany."

A. "No, no, I don't. My grandparents came from Germany, but I'm an American."

COMMENT (from the same boy): "That's my point exactly! I mean, Priscilla's an American, too, so what made you wonder if she'd feel any bond with Africans?"

MODERATOR: "Suppose we let Priscilla answer the question now and we'll see how she does feel."

A. (Priscilla) "Well, I do feel certain ties with African Negroes, but because they're Negroes, not because they're African. Like the Negroes here, they've just begun to fight to be treated as human beings, and I guess you could say I'm in sympathy with them. However, lately I've met some African exchange students, and if I ever doubted that my roots are in America, I know it for sure now. Don't misunderstand; we get along fine, but our cultures and our backgrounds—even our problems—are worlds apart. I have much more in common with any American—even a white supremacist American!"

Q. "This is directed to Eunice: Can she explain why so many Puerto Ricans seem to have trouble—or get into trouble—when they come up to the States."

A. (Eunice) "That's a big, hard question to try to answer briefly, but I'll do the best I can. First, at least from what I've seen and experienced myself, there's the problem of color. You see, in Puerto Rico, there honestly isn't any color line; black or white or in between, if a man can afford it, he's welcome in any hotel or restaurant on the island. So it comes as a shock when a Puerto Rican finds out that there is discrimination in the States. As a matter of fact, life for a newly arrived Puerto Rican is a whole series of shocks. For instance, he's always considered himself an American, but it isn't long before he realizes that almost no one here does. You'd be surprised, in fact, at how many people actually don't know that Puerto Ricans are Americans. And then there's the shock of finding people so—so impatient and suspicious. Lots of times, a Puerto Rican gets yelled at or maybe ignored because his English is poor. And, even worse, almost nobody except other Puerto Ricans seems to trust him; his boss, his American co-worker, even the police look at him—and talk to him—as if he's an escaped convict. He's come here with a lot of big dreams and, at least at first, nothing's the way he thought it would be. His kids go to the overcrowded, rat-infested schools, he lives in a dirty slum, no one seems to like him or accept him. So he turns bitter—and if he stays bitter he may get into trouble. It depends on the man, I guess. Some Puerto Ricans give up and go back home, some stay and cause trouble, some stay and become good citizens. I love the States, but I do have to say this: life is hard at first for Puerto Ricans who come here. Very hard."

A. (Gordon) "I'd like to add one thing to what Eunice said. You know, the United States is supposed to be a haven for immigrants—what's that line on the Statue of Liberty—'Give me your tired, your hungry and your poor'—but it isn't a haven. The truth is, we have a shameful history of discriminating against all newcomers who arrive in numbers. When the Irish started coming over, we gave them a bad time—and then it was the Italians, then the Jews and now the Puerto Ricans. It's a real pity. I mean, if the United States won't welcome new citizens, what country will?"

Q. "I'd like to ask Priscilla how she feels about the Black Muslems—I think that's their name—the group of Negroes that advocates black nationalism."

A. (Priscilla) "I don't agree with them at all. I guess I understand why they feel the way they do—as a reaction against white supremacy—but I'm opposed to everything they stand for. I feel that black nationalism is just as bad as white nationalism."

MODERATOR: "Unfortunately, time has run out, but I would like to take a minute to thank you for being a wonderful audience. You've talked frankly and thoughtfully about things that aren't easy to discuss. And we hope you'll keep on talking about them because you—the young people—are the only ones who can end prejudice finally. Some of you may feel that the problem is your parents' fault, but very soon the responsibility will be yours alone. Again, thank you for sharing your thoughts with us. We appreciate being invited here—and we hope that when you enter college, many of you will decide to accept our invitation: join the Panel of Americans!"

THE END

R&R Rel

WHY ARE PEOPLE BROWN OR BLACK OR YELLOW OR WHITE?

What the Scientists Say

Race problems are spreading from one end of the world to the other.

In Africa, blacks battle the whites. In Indonesia, browns menace the blacks. In Asia, yellows threaten the browns. In America and Britain, whites riot with blacks.

Even where there are not open conflicts, the races of man often seem to rub each other the wrong way in many fields of activity.

Why? What really divides the races? Are there differences deeper than the color of skins? What accounts for them?

Ask scientists, and you get wide agreement on the cause of some physical differences but controversy on nearly everything else.

Some stress that new "mixed" races are forming. Yet they only seem to add to the conflicts already existing in many places.

In today's world, almost everywhere you look, you find mounting conflict between races.

In black Africa there is increasing hostility by Negroes toward outnumbered white settlers. In Indonesia, "the little brown people," having won independence from the Dutch with U. S. help, are now seeking to dominate the blacks of New Guinea—members of a different race.

There have been race riots in Britain between whites and blacks. There has been bloodshed in the streets of Georgetown, British Guiana, as Negroes battled people whose origins are in India. And France's long struggle in Algeria has been called a "racial holy war" by some zealots.

The so-called "race issue" is still creating sharp division among Americans in many parts of the United States.

In all the turmoil, this question increasingly is being asked: Why are races different? What accounts for black skins on some people, white skin on others? Why do some people have "slant" eyes? Are these differences only skin deep? Or is something fundamental involved?

Put these questions to the scientists who make a study of race and heredity—the anthropologists and geneticists—and you find general agreement on the causes of most physical differences between races. But you also find sharp argument on other points.

Climate and color. The layman's view that dark skin is the product of exposure to sunlight is probably correct, scientists say.

The substance that makes skin dark—and enables some fair skins to tan—acts as an effective screen against the penetrating ultraviolet rays of the sun. This has been proved.

Overexposure to ultraviolet rays can lead, in fair-skinned people, to skin cancer, to reduced fertility and premature aging among women. Most black people of the tropics do not suffer in these ways. The coloring substance—called melanin—protects them.

Ability to produce melanin is hereditary, and the race that has that ability in largest measure will survive in hot, bright lands while other races dwindle. That, scientists believe, is what happened over possibly 20,000 years to develop the dark races of the world—Negroes in Africa, the pygmy Negritos of Asia, blacks in Australia and the islands of the Southwest Pacific.

The white race owes its skin color to climate, too, biologists suggest. It is known that while too much ultraviolet light is harmful to human beings, some of it is necessary for healthy growth. It promotes the formation of vitamin D, the "sunshine vitamin" that makes strong bones. In the cloudy climate of Northern Europe, dark skins would filter out too much sunlight. Children would be puny.

Even today, scientists point out, Negro children in northern climes are more prone to rickets than their white neighbors. The U. S. Army found that Negroes in Alaska during World War II suffered much more from frostbite and other cold-caused damage than did white soldiers in the same camps. This, too, was an indirect result of their dark skins, researchers say.

Slant eyes and snow. Dr. Carleton S. Coon, professor of anthropology at the University Museum of the University of Pennsylvania, has proposed the theory that climate also accounts for the slant eyes, high cheekbones and short noses of the typical Asian. Here is his suggestion:

It gets bitterly cold in North Asia, and the wind can be fierce. The people who survived best were those who had a BROWN PEOPLE include natives of much of Indonesia, and of Pacific isles such as the Philippines, Tahiti, Hawaii.

BLACK PEOPLE include not only Negroes of Africa but also Asia's Negritos and blacks of Australia and the Pacific.

YELLOW PEOPLE actually range in skin color from light tan to bronze. Group consists mostly of Chinese and Japanese.

Photos: Magnum, USN&WR

WHITE PEOPLE comprise those who originally were European and Middle Eastern, but who now are widely scattered.

heavy padding of fat around the eyes. It takes a particular shape of eye socket, Dr. Coon points out, to sustain this heavy padding. It should be longer than is common among "round-eyed" people.

Another help in withstanding cold was the reduction and retraction of the brow ridges which protect the highly sensitive sinuses. To accommodate these adaptations to cold, the nasal passages became shorter and canted back more sharply. Noses became less prominent, cheekbones more so. Chewing muscles came farther forward.

Result: the slant-eyed, broad-faced, snub-nosed human generally thought of as "the typical Chinese."

Other anthropologists may not go all the way with Dr. Coon's theory. "But it's possible," most of them say.

A "yellow race"? The United Nations, in its "Demographic Yearbook for 1960," estimates that there are some 3 billion people in the world. About one third of them live in Asia and islands around that continent, according to estimates by the Population Reference Bureau. They form what many modern scientists call the "Asiatic geographical race," and they range in skin color from the dark Burmese to the light Manchurians. In between, climate seems to have been best for people of different shades of tan, getting darker nearer the tropics. Because the light-tan Chinese are the most numerous, ancient European travelers grouped all Asians into a "yellow" race.

There's no real basis for this, scientists say. The traits that put all Asians into a race are straight, blue-black hair, eyelids with a so-called "inner fold"—which give a slant-eyed appearance—wide, flat faces and little body hair.

Scientists now say that there is probably some connection, too, between climate and color of hair and eyes. The tight black curls of some Negroes may be the result of natural selection for protection against sun and humid heat, some experts suggest.

Others disagree, pointing out that most people native to tropical Asia have straight black hair.

Dark eyes are said to be less sensitive to bright sunshine than eyes of paler color. But it is estimated that four out of five people in the world have dark eyes. The blue-eyed blonds of Northern Europe are a very minor race statistically, even in Europe, ethnologists agree.

Scientists use a number of ways of distinguishing one race from another, but they do not agree among themselves on which differences between people are the really basic ones.

Head shapes and body structure have been held to be important differences. Using them as yardsticks, ethnologists have found four "races" in Europe alone—the Nordic, the Alpine, the Mediterranean and the Northeast European.

In the vast subcontinent of India, among a population double that of Europe, there are even more "races," and the notion that natives of India are dark-skinned people of European stock is no longer held to be true of all Pakistanis and Indians. Most ethnologists now take the subcontinent as a whole and speak of the "Indian geographical race."

Dr. Stanley M. Garn of Antioch College, in the 1961 edition of his book "Human Races," lists nine such "geographical races."

They are: the Amerindians, who lived in North and South America before the coming of the white man; the Polynesians, ranging from New Zealand to Hawaii; the Micronesians, dark people of the small Pacific atolls; the Papuans, "Stone Age" natives of New Guinea and surrounding islands; the Australians, the CHINESE FEATURES are thought by one scientist to be an adaptation to cold winds of North Asia, with "padded" eyes, snub nose providing special protection.

(continued on page 74)

SUNSHINE is believed to be the big factor in skin color. Light-skinned people on this Hawaiian beach enjoy the sun, but dark skins are less sensitive to such exposure. Scientists think this difference has caused dark strains to develop in hot, bright lands through natural selection.

Photos: Magnum, USN&WR

LATIN-AMERICAN populations include whites, Indians, Negroes and others. Large mixed-blood groups also exist, and these are often classified as races.

BROWN, BLACK, YELLOW, WHITE—

[continued from page 73]

original natives of Australia and Tasmania, some of whom have light or red-gold hair; the Asiatic, the Indian, the European, and the African races.

Within these "major" races, Dr. Garn distinguishes some 32 important "local" races plus some groups of people he classes as "isolated races"—the Lapps, the Pacific Negritos, the African Pygmies and the Eskimos.

Taking the world's 3 billion population as a whole, the Population Reference Bureau estimates this division by colors: yellow people, 930 million; white people, 930 million; brown-red, 900 million; black, 240 million.

Where did races come from? Remains of creatures that were more man than ape, but still were not men, have been found in Africa, Europe, China and Java. Some of them may have used fire and kept stones and sticks as tools and weapons. Anthropologists cannot yet tell, however, if any of these creatures was the immediate ancestor of modern man.

There is dispute at this time over just where modern man originated. Most scientists suggest a broad area in Southwest Asia and Asia Minor. Some others feel that Africa may have been the place. There is also debate over dating the appearance of true humans – the species Homo sapiens – on the earth. Some biologists put it at 100,000 years ago. Others suggest 50,000 years.

By 15,000 or 20,000 years ago, it is generally agreed, men had spread to almost every part of the world where they are found today. By that time, also, the main races of men had been formed, scientists now hold. They say that the people best adapted to bright sunlight were multiplying successfully in the tropics, while those not so well adapted were dying out in the tropics, multiplying in climates more favorable to them.

As they became adapted to their territories through natural selection, the members of large population groups became generally more like each other, less like other groups. The early inhabitants of North and South America, for example, are known to have come originally from Asia. However, modern study of blood – the science of serology – shows that the Indians of the Western Hemisphere seldom or never have blood type B. Yet this is the most common blood type among Asians. Scientists are still puzzling over the reason for the wide difference.

The presence of "sickle cells" – crescent-shaped red cells—in the blood of Negroes and not in any other race is more readily explained. It has recently been found that the sickling trait in blood can offer protection against the malaria which killed off other races trying to live in tropical Africa.

As serologists develop their studies, they say, it is likely that other significant differences in blood make-up will appear to help define races.

Racial mixing. In the U. S. and in Britain's former colonies, historically there has been little formal intermarriage between the white and dark races. And social scientists report that there is even less today. The mixed marriage, particularly between whites and Negroes, is not generally acceptable to either race.

Another form of race mixing, however, may be taking place, some sociologists believe. This involves the very light-skinned Negroes—possibly with a number of white ancestors—who "pass over" every year to live as whites. There is no way of telling, authorities say, just what this number is. And, geneticists point out, there is no chance that a person who had "passed" as white would produce a dark baby unless the other parent was dark.

At this time, scientists cannot tell in advance which racial heritage will dominate in a mixed marriage. In mulatto families some children will be dark, others quite light, others various shades in between, studies have shown. They are likely to vary in intelligence, too, just like the children of a racially "pure" union.

The "hot" issue. When it comes to comparison of intelligence among different races, scientists divide sharply.

In June, 1951, a group of physical anthropologists and geneticists, meeting under United Nations auspices, issued a long "Statement on the Nature of Race and Race Differences." From that statement:

"Available scientific knowledge provides no basis for believing that the groups of mankind differ in their innate capacity for intellectual and emotional development.

"Vast social changes have occurred that have not been connected in any way with changes in racial type. Historical and sociological studies thus support the view that genetic differences are of little significance in determining the social and cultural differences between different groups of men."

Other scientists were aroused. Intelligence, they said, might well be developed in a race through natural selection.

The scientists who hold this view are branded as "racists" by most of the sign-

(continued on page 76)

PRIMITIVE CULTURES of the tropics are explained by one anthropologist as a natural result of a relatively "easy" life, where "little ingenuity is required to provide food and shelter and there is no premium on outstanding leadership."

ADVANCED CULTURES of colder climates are said by some scientists to arise from intelligence produced by "survival of the fittest." Others disagree, argue that there is no proof that "groups of mankind differ in their innate capacity."

Photos: Black Star, USN&WR

[ continued from page 75 ]

BROWN, BLACK, YELLOW, WHITE—

ers of the U. N. statement, and a battle of words is raging among scientists at this time.

One skirmish in the battle deals with history. The men who believe that intelligence can be developed in a race through natural selection—"the survival of the fittest"—point out that, while African Negroes are artistically highly gifted, left to themselves they never produced such basic tools as the wheel, the sail or an alphabet. They built few cities, and those, apparently did not endure very long.

Dr. Coon, who is not branded a "racist," says, "We do know that wide differences exist in the anatomical and physiological properties of the human brain, and that some of these are racial." He offers this explanation of what happened in Africa:

"In a situation where only the clever can survive, the dull die. In another situation, where life is easy as long as everybody is happy, and little ingenuity is required to provide food and shelter and there is no premium on outstanding leadership, the exercise of his superior imagination by an unusually clever person threatens the social equilibrium."

Scientists interpret this to mean that the smart man is at a disadvantage and racial stagnation can be the result. The comparative isolation of all Africa below the Sahara may have helped the stagnating process along, some anthropologists suggest.

The Europeans and Asians, constantly in contact with other peoples, were constantly borrowing new ideas and sharpening their wits in the process, historians say. A number of anthropologists hold that, where competition between men is keen, the laws of natural selection will operate so that the more intelligent men have the best chance of surviving and having children. And those children can inherit their parents' intelligence. This has happened with Europeans and Asians, these scientists assert.

Opponents of this view state that no good way has yet been found to measure intelligence among people who cannot read or write. And they go on to say that it is environment, not heredity, that makes people act intelligently. Attempts to test intelligence by race are "racist," they charge.

New races coming? While the battle over racial intelligence is raging among scientists, new races are being formed.

Dr. Garn classifies the present American Negro as a member of a new race, different in many respects from his African forebears. And American Negroes who have traveled to Africa as exchange students or members of the Peace Corps frequently report feeling like members of a strange race when they are in Africa.

In some Latin-American countries, as reference works show, people of mixed blood outnumber the "pure" whites, Indians and Negroes. Most ethnologists describe these mixed-blood people as a race.

A new, extremely mixed race is being formed in Hawaii—the neo-Polynesian—according to Dr. Garn and his associates.

Modern public-health measures and more-potent and more-useful drugs make it likely that these new races will multiply, biologists agree. So will the "pure" races, where they are separated by geography or law or custom, according to the same scientists.

In a world where racial conflict is seething, social scientists point out, growing pressure from new races may add to the world turmoil.

THE COLORS OF THE WORLD'S PEOPLES

Out of approximately 3 billion people in the world today—

Note: Estimates compiled by the Population Reference Bureau, based on anthropological studies and United Nations sources.

Copyright 1962, U. S. News Publishing Corp.

R+RR

Reprinted from the April 10, 1962 issue of LOOK

Ar R Rel.

The Negro in America today

BY ERNEST DUNBAR LOOK SENIOR EDITOR

IMAGINE THAT YOU are an American Negro. If you are really not a Negro, this is going to call for all the imagination you can muster. Since I am one, maybe I can help you make the adjustment.

Your ancestors have been in this country for a mighty long time, far longer than the three hundred years that most white folk you bump into believe to be the Negro's length of residence here. That is one of the little ironies of your life in America. Your children's schoolbooks tell them about Christopher Columbus, George Washington, Betsy Ross and Paul Revere. But they will probably never hear of the many heroes of your own race who have figured in this country's development from the very beginning. That is, unless you yourself provide them with the information.

Of course, since you've used the same textbooks, your own information is also scanty. But maybe you know that 30 Negroes accompanied the Spanish explorer Balboa when he discovered the Pacific, that a Spanish Negro called Estevanico blazed a route from Mexico through New Mexico and Arizona to the Northwest and that, in 1526, Negro slaves owned by the Spanish-frustrated Spain's attempts to establish a colony in what was to become South Carolina, by deserting the Spanish ranks to join the Indians.

Certainly, you know that Crispus Attucks, for whom your local Elks lodge or boys' club is named, was a Negro sailor who was shot down by British infantry in the "Boston Massacre," among the first Americans to die for this country's independence. But though you know about Betsy Ross, you may not know about Deborah Gannett, a woman of your race who masqueraded as a man and fought with distinction in a Massachusetts regiment during the Revolution.

It was not until 1619, when twenty of your ancestors were shipped into Virginia as slaves, that the long and unique struggle of your people in America began. The peremptory nature of your ancestors' arrival here had a lot to do with your present outlook.

You don't celebrate St. Patrick's Day or Bastille Day, your mother does not cook the dishes her mother brought over from the

It's hard to tell an African why you can't come "home"

"old country," and you don't dress up now and then in the national costume of your former homeland or sing its songs. The roots you possess are sunk deep in the soil of America. The joyful and tragic songs you sing are fashioned from your experiences in America. Although other Americans belong to organizations such as the Sons of Italy, the Sons of Erin or the Japanese-American Association, you tend to fear that joining an organization whose members must be of African descent may be somehow racist, a negation of the long effort of your people to be integrated into American society.

When you visit the United Nations in New York, you see African delegates who look exactly like your Uncle Willie or Cousin Frank, but who perhaps speak French and whose last names are Diop or Diallo, not Johnson or Jones, the names you acquired in the New World. And if they ask you when you are coming "home," you may have difficulty in explaining why "home" is on these shores. Given a map of Africa, you couldn't pick out the spot from which your forebears were wrenched, if your life depended on it.

For better or for worse, America is wedded to you, and you to it, till death do you part. It is this that makes you different from all the other immigrants who are now called Americans.

You are aware that the term "Negro" is an imprecise one and tells little about the human being it designates. Negroes come in all varieties of colors and sizes. They are Baptists, Methodists, Episcopalians, Catholics, Moslems, atheists and agnostics. They can be found on the rolls of the Democratic, Republican, Socialist and Communist parties. They live in Montana and Maine, Alabama and Alaska.

Some Negroes work in the White House. Others are having great difficulty getting any kind of work anywhere.

INCOME

Today, almost a century after the Emancipation Proclamation and the 13th Amendment, you and 19 million other Negroes are still struggling for rights and privileges that most other Americans take for granted. The Emancipation Proclamation did not say anything about buying a hamburger at a Southern lunch counter or a home in a Northern suburb. And though the U.S. Constitution's 15th Amendment is supposed to guarantee that the Negro citizen should not be denied that basic element of citizenship, the vote, thousands of black Americans live in areas where the 15th Amendment has yet to be recognized.

So you wince inwardly when you hear your white fellow citizens refer to the "free world," and you understand so well why few Negroes employ that phrase. But then this is only one of many split images of life in America—life as you know it and life as the majority group sees it. On some subjects, those images are unified, but on many, they are wide apart, like a picture out of focus.

Probably the most difficult image to focus properly is where you and your 19 million fellow Negroes stand today, 96 years after slavery was formally ended.

You've come a long way. You would agree on that. But all Americans have come a long way, so the question more properly is: Where do you stand today in relation to the rest of America?

You know that there are increased opportunities for Negroes in America today. A lot of restrictions that confronted your mother and father when they were growing up are happily now merely the subject of family joking. You are better educated than they were. Negroes are attending colleges and universities in the North and South in increasing numbers, 100,000 in Negro institutions alone. They are moving into professions and skills heretofore closed to members of your race. Pick up a Negro newspaper or magazine, and you may see a picture of a technician with a black skin working on a multistage rocket or a brown-skinned flight surgeon checking instruments electronically linked to a white-skinned astronaut.

Yet, despite the widened horizons and the increased opportunities, there is a mounting sense of frustration in your community, with tensions that threaten to boil over if the pace of advancement is not stepped up.

Why? Because of where you stand as compared to other Americans. Many Negroes have seen their income levels rise sharply, their modes of living change in line with their new prosperity. But for many more, getting a job and keeping it are problems of giant proportions.

As a Negro, your chances of being unemployed are about three times as great as they would be if you were white. That fact must be borne in mind when your progress is being considered. In 1939, the median income for Negro families was $489, or 37 per cent of that of white families. Negro wage earners made strides from World War II through the Korean conflict, but they have not shared proportionately in the country's economic advances of the past two decades.

On the contrary, since 1952, Negro income has slipped. In that year, the best yet for the Negro, the median income of Negro families was only 57 per cent of that of white families—$2,338 to $4,114 a year, respectively. The ratio has remained below this level for the past nine years.

When you consider that Negro families have an average of 4.4 members, compared to 3.6 for white families, and thus require more in the way of food, clothing and shelter, the gap in income becomes even more meaningful.

The grim figures for Negro income nationally are heavily influenced by the low income of Negroes in rural areas, most of which are in the South. Negro males 14 and older in the Northeast, North Central and Western states have a median money income about three fourths that of white males. But in the South, Negro males have only one third of the money income of their white counterparts.

EMPLOYMENT

Discrimination in employment, bias in upgrading and poor education have contributed to the Negro's economic difficulties. Traditionally "last hired and first fired," Negroes must battle the bias of both employers and some unions. Though the race of which you are a member comprises about 11 per cent of the nation's working force, it constituted 21 per cent of the unemployed in the fall of 1961. In Chicago, where the total unemployment rate was 5.7 per cent, the Negro jobless rate was 17.3; in Washington, D.C., where Negroes made up 53.9 per cent of the population, they accounted for 71 per cent of the unemployed; in Detroit, 112,000 of the 185,000 people out of work were Negroes. The fact that Negroes are moving into occu-

Copyright © 1962 by Cowles Magazines and Broadcasting, Inc.

Today's Negro youth may be far better educated than his parents and seek goals they never dreamed of. But he is sometimes caught in a dilemma: New jobs are open to him for which he cannot qualify, because he had believed it was fruitless to prepare. He strives for his own solutions.

pations formerly closed to them does not alter the worsening plight of Negro workers as a whole. That is because the bulk of Negro labor is unskilled, and automation is cutting wide inroads into unskilled labor.

As a Negro, you've got a special kind of problem when it comes to advising your youngsters on the choice of a career. Should you encourage them to prepare themselves for fields in which the doors have long been shut to Negroes, in the hope that they will somehow break through the barriers? Or should you counsel them to stick to the "safe" occupations such as teaching, law or the ministry?

Even if your children do not pursue professional careers, a rocky road awaits them in the crafts. Negro youths are excluded from apprentice training by racial bars in many of the nation's craft unions. Less than 1 per cent of the apprentices in the construction trades are Negroes. In the country's 32 major cities, a survey found only 100 Negro apprentices in all fields. To complete the vicious circle, Negro youths are denied on-the-job training by many employers.

Paradoxically, opportunities are beginning to open up for young Negroes in some fields, but qualified candidates are not available, because past discrimination discouraged them from taking the necessary training for what had seemed to be an unattainable goal. Edwin Berry, executive director of Chicago's Urban League, will tell you, "People call me up with a job. They want a Negro with certain qualifications for a job from which Negroes have always been excluded. Now they say, 'Get me a Negro.' It isn't done just like that!"

Perhaps the most militantly articulate battler against bias in labor is A. Philip Randolph, 72-year-old president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters and the only Negro vice-president of the AFL-CIO. Randolph says, "Discrimination in employment is the crisis of the Negro American today. With Negroes constituting the major portion of unskilled labor and with no way to get training in skills, Negroes are gradually being replaced with automation. Automation is building up a hard core of unemployables. And when the black worker is in trouble," says Randolph, "the community is in trouble. He can't keep his kids in school, he can't keep his home intact, and, as a result, the morale of the community breaks down."

A veteran in the Negro's long fight for full admission to union ranks, Randolph founded the Negro American Labor Council in 1960 to press for that goal within organized labor. Randolph makes it plain that he is less than happy with the attitude of the AFL-CIO and its leader, George Meany, who once demanded of him, "Who the hell appointed you as guardian of all the Negro members in America?"

"George is a gradualist," says Randolph, "and we Negroes don't want gradualism in this age of automation. It might have been OK ten years ago, but we don't want token-ism today. We've got to have complete integration."

He adds, "The only thing that will deliver the black workingman is his own effort. The leaders of organized labor have taken us for granted for so long they can't understand that the winds of a civil-rights revolution are blowing in the labor movement today."

HOUSING

As a Negro, housing—or the lack of it—may trouble you even more than employment. The all-Negro ghetto in which you live is like countless others that surround the centers of the nation's cities. From them stem all-Negro schools, all-Negro hospitals and all-Negro churches. In the North, that makes for a segregation in fact that rivals the segregation defined by law in the South.

According to a report of the U. S. Civil Rights Commission, housing ". . . seems to be the one commodity in the American market that is not freely available on equal terms to everyone who can afford to pay." It is estimated that less than two per cent of new housing guaranteed by Federal Housing Authority (FHA) mortgages is available to Negroes. In the case of non-Government-financed housing, the percentage open to Negroes is even smaller.

Since Government-insured or -guaranteed mortgages account for a major portion of all residential housing constructed in the U. S. since World War II, you are likely to view your own Government as one of the chief culprits in limiting your access to better housing.

As a Negro, you know better than to take those bank-mortgage advertisements and television commercials literally. For banks and other lending institutions are the Government's accomplices in closing the door to the Negro homeseeker. No matter what your qualifi-

ILLUSTRATIONS BY TOM FEELINGS

Progress and problems

Dr. Price Cobbs, with son Price, daughter Renata and wife Vad, poses outside his home in Westlake, a San Francisco suburb.

A San Francisco psychiatrist.

Dr. Cobbs: "We had assumed that discrimination incidents occurred only in so-called underprivileged areas. When somebody tossed a stone through our window, and when a kid called our children 'niggers,' we saw how wrong we were." The Cobbses thought of moving, but they were encouraged to stay by a few sympathetic neighbors. As a doctor—he is completing his residency at the University of California Medical Center, where the picture at right was taken—he has experienced almost no discrimination. "But I cannot deny that many white adults are edgy at first about being treated by a Negro," he says.

cations, you will generally find it more difficult to obtain a home mortgage than a white person does. If you are trying to buy a home in an all-white area, your chances of getting a mortgage from a commercial lending institution are extremely slim.

While the Federal Government has thrown its weight behind the drive to eliminate racial segregation in schools and employment, its housing policies actually have contributed to the expansion of residential segregation in the nation's cities. Federal money has gone to guarantee mortgages for housing in suburbs that bar Negro buyers, and segregation is prevalent in the Government's own public-housing program. Over 80 per cent of Federally sponsored housing is segregated racially.

Trapped between Government-assisted discrimination and the bias of private builders and banking institutions, the Negro is squeezed more and more into ghettos. Whites fleeing to the suburbs have left the city to the Negro. The Negro population in the nation's 21 central cities has increased by nearly 2 million, or 50 per cent, in the last ten years, while the white population has declined by one million. But the increase in the number of Negroes in the cities has not been accompanied by a proportionate increase in the housing available to them. The squeeze has produced an explosive situation that constantly threatens to erupt.

The Greenleigh Report, a 1960 study of aid to dependent children (ADC) in Cook County, reveals some stark insights into the results of deprivations suffered by Negroes in the nation's second largest city. While the Greenleigh study says Chicago "may be the most segregated city in the country, as far as housing is concerned," many of the conditions faced by the 900,000 Negroes there may be found in other communities. Perhaps they may be found in yours.

Chicago spends more than $4.4 million every month on its aid-to-dependent-children program. Of the 100,000 recipients of ADC assistance, 90 per cent are Negro. Since the Federal Government puts up more than half of the funds for the Illinois ADC program, the position of the Negro in Chicago has significance for every taxpayer.

The study points out that, of the job orders placed with private employment agencies in Chicago in 1958, 98 per cent barred non-whites. Yet rents paid by Negro families for poorer housing exceeded considerably those paid by white families, in effect placing a "color

Bryant and his wife Elizabeth live in a home he designed in Woodlawn, an all-Negro Atlanta suburb.

An Atlanta mathematician

Charles Bryant commutes daily between two worlds of the New South: his job at Lockheed Aircraft's Marietta, Ga., plant and his home. At Lockheed (right), where he has worked for five years, he heads a section of five whites. Bryant and his wife, who is a schoolteacher, spend most of their leisure entertaining friends at their home. In sympathy with Negroes who, until recently, were boycotting Atlanta merchants, he postponed buying the major furnishings for his house. "It got so you were ashamed for your friends to see you downtown," Bryant says.

tax" on the Negro wage earners. White families paid an average monthly rent of $64.84, while the monthly rent of Negro families averaged $82.77. "This rent differential, a result of discrimination in housing, costs Illinois taxpayers at least $3.4 million a year in Cook County (Chicago) alone," the report says.

The study concludes that discrimination in employment has "a greater direct and indirect impact on the ADC program than almost any other single factor, because it results in desertion, divorce and unwed parenthood, with all their social and economic costs. It has an important causal relationship to unemployment."

SCHOOLS, SEGREGATION

Perhaps the school-desegregation struggle in the South has attracted more attention and stirred more emotions than any other issue involving the Negro in the past two decades. As a Negro, you were concerned with this issue long before the 1954 Supreme Court decision, which brought the problem of equal educational opportunity to the attention of the nation as a whole. You remember the long struggles in the courts, some of which dated as far back as the 1930's.

When the Supreme Court finally declared compulsory segregation in public education to be unconstitutional, you also remember, you were filled with expectation. But today, seven years after that decision, only 7.3 per cent of Negroes in the 17 Southern and border states are attending classes with whites. (Aside from the border states and the District of Columbia, no Southern state has as much as 2 per cent of its Negro pupils in classes with white children.)

Out of a total of 2,805 biracial school districts in the Southern and border states, 1,894 have not even begun to comply with the Supreme Court ruling, according to the 1961 report of the U. S. Civil Rights Commission. Among them is Clarendon County, S. C., one of the five areas involved in the original 1954 decision.

The cold figures of integrated attendance do not reveal the emotional stress or adjustment problems that may affect the few Negro children admitted to white schools. Last November, an Atlanta couple withdrew their daughter from a previously all-white high school to which she had been admitted, with two other Negroes, in August. Though the girl had been making "A's" and "B's" in her courses,

Negro "Freedom Rider" seeking service in Baltimore, Md., café is asked to leave by police officer and waitress. Latter holds copy of state trespass law.

Protest...

A word (above) scrawled on the frosted window of a "Freedom Ride" bus, an attempt to eat in a Baltimore café and the Black Muslim movement are symbols of Negro discontent. While most Negro groups are fighting to remove the barriers to full integration, Muslims champion complete racial separation. The Muslims forecast the doom of America and "the white devils." They want "some states for our own."

Muslim usher at a Harlem rally is a member of "Fruit of Islam," a specially trained guards unit.

her parents said she sometimes studied as much as ten hours a night and had become nervous and suffered from insomnia. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People charged that, by admitting only nine of 130 Negro students who applied for transfers to white schools, Atlanta's pupil-placement plan subjected those few who were accepted to undue pressures as "display pieces and guinea pigs." A school administrator contended that the high school involved was one that had higher standards than many of the city's high schools, with more than 90 per cent of its graduates going to college. He added that the girl's parents told him she had encountered no hostility from students there.

Some student pioneers have received warm support from sympathetic teachers. The parent of a first-grader, one of 18 admitted to formerly all-white schools in Dallas last fall, will tell you, "His teachers seem to be extraordinarily nice to him. Often, when my wife or I go to pick him up, one of the teachers has her arm around him, talking to him. There have been no threats and no unpleasantness." For this Dallas parent, his six-year-old's integration meant some changes in his own behavior. "My wife and I decided to stop mentioning color or anything about race around him," he says.

In recent months, a new term—"resegregation"—has emerged to describe a process that is further slowing the already creeping pace of public-school integration. Resegregation occurs as desegregated schools change from all-white to all-Negro, often as whites leave a desegregated school district and move to other areas, and Negroes move in. School desegregation in Washington, D.C., Baltimore and St. Louis has been virtually negated by this condition.

Negroes have now expanded their attack to come to grips with the other axis of the problem: segregated schools in the North. If your child attends public school in one of the major cities of the North or West, the overwhelming majority of his fellow students are likely to be Negroes also, as is every member of the school staff from the principal to the janitor.

New York City has 95 public elementary schools with Negro or Puerto Rican enrollments exceeding 90 per cent. In Chicago, 87 per cent of the Negro elementary-school pupils attend virtually all-Negro schools; Los Angeles has 43 elementary schools with at least 85 per cent Negro enrollment; Philadelphia has 38 such schools that are more than 99 per cent Negro, and 45 per cent of Detroit's Negro public-school pupils attend schools in which Negroes make up more than 80 per cent of the enrollment.

New York Muslim, "Malcolm X," tells "temple" audience to be a man in the U. S. one must be white.

While segregated schools outside the South stem chiefly from segregated neighborhoods, some school officials have come under fire for administrative policies that increase such segregation. A Federal court recently found the New Rochelle, N. Y., school board guilty of deliberately gerrymandering school-zone lines to confine Negro pupils to a predominantly Negro elementary school. The ruling is destined to have wide repercussions in other Northern cities. Already, Negro parents in Philadelphia, Chicago and Englewood, N. J., have brought suits against school officials to alleviate alleged discriminatory school policies in those cities.

If you are a Negro parent, you know that the question of the quality of the education dispensed in your child's predominantly Negro school is another sore point in your community. Crowded classrooms, poor library facilities, a high proportion of substitute and inexperienced teachers, outmoded curricula, all serve to increase the handicaps your child and others like him must face. An NAACP survey reported that only 2 per cent of Chicago's predominantly white schools and 19 per cent of its mixed schools were on double shifts, but that 81 per cent of children on double shifts were Negro.

THE ARMED FORCES

It is in the nation's armed forces that the American Negro has made his greatest advances. Indeed, the Negro serviceman has achieved a degree of equality on the base that is considerably ahead of that in the society beyond its gates. President Truman's Executive Order 9981, issued in 1948, said: "... There shall be equality of treatment and opportunity for all persons in the armed services. . . ." With some notable exceptions, this policy of racial equality has been put into practice.

The number of Negro officers in the services is expanding, although at a slow rate. Today, 3 per cent of Army officers are Negroes, as compared to .99 per cent at the end of World War II; 1.1 per cent of officers in the Air Force are Negroes; in the Navy and Marine Corps, which had no Negro officers at the beginning of World War II, .1 per cent of the officers are Negroes. At present, 34 of the 8,543 cadets in the Army, Naval and Air Force academies are Negroes.

The Air Force lists the nation's sole Negro general officer, Maj. Gen. Benjamin O. Davis, Jr., the fourth Negro to graduate from West Point and son of the first and only other Negro to gain a general's star, Brig. Gen. B. O. Davis, Sr., U. S. Army, now retired.

James C. Evans, a Negro, is counselor to the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Manpower, and his duties include "monitoring" the progress of integration in the armed forces. If you ask him what the chances are for the promotion of another Negro to general's rank, he will tell you that it's not too distant in the Army or Air Force, but that the prospects are not as bright in the Navy, where no Negro ranks above lieutenant commander. "It takes 27 years to produce an admiral," says Evans, "and we just haven't been in the business that long."

The National Guard, military reserve units and the Reserve Officers' Training Corps still contain significant pockets of resistance to the Federal policy of integration, primarily in the Southern states.

SPORTS

Another area in which your people have made indisputable progress is in the sports arena. Perhaps the most spectacular example is baseball. Since 1947, when Brooklyn's Branch Rickey brought Jackie Robinson to the Dodgers to break the color bar in baseball, Negro diamond stars have come into their own. Out of a total of 450 players in both major leagues during the 1961 season, 80 were Negroes.

In the National League, which has a third again as many Negroes as the American League, Negro players have almost dominated the game. Eight of the ten National Leaguers receiving the Most Valuable Player Award in the past decade have been Negroes, and a Negro was selected as Rookie of the Year in nine of the past 13 years. Recently, Robinson became the first of his race to enter baseball's Hall of Fame, while San Francisco's Willie Mays became the sport's highest-paid player today, at a salary of $90,000.

In professional football, Negroes are more than holding their own. Of the 504 players in the National Football League in 1961, 83 were Negroes, including seven on the Dallas team.

With the exception of golf, which has been slowest in lowering racial bars, Negroes have made their mark in all other major sports.

VOTING & JUSTICE

A crucial part of your position as a Negro in America is your access to the right to vote, to justice in the nation's courts and to fair treatment from police. The evidence shows you still have a long way to go.

The report of the 1961 U. S. Civil Rights Commission reveals that Negroes are prevented from voting—by outright denial or through fear of physical harm or economic reprisal—in 100 counties in eight Southern states. The report further points out that Negroes "have no real opportunity to serve on a grand or petit jury" in many communities. "A real understanding of the administration of justice in the United States cannot be had," the report goes on, without the knowledge that "Negroes generally do not have fair representation in the agencies of justice. . ." and are the most frequent targets of police brutality in many regions of the country.

Although the obstacles still confronting Negro Americans are formidable, you know many that have overcome racial barriers to win better jobs, more money and a higher standard of living. Fletcher Martin, Louisville-born Negro reporter on the Chicago Sun Times, says, "Being a Southern-reared Negro, I am both intrigued and delighted to look out of my office window at the numerous Negroes who have pleasure craft out on Lake Michigan. They certainly don't have them in Jackson, Mississippi!"

Sometimes, the Negro's new affluence has come as a by-product of segregation. Perhaps the wealthiest Negro community in America is to be found in Atlanta, Ga. There, cut off heretofore from many of the services available to whites, Negroes have developed multimillion-dollar banking and insurance firms to meet their own needs.

THE LEADERS, THE LED

Despite its gains, the Negro community in America today is seething with impatience at the rate of its progress—impatience of which the "sit-ins" and "Freedom Riders" are manifestations.

The organization that feels these pressures most keenly is perhaps the 53-year-old National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. If you are not one of the NAACP's 371,060 dues-paying members, you, like most of the other 19 million Negroes in America, probably share its goals. Long damned by white Southerners as a "radical" organization, the NAACP now finds itself under attack by a growing section of Negro opinion, which charges that it is "moving too slowly," that it favors court suits over more direct action such as "sit-ins" and that it is dominated by middle-class intellectuals who are out of touch with Negro masses and youth. Moreover, its civil-rights preserve is being encroached upon by newer groups such as the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), the Rev. Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference and a number of newly founded student movements.

Roy Wilkins, the association's Minnesota-reared executive secretary, denies this. "The general proposition that the NAACP has law books under one arm and the Supreme Court under the other is a myth," he'll tell you. "Sit-ins? We had sit-ins as long ago as 1929!"

While giving the student protest groups credit for some gains, Wilkins maintains, "The youth bring the fire and drive that's necessary, but it is the adults who do most of the organizing, planning and financing that are the backbone of this fight."

Wilkins says those who accuse the NAACP of being "legalistic" are often "those who want to act 'nonlegally'." He argues that the groundwork for the Negro's present advancement, including the right to unsegregated interstate travel, was laid by the NAACP in its many court battles.

Wilkins, too, is dissatisfied with the rate of the Negro's progress, but he acknowledges that there has been progress. "A couple of years ago," he says, "three Negro engineers at a General Electric plant complained that they would have to apply for a transfer because they couldn't get the kind of homes they wanted in the area where the plant was located. Twenty years ago, the problem would have been getting Negro engineers into G.E.!

"I have infinite good faith in the good sense of the American Negro," Wilkins adds. "He has managed to survive in a society that has erected every bear trap it could, which has hurt him psychologically with constant demeaning, year after year, decade after decade. But, despite job discrimination and other economic disadvantages, he has managed to send his kids to school, to get them an education. He made friends as he went along—he's a hell of a diplomat, you know. He might have made them by a little 'Uncle Tom-ing,' but he made them, and he survived."

Nevertheless, there are many Negroes within the ranks of the NAACP itself who feel that it is not militant enough about combatting the grievances that affect you and other Negroes in your day-to-day activities.

Many of these individuals are young college students and residents of the South. Perhaps typical of this group is Charles Black, a senior at Atlanta's Negro Morehouse College and one of the leaders of a student organization called the Committee on Appeal for Human Rights, whose sit-in demonstrations led to the desegregation of eating facilities of 13 Atlanta drug, department and dime-store firms in 1961.

Like most of the students taking part in demonstrations, Black

Diane Garrott, 21, went to work as a Trans World Airlines hostess in June, 1961—one of the first Negroes to hold such a job on a major U. S. airline. Until an ear infection recently grounded her, she symbolized a new breach in the color bar that surrounds "glamour jobs." Pioneering runs in her family. Diane's father, an attorney, was California's first Negro state policeman. Her grandfather was the first Negro police captain in Los Angeles. Her granduncle was California's first Negro dentist. Miss Garrott had no racial incidents in the air, but did not fly into the South.

Pioneers...

In professional tournament golf, 38-year-old Charlie Sifford (left) is attracting wide attention. He is the first Negro to be given tournament player's status by the Professional Golfers' Association. Reared in a poor Southern family, Sifford was bitten by the golf bug at 10, played his first games with gnarled sticks. At 15, he was breaking 70. He turned pro in 1952; with financial help from interested Negroes, he won or placed in several important tourneys. Despite the PGA's dropping of the color bar, Sifford's future in pro tournament golf is uncertain. Reasons: his age and the reluctance of many Southern clubs to invite him.

is a member of the NAACP, but he says, "The NAACP's officers don't seem to like direct-action programs. Their lawyers are usually available if we ask for them, but we try to avoid that. Take this restaurant thing, for instance. It might have taken ten years if we'd tried to push this through the national body."

The cleavage between the student groups and the NAACP is also one between youth and its elders. "We decided to work on these problems with our own organization, because then we don't have to answer to anybody," Black explains. "The older folk in the NAACP have become set in their ways. Litigation is necessary, but it is not the only way. I hate to use the word 'conservative,' but they don't do things the way we would."

One of the elders who agrees is Edward Warren, president of the NAACP's Los Angeles adult branch. "The current wave of sit-ins was not started by the NAACP," Warren asserts. "We saw them going, and then said, 'I'm your leader. Where are you going?' The students themselves just got tired of the situation, in city after city."

Warren says, "The old-guard philosophy of the elite leadership of the association does not appeal to the masses," but he concedes that the NAACP is still the organization to which most Negroes in trouble turn. In recent months, the NAACP, CORE and the Martin Luther King forces have moved to consolidate their efforts, with the NAACP contributing legal and financial assistance to CORE and to King's demonstrations.

There is one organization in your community that strives not for integration, but for total separation of the races—the militant Black Muslims. The Muslims demand that "some states" (they never say which or how many) be set aside for exclusive—and independent—occupation by all America's Negroes.

To the Black Muslims, all whites are "devils." Muslim leaders will tell you that white America is headed for the rocks and that you had better separate from it or go down with the ship. An estimated 100,000 Negro Americans have accepted this view and joined the Black Muslim movement. Muslim "temples" are located in more than 60 cities across the nation, North, South, East and West.

The Muslims are a rigidly disciplined group that draws adherents from the most underprivileged sections of America's Negro ghettos. They welcome those who have been ignored or rejected by other Negro groups. The Muslims give their converts a new frame of reference: the glorification of the black man and a total rejection of America's social system.

Muslims also reject the term "Negro" (they say they are "black men"), alcohol, tobacco, pork and all kinds of self-indulgence. Every Black Muslim exchanges "the name given him by his former slavemaster" for the surname "X" as a symbol of his new identity and his break with a society he despises.

The Muslims are especially critical of Negroes who preach nonviolence. "Malcolm X," head of Harlem's Muslims, told a Muslim audience, "Everybody defends himself when attacked but us—we are not supposed to fight back. Martin Luther King is like Novocain. The white man is hurting you, and King is going around telling you not to fight back. He's doing their job for them!"

Although Negro leaders privately condemn the racist and separatist aspect of the Muslim movement, few are willing to take a public stand against them, for they are aware of the desperation that spawned the movement.

In the midst of the American Negro's growing dissatisfaction with his rate of advancement, Negro leaders are being forced to make new appraisals of their own people. The economic improvement of urban Negroes has brought insistent demands for the end of Jim Crow in all sectors of their existence, in areas that used to be peripheral to Negro life.

A. P. Tureaud, veteran attorney for the NAACP in New Orleans,

Levell pilots his F-100 in an early-morning patrol over his German base.

Mission...

As a "bomb commander" in the U. S. Air Forces Europe (USAFE) strike force, Capt. Edward Levell, Jr., has one primary job: to deliver a retaliatory punch to a preselected target within minutes if an attack comes. Like his buddies in the Germany-based 417th Tactical Fighter Squadron, Levell spends most of his time aloft or on grueling, around-the-clock alert duty, a dash away from his waiting F-100 Super Sabre. His wife Kitty and their five sons live at the base, but Levell's duties often keep him from them. "During one six-week period, we only saw him for five hours," says Mrs. Levell, "but you get used to it." To Alabama-reared Eddie Levell, "the Air Force is an exciting life. I'm in it to stay." Levell spends many hours perfecting his flying and bombing techniques, although he has logged 2,000 hours and holds a coveted "select crew" rating. He says of his mission, "I'm a professional soldier. I'm not concerned with saving the plane or myself. My concern is delivering the weapon. That's why I'm here. When the bell rings, I go."

At a weekly "beer call" in officers' club, Levell enjoys a joke with fellow pilots. He commands a flight of seven planes in a squadron of four flights.

On 24-hour alert duty, Eddie Levell drinks one of the many cups of coffee he will consume while waiting. He eats and sleeps in flight gear while on alert.

Eddie's broken German amuses his wife Kitty, left, as they talk to visiting singing troupe.

On a day off, Levell referees football game between sixth-graders, sons of Air Force personnel. He played varsity football at Tuskegee.

Famous Negroes have a problem

says he once took up the complaints of Negroes who were barred from municipally owned New Orleans golf courses with the association's former chief counsel, Thurgood Marshall, now a Federal judge.

Marshall, engulfed in school-desegregation suits and sit-in cases, snorted: "Golf! I'm not interested in Negroes playing golf!" "But, Thurgood," Tureaud replied, "you've got to tend to the whole Negro, golfers and everybody else, not just the students."

Within your own community, you are often more critical than white people of Negro crime, illegitimacy and civic irresponsibility, although you know well the social and economic facts of life.

A highly placed Negro in the Federal Government says, "When I look in the paper and see there's been a rape or a mugging, and the suspect is a Negro, I'm embarrassed. Some Negroes say, 'To hell with it. It's not me.' But I'm afraid it is 'me.' " A Negro social worker in Chicago says, "Twenty-five per cent of the Negroes in this city are on some form of relief. It is not a fact of which we are proud."

For the Negro who achieves prominence, success often poses poignantly thorny problems. Such Negroes are idolized by other members of the race and are often trapped between the desire to be themselves and the role they are asked to play as idols. Some reject the special role; others do not.

Singer Barbara McNair, the first Negro woman to have a regularly sponsored television program, will tell you, "Those of us who are in special positions should be especially careful, because we are symbols. We should be good, not bad symbols.

"I'm a relaxed person. When I travel on a plane, I would wear slacks if I were white. Because I'm a Negro, I don't. People would say, 'Ah, HAH! That's a Negro for you!' "

Talk to Judge James B. Parsons of Chicago, first Negro to be appointed to a Federal district-court bench, and he will point out another aspect of this conflict in roles. "My job is to sit on the bench and not know the color of the people who come before me," he says. "I know I run the risk of being misunderstood by Negroes who want to see a sword-in-hand Negro out there fighting for civil rights, but my job involves being incapable of noticing a person's skin color. I'm a natural optimist. Perhaps it is because I did not come from the Deep South. I haven't had the experiences which make me bitter, and perhaps this is best. It helps me to see not just the oppressed Negro, but the oppressed Negro as part of a damnable ethnic system that permeates the Chicago area. It's hard to be an Italian in some Chicago neighborhoods."

Not all Negroes have acquired Judge Parsons's detachment. James L. Hicks, editor of Harlem's weekly Amsterdam News, says, "I've been fooled and frustrated about racial things so many, many times by white people that I can't help it—most of the time when a white man promises me something racially good, I simply place him on probation. If he does what he says he's going to do, I am happy to have found another one who kept his word with a Negro. If he runs out on his word, I dismiss it by saying, 'That's exactly what I expected.' But I'm never left waiting at the church, because I simply don't get dressed and run to the altar every time a white person says he loves me.

"In short, when it comes to dealing with the white man on racial lines, I follow the Harlem proverb, 'Blessed is he who expects nothing, for he shall not be disappointed.' "

When you talk to some of the Negroes working for access to housing in the suburbs, they will admit there are some wealthy Negroes who would not move to the suburbs if they could. "They find it more congenial in the ghetto where, although segregated, they may have lavish homes," said one. "Moreover, for the Negro politician or businessman, his sources of power or money lie in the Negro community, and he would be cutting his own throat if he moved away from it. Besides, it's more trouble to get to and from the suburbs."

A Northern Negro newspaperman, however, sees suburbia as a welcome form of escape from constant preoccupation with "The Problem." "Man, sometimes I just get tired of talking to Negroes," he says. Many other Negroes reflect this feeling.

As you try to figure out what your position is in America today, you will concede that you have made some rather large strides, but you will know that, from where you sit, the millennium is nowhere in sight. If you are United Nations Under Secretary Ralph Bunche, your son may still be turned away from a tennis club when it is discovered that he is a Negro; if you are Deputy Assistant Secretary of State Carl Rowan, you may have difficulty getting service in a Kansas City nightclub; and though you are Municipal Judge James C. Flanigan of Denver, you may still be refused admission to a local golf course.

After more than three hundred years in America, your people are still climbing a slope named Hope toward a summit named Equality. There are still many crevasses and a lot of climbing ahead.

Unlike America's other ethnic groups, the Negro has not been able to "join" the American people by dint of education and income. His skin is still his prison. But the outcome of the American democratic experiment depends largely on whether all its citizens, regardless of color, can avail themselves of America's opportunities. In that sense, your struggle is America's too.

For additional copies, write to COMMUNITY RELATIONS SERVICE
Institute of Human Relations
165 East 56 Street
New York 22, N. Y.

Social Progress
April, 1962

R & R Rel.

Reorganization in the Casbah

By Nicholas von Hoffman, Supervisor of the Woodlawn Project for the Industrial Areas Foundation, Chicago, Illinois

PEOPLE'S thoughts are captives of their vocabularies. When we use the expression "community organization" we are automatically accepting certain shaky assumptions. We are implying that there are communities which are not organized, that every community ought to be "organized," and that community organizing is a profession apart from others, like law or engineering. Personally I believe that all three propositions are either false or highly misleading.

So far as I know there are no disorganized communities. The two words cancel each other out. The word "community" sums up a host of organized relationships. I don't want to get involved in fine distinctions, or I will be like the sociologists who don't even agree on what a society is. When I talk about organized relationships I mean nothing fancier than relations between people that are recognized by all, that are frequent, and that anybody who knows the community can reasonably anticipate as he moves about from person to person. Wherever you have that, you have a community of some kind. And you have that wherever people are making their homes. It's the difference between a hotel and a boardinghouse. The one doesn't have a crisscross of common relationships and practices; the other does, and is a little community.

You may say that I am splitting hairs. You might concede that there may not be disorganized communities but there certainly are disorganized geographic districts, especially in big cities where a lot of people live without community—that is, without organization. On the surface the statement seems plausible, but a little reflection should make you doubt it. The instances on record of even a small number of people living closely together in a state of semi-anarchy are very rare. I don't know of one.

Skid Row, which is a place where people go because they want to escape social and legal control, turns out to be a kind of "anticommunity." An "anticommunity" is a community founded on values and interests that are the reverse of the dominant world enclosing it. Even the Bohemian sections of big cities are not peopled by disorganized individuals. They have their own communities too.

According to the ancients the act of creation was bringing order out of chaos. It has been left to men to reorganize from time to time. Organizing of every sort is actually reorganizing. Let's not arrogate to ourselves, even in our thinking, powers and responsibilities that belong to the gods. In saying that organizing is in reality reorganizing, I am not trifling with a petty distinction. Many people who talk about community organization define it as organizing a "disorganized" mass of people who seem to be detached islets in the moving river of society.

Such thinking quickly jumps to the assertion that "such and such a place cannot be organized because the people are too disorganized." We have all heard the remark, and we have seen sensible people nod their heads in agreement. The speaker could be right, but there are no such places, and we are not called to organize anyhow; our work is reorganization.

After having invented the impossible fiction of a "disorganized community" some sociologists have set out to prove it empirically. Of course they were successful, and the myth of the disorganized lower-class Negro, Puerto Rican, or Southern white community became an established fact. The repercussions of having demonstrated the validity of a false proposition have been enormous. Government policies in education, welfare, housing, and law enforcement have been based on it. Since it is a fundamental tenet that disorganized communities cannot be organized, tiny committees of professionals with time to meet for lunch were judged the optimum organizational activity possible. Many men who might have accomplished real good did not try, since it had been demonstrated that results were all but impossible.

Lower-Class Negro Community

I want to stick with the lower-class Negro community because the future of its people will largely shape the future of our cities themselves. Also, by looking into these districts we can find out a lot about the organization and reorganization of people in general. For the same difficulties arise in many white areas, but since their problems are less intense the underlying similarities are less in evidence.

Lower-class Negro sections have their share of natural community. Political groups flourish in them. Churches that have not had their incentive sapped by debilitating denominational subsidies develop organization and substance. Throughout, a web of gambling organizations provides a fine communications network. There are such trade associations as the organization of beauticians, barbers, and saloon keepers. Sometimes the organizations are formal and elaborate; sometimes they are informal and simple. There are the clubs, lodges, fraternities, and sororities. Blocks and buildings have their small groups that usually revolve around some outstanding local figure who may be simply a resident but is also frequently a flat janitor, a barber, or a building manager. Among these and more groupings are types of organization that the outside world recognizes. I speak of churches in the major denominations, PTA's, social agencies, and such miscellaneous associations as the League of Women Voters. They are in the community but aloof from it. Their contacts are unbelievably sparse and their penetration is almost nil. The isolation of the "respectable" organizations confirms the disorganized-community hypothesis in the minds of their staff people. From their vantage point, the neighborhood does indeed look like demoralized anarchy.

Usually the groups that suffer from being cut off are what I like to think of as "branch office" organizations. The local PTA or major-denomination church or social agency is a replica of a form and program devised elsewhere under other circumstances. You might call it a standard brand pushed into a specialized market that has no call for what is being offered. But the branch office has no power to change the "line." It must sell what the central warehouse sends it. I have watched this happen even when the people in the branch office knew. better. The subordinates in many local social agencies will laugh behind their bosses' backs. The underlings are usually less well paid, less part of and less interested in the downtown world, where programs and policies are conceived. Being closer to the community they are less prone to let theory wipe out fact.

There are purely political reasons why, for example, a local YMCA in a lower-class Negro neighborhood will carry out a perfectly pointless program year after year. The people who own the Y's don't want any trouble. But I have also seen churches and social agencies fail to exploit rich opportunities out of dogmatic stubbornness. Mediocre, doctrinaire professionalism has littered the poor sections of our cities with immobile, unadaptable, institutional dinosaurs. These beasts can neither feed themselves nor support their own weight. They violate the law of the survival of the fittest, thanks to a large vested interest in failure. The failure to attract support from the beneficiaries or to get results can't possibly be disguised. Failure is used to demonstrate how bad things are and how badly the services are needed. Thus, repeated failures supervised by qualified professionals assure the annual subsidy.

An enormous amount of rationalizing is needed to keep such a system going. The mess in the community surrounding the branch offices is too awful to be covered up. So the justification is that, inadequate as they are, the branch office staff are the only hope. For evidence the branch office managers hold up the people's nonexistent "disorganization" again. Those who are told about it must believe what they hear. They couldn't know better. Their ignorance has made them terrified of the lower-class Negro community. With heads stuffed full of lurid tales of rape and narcotics, they are gullible setups for swallowing any wild story. The phantasmagorias that are soberly passed on to philanthropic administrators and benefactors as research are the more credible because their tellers are convinced that they are true.

A Person with a Following

The interval between the crazy notion of a disorganized community and a leaderless one is short. No comment about lower-class Negro communities finds more utterance than the bromide about lack of leadership.

No people has ever been without leaders. They may not have been smart or good at bringing home the bacon to their followers, but leaders there always are aplenty. Well, what is a leader? This definition may be simple-minded—namely, that a leader is a person with a following—but it is useful for understanding. If you will go along with the definition, then you will see that a lower-class Negro area is swarming with leaders.

The leaders are not well-educated white collar types. Some leaders are on ADC, but the going theory is that a woman on ADC must be a slob. That word is never spoken. Adjustment, dependency, aspirational level are the words used, but they mean slob. All kinds of irrelevant reasons are used to knock people off the leadership lists. None of them have anything to do with whether or not Jones or Smith has a following. The practice of not recognizing popularly chosen leadership is as old as politics, but it can be a dangerous game. The Negro population affords a good example.

The white world has picked out the Negro leaders it cares to recognize. It complains that there are too few of them, not realizing that only a certain number of people will consent to be lackeys, or Uncle Toms and Aunt Tomasitas, as they are called by the millions of Negroes they do not lead. Being a puppet, even at good wages, is a hard job. Since the leaders the whites have chosen for the Negroes are either detested by their supposed followers or unknown to them, they are never able to get Negroes to obey orders. The whites are displeased by their quislings' inability to get Negroes, particularly lower-class ones, to behave. They complain that the Negro leadership is untrained. Massive adult education is prescribed, and the Uncle Toms are marched off to school to learn leadership skills. After being put through the leadership-training spaghetti machine (the product is an extremely thin pasta with a hollow center) the leaders return, as ineffectual as ever.

"Community organization" now intrudes itself into our line of vision. The "community organizers" are also representatives of the repudiated name brands. They run smack into the same insolubilities. In short order the "community organization" develops into a professional luncheon circle. There is talk about indigenous leadership, adult education, urbanization, and acculturation. Recently some effort in the direction of housing has been included. The results are so scanty that a whole rationale has been developed to demonstrate that results aren't important. The thinking is that doing, not getting, counts. The atmosphere changes to the therapeutic climate of the outpatient clinic. Words like "process" and "experience" are loudly spoken.

The profit to the individual and the society, we are told, is invisible but even more worth-while than palpable accomplishment. Potential leaders are having experiences that will stand them and us in good stead at an unspecified future date. The naked emperor is walking the streets again while his ravished subjects praise his "experiential" robes. In the meantime truth grows uglier, and we begin to cast about for other ideas.

Let's go back to the lower-class

Negro area for instructional material. I have already said that it, the prime example of a disorganized community, does not and cannot exist. I should now like to argue that its nonexistent leadership is actually alive and kicking. The leaders are the men and women running the organized groups that the experts have empirically demonstrated don't exist.

These undiscovered leaders are inconveniently realistic in their judgments. When you find them, which is very easy, they point to a system which they say is the cause of most of the community's and the people's woe. The system is summed up by words like "Jim Crow" and "discrimination." The true leadership is remorseless in crying that the great money and power interests maintain, and profit by, the system. The leadership persists in espousing causes and policies that will blow up storms of peppery controversy.

We have come to the heart of the matter. The leadership is calling into question the conduct and arrangement of society. The leaders are demanding great and deep changes.

Business of Politics

To me their demands place the whole discussion in the domain of politics. The arrangement of society and the conduct of the state are, more than anything else, the proper business of politics. Community and politics, as the words are usually used, are things apart—but are they?

"Every state is a community of some kind," says Aristotle, who adds that "he who by nature and not by mere human accident is without a state is either a bad man or above humanity." Obviously, that is a far cry from the narrow partisan cheering that we customarily call politics. Serious political thinkers, beginning with the Greeks, have passed over electioneering as a minor part of man's political activities. They begin their thinking about the family, property, education, and the other aspects of society that some of us pass over as "nonpolitical." The moderns, from Montesquieu through Marx and Ortega y Gasset, do the same.

Community

In democratic societies, particularly, most politics is nonpartisan. Official actions of party and government usually ratify decisions already arrived at in a variety of other ways. That is not a cynical allusion to the "back room boys" but a recognition that the form and substance of popular government is closely determined by the society that erects and maintains it.

The unrecognized leader in a lower-class Negro community is absolutely right when he insists on keeping political considerations paramount. He knows that programs to curtail high school "dropouts" are worthless when high school students are barred by discriminatory hiring practices from employment. He knows that conservation and rehabilitation programs cannot improve housing because the people do not have the income to afford the improvements. He knows PTA's are laughable objects because they are the creatures of school systems that deliberately fail to educate his children.

Because he knows these things he shrugs his shoulders at what the standard brands offer. The church with its business-as-usual routine offers him little—not even a sympathetic voice. The recreational social agency gives second-rate athletic and social distractions that are not appreciated when present nor missed when absent. The relief worker is an adjunct of an unfriendly government. To the unrecognized actual leaders, these services are barbiturates. They anesthetize against the pain inflicted by a system of society and government that leaders and followers loathe and execrate.

It may bother some people to learn that innocent health and education and general welfare programs are looked at this way. That is because they are not thinking politically. The unrecognized leadership is thinking politically. The political mind looks broadly, sees interlocking factors as they operate on the totality, and asks: Where is all this going? Do we want to go there? Political understanding quickly arrives at some very uncomplimentary judgments about the standardized programs. To many unrecognized leaders the major objection is not to the programs' inadequacy but results from a belief that their purpose is to keep the leaders and their people in subjection.

Never is such a state of affairs more obvious than in lower-class Negro neighborhoods where the leadership is engaged in active resistance to the reigning policies. The refusal to co-operate, which outsiders term apathy, and the outright resistance, which is called unurbanized or antisocial behavior, are two of the weapons used in a struggle that local leadership views as political. The outside world prefers to talk as though the problem were medical. By that I mean that the lower-class Negro neighborhood is talked about the way doctors talk about pathology. The people are converted into patients who are to be passive while they are operated on and cured. When the "patients" fight back we misread their reactions and declare that their opposition is another symptom of what ails them. I am not exaggerating, as anyone who has heard the experts talk about "social engineering" and "social planning" will verify.

The Ripening of Casbahs

The root of the difficulty is that the true leadership has never been able to force recognition from people outside the leadership's home base. The result is that in an odd way the leaders are winning the battle but not gaining the victory. What I have in mind when I say that is not very pleasant. I mean that in the big-city slum or near-slum districts the dominant society is being driven out. The ultimate was reached last summer when the New York police were assailed by pop bottles hurled from the roof tops by an unfriendly populace. In such sections, law and order, education, social work, the good and the bad manifestations of the ruling world, are in full retreat and are very close to being driven out entirely. Heretofore we have had national enclaves, voluntary and involuntary ghettoes, in our big cities; now we are menaced by the ripening of casbahs where our writs do not run, where outsiders dare not go, and where a dangerously separate world is coming into existence.

It is in this sense that I mean that unrecognized leadership is winning the battle. The leaders are chasing the nonindigenous world out of the casbahs and assuming local control. I wish I could say this was a sturdy example of self-government, but it is not. Anyone familiar with certain sections of New York and Chicago will quickly agree. The power of the state has been successfully challenged, and what should be a source of support and strength for the state's democratic institutions is changing into the very reverse.

For the local leaders the victory is very unprofitable. They have chased their oppressors' chosen representatives perhaps, but they have not defeated oppression. They have broken up every attempt to impose policies and arrangements on them, but they have not been able to create and put in force their own.

Why not? I answer, because their leadership has not been recognized. And why hasn't it been? I don't think it is either fair or accurate to lay all the blame on the people whom we have picked as our go-betweens. It is true that social workers, city planners, clergymen, and other professionals whom we have made our delegates have been astoundingly dense and morbidly taken up with academic will-o'-the-wisps, but their inadequacies do not explain the present mess.

I repeat that all the blame cannot fairly be put on the outside professionals. Some know better and do what they do only because it is a condition of employment. Many of the rest do merit scorn. I have witnessed rice Christianity in our slums that would result in an American missionary abroad being expelled from the country. At a recent church-sponsored meeting I was astonished to hear a discussion of social services as a device for hooking new members. It is a cause of personal rejoicing to me that men here and the world over hurl such "assistance" back in the faces of the spiritual cannibals who offer food in exchange for souls. I say the same to those who use social services to inculcate so-called "middle-class" values in people denied middle-class opportunities and income. I cannot get over our practicing a colonialism on our own fellow citizens we dare not inflict on the Stone Age aborigines of the central Australian desert.

The casbah's leaders can only fight guerilla warfare. Their resistance has been very, in fact spectacularly, effective, but it has been resistance and resistance only. The nature and extent of their power and organization has precluded their forcing recognition and mounting an affirmative drive.

While there is almost a unanimity of opinion in the casbahs—I continue to use this example because it makes things dramatically clear—the forms of organization have been good for little more than resistance. The leaders of a thousand small groupings are not in touch with one another. No vehicle exists to mass power for activities beyond each small district. No single leader or grouping is by himself or itself strong enough to demand and get recognition.

I cannot imagine a worse situation. The outside forces have been defeated and driven out for all intents and purposes, but the victorious leaders are not organized in a manner that permits them to follow up their essentially defensive or negative triumph with positive action. I wish I could say that we can take this state of affairs to mean that we have reached an impasse. Impasses are static, but humans aren't or at least they aren't for long. The communities we are speaking of continue their rebellious course, but after the big success of establishing the fact that they will either rule themselves or not be ruled at all, more guerilla warfare is needless. It is destructive and commits the people to a downward devolution to nowhere. It releases more and more personal desperation in destructive spasms that yield no good result. So it has always been in politics when the people who have the power can't or won't assume office. In the instance we are talking about, the leaders with the power can't assume office.

They can't, that is, unless there is a great reorganization. They must pool their power to form an instrument for taking charge in an affirmative sense. By coming together in larger and wider unity they can consecrate leaders of sufficient power and backing to force recognition. Moreover, a larger and wider union permits the leaders to conceive and promulgate specific concrete and affirmative programs.

Unfinished Revolution

We are looking at an unfinished revolution. For practical purposes, the old regime's power has been broken. It sits outside the revolutionary district's borders with a titular control which it considers still in effect by sending occasional excursions into the casbah. Within, the revolutionaries, who have made almost a clean sweep, do not realize the extent of their accomplishments, nor do they have the faintest idea how to follow up what they have done.

I hope no one will make the mistake of thinking that what I have been describing is novel. It is a political dilemma that has recurred one way or another since history has been recorded. There have been times when the incipient revolutionaries have been stamped out, and the fundamentally unstable situation has been taken care of by drastic purge. Sometimes the outcome has been brighter. A new and legitimate power has been created by internal reorganization.

How has that come about? For instance why haven't the local, unrecognized leaders in the casbahs pushed on to the next step? For the most part they have never thought of it, they don't know how, and besides no single one of them has the resources to do what needs doing. Nor is their situation new to human experience. New forms and patterns of action have often come about only when an outside element has been added to the political chemistry. Many revolutions, be they violent or nonviolent, are traceable to outsiders.

Moses, whatever his blood pedigree, grew up an Egyptian. Lenin was a worker no more than Clement Atlee, and the Frenchmen who were the schoolmasters of the American Revolution were certainly not provincial colonists. The outsider is often the final and indispensable catalyst for change.

If we explore the many probable reasons for the outsider's playing this part in politics, we will have to roam too far afield. Suffice it to say that outsiders are customarily less likely to fail to see the forest for the trees. Their fresh viewpoint opens men's eyes to new formations, new tactics, to the road that goes toward the constitution of a new order.

The outsider is the reorganizer. Haven't we all sat at a chessboard looking pessimistically at our pieces when a friend has walked up, glanced at the chessmen, and made a simple move that seemed like revelation? Usually the move is obvious in retrospect. The friend has reorganized our thinking for us. He added nothing more than a new way of looking at old facts. Newton wasn't the only man in Europe who knew about Kepler's spherical orbits; but he was the only man to see a new way of thinking about them. Mao Tse-tung wasn't the only revolutionary in China, but he was the only revolutionary who could reorder the ways of looking at the facts of China to make a revolution. The same can be said of Ghandi.

Reorganizing of the sort I am speaking about can go and has gone under a variety of names, from Calvinism to community organization. The choice of names is pretty much dictated by the propaganda necessities of the moment. What remains constant is the purely political nature of the activity.

Politics of Change

All politics is arduous and difficult, but the politics of change, which is really what we are talking about, is the most difficult of all. The material is the most volatile, the most uncertain, and the most likely to run off in ways the originators never dreamed could happen. Robespierre, officiating at what he knows are the asininities of the goddess of reason, is a warning against believing change is easily managed. The best change and the best revolution is orderly because order preserves the best of the old, to which it adds the best of the new. The best revolutions are orderly because there is less likelihood of provoking a counterrevolution. The New Deal set the seal on an orderly revolution and thereby tamed the counterrevolutionary furor to an irreducible minimum, to wit, Taft-Hartley.

But the politics of change, whether seen as orderly revolution or as armed upheaval, is not choosing abrupt change over a more desirable evolutionary change. The unwarranted introduction of the evolutionary idea into social and political thinking has been a deceiving curse. Societies do not evolve. They do not obey unconscious laws of their own nature. They are the deliberate creations of men. They change when men decide to change them. The changes are not always wise, or even understood by the changers, but what happens is the outcome of conscious, purposeful action. That the actors are sometimes wholly mistaken about the end product is no ground for modifying this statement.

Men often speak as though we had a choice between swift action and more gradual evolutionary change. The idea is invoked when debate over putative change gets too fierce. The case made in regard to the American Casbah is resisted with the argument that it is better to await the day of evolutionary ameliorations of the system. Such talk is nonsense.

People are always looking for the soft way out of making hard decisions. Eyewash about evolution and education is the language they hope will spare them conflict. I hope you will not entertain the false hope of expecting vital change to emerge without angry conflict. Let us look at two great orderly revolutions instituted by the English-speaking peoples. I refer to the great Reform Act of 1832 in England and the Supreme Court decision of 1954 in the United States. The one opened the door to modern representative government; the other permitted us to walk through it. In both cases the previous fifty years had been given over to arguments purporting to demonstrate that the change could come gradually through education and the mystery of unwilled metamorphosis. You may call it progress or evolution. In the end nothing of the sort happened. A decision had to be made, and in both instances it was bitterly resisted in some quarters.

Looking back after the deed is done, chroniclers have pronounced change gradual. They observe that people were not ready and that it took many years to educate and prepare them for the moment of change. In truth, the gap in time between an idea's being proposed and its being carried out is more plausibly explained as the time needed to gather the power to force the decision.

The evolutionary idea is a happy ex post facto rationalization. It allows people to say, "See, we were really going to do it all the time." Inasmuch as the losing side can use it to save face, it helps to heal wounds that are best speedily closed. But, regardless of how convenient the apology may be, we must not confuse it with the real ways change occurs.

Quarterly Reorganization

Now I think we can try out a definition for "community organization." For me, it is the age-old political activity of helping to reorganize a society so that it can change to meet the wishes of its people in a manner that is not without conflict but that is orderly. I stuck in the sloppy clause about conflict lest anyone harbor a vestige of hope that he can get off without it. Actually, the qualification is unnecessary, since conflict is the measure of change. Change cannot exist without conflict, and where conflict is disclaimed there has been no change. It must be so because no change can come about by which all profit as individuals. Change creates new winners and new losers in a society. The winners cheer and the losers groan, although all may benefit indirectly if the change is one that enriches the society.

Some people carry on as if to say that no community should be without its "community organization." If you are prone to concur with this analysis, you will agree that such organizational activity is scarcely wanted everywhere.

Our reorganization or orderly revolution is obviously to be saved for special cases. It should be reserved for communities and peoples who find the apparatus available to them inadequate. Such drastic measures, must have urgent cause. Every community has its problems. Some will never be solved, some cannot be in this generation, and some are of the minor sort that can be taken care of with the means at hand if the people affected so desire. In such communities the people are doing well enough taking care of themselves. Our interference would be officious. We would have nothing to offer, and the odds are that our contribution would be a net minus. Our object is to make democratic self-rule work, and where it is working we should leave it alone. Given half a chance, men run their own business best.

Our attention should fasten on the places where the democratic system has never been introduced or has broken down. It takes no research or scholarly beard-pulling to spot them. They are brutally and crudely evident. We belong there, working at the reorganization which men must manufacture to provide themselves with the tools essential to self-government.

Should the Professional Do the Job?

Who should do the kinds of political activity we have been talking about? Is this work that ought to be restricted to the professionals? The Industrial Areas Foundation has sometimes been criticized for using nonprofessionals as staff members and censured for helping to build powerful organizations totally controlled by nonprofessionals. Do such people have the knowledge and judgment commensurate with the power they exercise?

Democracy is a system of government that abolishes a professional ruling group. It transfers the responsibility for the state to every citizen individually. If for any reason too many citizens cannot or will not do their duty, the system must fall to pieces. Perhaps the least important duty a citizen has in a democracy is voting. The ballot box is the last resort of a citizenry that has not been looking after its affairs closely enough. Electing the good men or throwing out the rascals cannot take the place of a people's careful and thoughtful day-to-day management and supervision of the work of running a society and a state.

Some of our people cannot do their duty as citizens because they are deliberately stopped. Another portion of our people will not because their private lives have obliterated their public selves. Probably both groups deserve our attention, and it may be that by the time the last chapter of American history is completed we shall repent not applying ourselves to the second group. Justice conveys the greater claim to the first, who would enjoy their rights and do their duty if they were allowed. A profession that enjoys others' rights and does others' duties is not a profession in reality, but a paid ruling class. The reasons may seem good and sufficient, but every time we resort to professionals, we are usurping the citizens' indispensable place in a democracy. Democracy is a faith which holds that in the long run people have the judgment and wisdom to exercise power in their own name.

Does it make sense to speak of professionals? Exclude those who happen to be paid for their political work. They are professional as some golfers are pros and some amateurs. What I have in mind is the person who goes to school and graduates into a profession, laying claim to a scientific body of knowledge and a suitcase full of skills and techniques. No such political profession exists. None ever will.

A few courses in leadership training and popularized sociology equips one for nothing. Such credentials can't be taken seriously and are laughed at everywhere except in schools and other sheltered places where the young and tender collect. I won't expatiate on the proper training for politics. That subject is also one that has occupied the best minds, and having nothing worth-while to add, I limit myself to reminding you that the Greeks doubted that anybody but men of years and experience could understand it.

You do not have to be a Greek philosopher to see that academic qualifications won't get you into the ball park. The Industrial Areas Foundation, which operates on the assumptions stated in this paper, is asked by many people and many organizations to come and help. The requests are made because IAF has a reputation for performance. Of course we aren't always successful—nothing like it—but our efforts do bear fruit often. The price for remaining in the field of political or social action is relevance. Nothing succeeds like it and nothing substitutes for it.

You may take those observations as the amoral words of power politics. They are not so intended. Politics is a serious business of supreme importance. Listen to Aristotle: "If all communities aim at some good, the state or political community, which is the highest of all, and which embraces the rest, aims at good in a higher degree than any other, and at the highest good." The highest good is not to be managed by failure: the highest good must be attended by success.

Reprinted by permission of the author and Social Progress, April 1962

R+R Rel.

BOY: An Experience in the Search for Identity

A Dramatic Sketch

by Malcolm Boyd

NOTES: BOY is also distributed by the Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity, 5 Forsyth St., N.W., Atlanta 3, Ga., which is handling Chaplain Boyd's three one-act plays, STUDY IN COLOR. It is included on the second reel of the tape recordings of the original productions done in Detroit in the fall of 1962 which are also available from the Society. Groups desiring to include BOY in their production of STUDY IN COLOR may do so at no additional royalty charge from that stipulated in the royalty agreement for STUDY IN COLOR. Where BOY is produced independently, there is a $5.00 royalty fee when an admissions charge is made or an offering received.

Needed for the production of BOY are two white masks and one black mask, and a shoe shine bo . JOHN is played by a white actor wearing a black mask, a khaki shirt with rolled-up sleeves, etc. MAN is played by a Negro actor wearing a white mask and a bus ness suit.

Additional copies of this script are available for 25¢ each from the Episcopal Society at the above address.

(John is standing alone on stage. He wears a black mask. A man, wearing a white mask, enters and walks toward him.)

JOHN: May I shine your shoes, sir?

MAN: My shoes? oh, why, yes, boy. Get to work, boy. Shine 'em up.

JOHN: Yes, sir. (He kneels down by his shoe box; he works a few moments on the shoes in silence.)

It's a very nice day today, sir.

MAN: Yes. It is. (Pause) You makin' out, boy? How you makin' out, boy?

JOHN: (deliberate laughter) Yes, sir. Yes, sir. Would you like a real shiny surface on your shoes, sir?

MAN: (laughs) I'll bet you been makin' out, boy. Yes, I'll just bet you been makin' out. (Pause) With a white woman, boy?

JOHN: (Frightened) No, sir. Oh, no, sir. I just do my work, sir, and try to mind my own business, sir. I ain't lookin' for no trouble, sir.

MAN: You know what we'll do to you if you go lookin' for trouble, don't you, black boy? (Laughs) Ah .. ah. You're smart. Keepin' out of trouble. You just stay smart, black boy. You listenin' to me?

JOHN: Yes, sir. I sure am, sir. I don't want to get into no trouble, sir.

MAN: That's right. Just don't you go gettin' into no trouble, black boy. Damn it, boy, spit on that shoe. Spit on it, spit on it ... make it shine, make it shine like your face, black boy.

JOHN: Yes, sir. (Spits on shoe; furiously shines the shoe) Is that right, sir? Is that the way you want it, sir?

MAN: (Playing with him) It don't shine yet, black boy, like your face. Spit on it. Spit on it, damn it. Where's your spit?

(John spits on the shoe, again; he shines it furiously)

You ain't gonna get nowhere in this white man's world if you're so damned lazy, black boy ... if you won't spit. If you won't spit. What's your spit worth, anyway? Hmm? Answer me, goddam it, answer me when I speak to you, boy!

JOHN: Yes, sir. I'm sorry, sir. You're right, sir. I'm sorry, sir.

MAN: What's your spit worth, black boy?

JOHN: Nothin', sir. Nothin' at all, sir.

MAN: What isn't worth nothin' at all, boy?

JOHN: (After a pause) My spit, sir. My spir ain't worth nothin' at all, sir.

MAN: (Laughs loudly) Goddammit, you're right. You're right. You're a smart black boy. Your spit ain't worth nothin' at all. (Tosses him a coin which, as he meant it to do, falls on the ground) Pick it up, boy. (Pause) Pick it up.

JOHN: (reaches for the coin) Thank you, sir. Thank you, sir.

MAN: (Starts to walk away) That's all right. That's all right, black boy. (He stops, then turns back to address John.) That's a pretty good shine, yes sir, man, that shoe shines like your black face now, nigger. (Laughs; he goes out)

John is left alone on the stage. He quietly kneels down and sorts out the pieces of equipment in his shoeshine box. He takes out a white mask. He holds it in his hands for a long moment. Then he looks furtively around; he stands up; he walks first in one direction, then in another, looking to see if anyone is coming. Then, suddenly, he puts on the white mask.

JOHN: (He places his foot forward and speaks to an imaginary shoeshine boy) Nigger! Shine my shoes, nigger. (Pause; he laughs) No, dammit, Spit on the shoe, black boy. Spit. Spit. How much is your spit worth, anyway, boy? Who do you think you are, nigger? You think you're a big shot, nigger? You think you're so goddam important, migger? (There is a long silence. He has withdrawn his foot. Now, slowly, he puts his foot back in place for the imaginary shoeshine boy. He still wears the white mask.) Would you please give my shoes a shine, sir? Why, yes ... a good black shine will be fine. (Pause) It's a nice day, isn't it? (Pause) My wife and I thought we might go to the show at the movie house tonight. Have you ... have you seen that movie yet, sir ... you and your wife? You have? Did you like it? I see. Well, yes, as a matter of fact, I had heard that criticism of it. (Pause) What do you think of the election? How's it going? (Pause; then a friendly laugh) I guess we agree, sir, on politics. Yes, we certainly do. Well, thank you so much for the shine, sir. Thank you so much. (Reaches out with a coin, accidently drops it, then quickly kneels down to pick it up and hand it to the other man.) Oh, pardon me. Pardon me. Here. Here it is. I'm very sorry, that was clumsy of me. Well, goodbye. Goodbye ... (He starts to walk away. He stops and turns) Say, there's a new eating place that's very nice. If you and your wife are going out for a meal, it's just a block and a half up from the theatre. The Rainbow. Have you heard of it? You might like it. Your wife might like it. Yes. Good food, very reasonable, good service, it seems. Yes. Well, goodbye. Goodbye. (He continues to walk away. Then, suddenly, he stops; slowly he removes the white mask. He looks down at it, holding it in his hands for a long moment; then he walks back to the shoeshinebox and places the mask inside it. He stands up, seemingly struggling within himself terribly for a moment. He removes his Negro mask. Slowly, he moves forward, and, speaking directly to the audience, he is talking to himself.)

Who am I? Who am I really? Who am I? Who am I?

(He goes back to his shoeshine box. Kneeling over it, he cries. When he stops, he puts on his black mask.)

VOICE OF THE WHITE MAN is heard, angrily, demandingly: Boy! Boy! Come here, boy! Boy!

VOICE OF A WOMAN is heard, loudly, and angrily, shouting; Boy! Do you hear me? Come here, boy!

OTHER VOICES are heard, shouting, angrily: Boy! Boy! Come here, boy! Do you hear me, boy!??

(Suddenly the crescendo of voices comes to an abrupt conclusion. John stands with a quiet, but firm, dignity. In the stark silence, he speaks.)

JOHN: (Slowly, wonderingly) I am not a boy. (With a growing realization, not so much of who he is, as of who he is not; the words are to be read as if they were followed by a comma, and the audience must complete the final, uncompleted phrase.) I am not boy

Copyright 1962

Malcolm Boyd

Race & Race Rel.

ROLES OF CITIZEN AND SOCIOLOGIST IN RACE RELATIONS IN THE SOUTH*

by J. Kenneth Morland, Randolph-Macon Woman's College

Introduction

The challenge to legally enforced racial segregation in the South and the consequent changes that are ensuing have involved sociologists in a number of different ways. They have carried out basic research on such topics as social correlates of attitudes toward desegregation, Negro leadership in the protest movement, roles of religious leaders in desegregation, the relation of demographic factors and prointegration activity, and value conflicts in feelings about segregation.[1] The South has provided a laboratory for testing hypotheses about the structure of race relations and the factors associated with changes in such relations. Sociologists have also acted as expert witnesses in court cases dealing with desegregation, and as consultants and as directors of surveys for organizations devoted to influencing race relations. In addition to their work in basic research and in practical application, sociologists are also found as active participants in partisan race relations organizations.

---

* A paper to be presented to the 57th Annual Meeting of the American Sociological Association, Washington, D. C., August 30, 1962. A grant from Randolph-Macon Woman's College helped to make preparation of this paper possible and is gratefully acknowledge.

1. Examples of such research include: E. Q. Campbell, "Moral Discomfort and Racial Segregation," SOCIAL FORCES, 39 (March, 1961), 258-262; E. Q. Campbell and T. F. Pettigrew, CHRISTIANS IN RACIAL CRISIS: A STUDY OF LITTLE ROCK'S MINISTRY, Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press, 1959; A. L. Coleman, "Social Scientists' Predictions about Desegregation," SOCIAL FORCES, 38 (March, 1961), 258-262; L. M. Killian and C. U. Smith, "Negro Protest Leaders in a Southern Community," SOCIAL FORCES, 38 (March, 1960), 253-257; N. I. Lustig, "The Relationship between Demographic Characteristics and Prointegration Vote of White Precincts in a Metropolitan Southern County," SOCIAL FORCES, 40 (March, 1962), 205-208; M. M. Tumin, DESEGREGATION: RESISTANCE AND READINESS, Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1958.

The matter of race relations appears logically to be a point at which research, application of sociological findings, and citizen activities of sociologists might merge. Whether this merging of interests is any greater for sociologists than for those in other fields, however, can be determined only by research. Nevertheless, for those sociologists who do engage in these multiple activities, the question has been raised of how compatible such activities are. Some sociologists have wondered how a person emotionally involved and committed to a partisan position on such a socially controversial issue as racial segregation can, at the same time, carry out valid and reliable research in the area. Concern has also been expressed about the image of the discipline given by sociologists who are active partisans in the segregation-desegregation issue.

This paper deals, in a tentative way, with an answer to the question of the compatibility of roles in race relations activities. It offers a modus operandi that the author has found useful as he has attempted to carry out all three activities: in basic research in a study of the relation between racial segregation and race awareness in young children;[2] in applied sociology as a race relations consultant, an expert witness in court cases on desegregation, and as a surveyor of problem situations for racial organizations;[3] and, finally, in partisan activity as a member of regional, state, and local race relations organizations.

---

2. Publications and papers include: "Racial Recognition by Nursery School Children," SOCIAL FORCES, 37 (December, 1958), 132-137; "Racial Acceptance and Preference in Nursery School Children," MERRILL-PALMER QUARTERLY OF BEHAVIOR AND DEVELOPMENT, October 1962 (in press); "Racial Identification in Young Children in a Segregated Community," a paper to be presented to the American Catholic Sociological Association, Washington, D. C., September 1, 1962.

3. Surveys have been made of a strike of students over desegregation in White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia, in 1955, for the NAACP; of lunch counter sit-ins for the Southern Regional Council in 1960 ("Lunch-Counter Desegregation in Corpus Christi, Galveston, and San Antonio, Texas," SPECIAL REPORTS OF THE SRC, May, 1960) of Southern educators, for the Potomac Institute (SCHOOL DESEGREGATION — HELP NEEDED? Washington, D. C.: the Potomac Institute, 1962).

Clarification of Role Requirements

A first step in the reconciliation of these activities calls for a decision on what the basic task of the sociologist is. Although there is general consensus among sociologists that the fundamental job of the sociologist is to add to the knowledge of the structure and function of human groups, there continues to be disagreement on whether or not his job stops there. This matter was discussed, for example, last year at the annual meeting of the Society for the Study of Social Problems at a session on the responsibilities of sociologists, and it was also an issue in the presidential address at that same meeting.[4] Comparable discussions have taken place in related disciplines as well. The Society for Applied Anthropology devoted most of its Spring, 1958 issue of HUMAN ORGANIZATION to presentations made at a symposium entitled, "Values in Action," which dealt with problems of the roles of anthropologists in applied fields. And the Society for the Psychological Study of Social Issues sponsored a symposium entitled, "The Role of Social Sciences in Desegregation," the results of which were published in August of 1958. A recurring issue in these symposia is whether or not the social scientist has the obligation not only to contribute to his discipline as a scientist, but also whether through his discipline he should seek to implement values in his society. Thus, R. Nevitt Sanford speaks of a major role of the social scientist to be that of a social reformer,[5] but Conrad Arensberg states that social scientists have no other end or purpose as scientists than devotion to science itself.[6] Robert

---

4. Everett Hughes chaired the session, "The Responsibilities of Social Scientists," at which sociologists Robert Bierstedt and Alfred McClung Lee spoke. President Alvin W. Gouldner spoke on "The Conception of a Value-Free Social Science as an Ideology."

5. "Foreword," THE ROLE OF THE SOCIAL SCIENCES IN DESEGREGATION, New York: Anti-Defamation League of B'nai-B'rith, August, 1958, p. 2.

6. "Values in Action: a Comment," HUMAN ORGANIZATION, 17 (Spring, 1958), p. 25.

Bierstedt believes that normative judgments are outside the realm of science,[7] while Robert Redfield states that value deductions are, in fact, drawn by social scientists from their science,[8] and Gouldner believes that the concept of a "value-free" sociology is a myth.[9]

Without pretending to resolve this lack of agreement about the task of the social scientist, the author has found it sufficient in his own activities to start with the point of general agreement, namely, that whatever else he might do, it is the job of the sociologist to seek to increase the amount of valid and reliable knowledge about human groups. In his role as conductor of basic research and builder of sound theory, the sociologist is committed to the goals and values of all science: the development of generalizations of increasing validity and reliability, through methods that seek to minimize bias and maximize objectivity, stressing thoroughness, open-mindedness, and caution throughout the process. The author agrees with Bierstedt that in the long run probably the greatest public service a sociologist can make is the development of sound knowledge about society.[10]

But it is also clear that success in the development of such knowledge is leading to an increasing number of invitations to the sociologist to apply sociological findings to practical problems. This is what is happening in the area of race relations. The values held by the particular sociologist

---

7. "Social Science and Public Service," a paper given at the annual meeting of the Society for the Study of Social Problems, St. Louis, 1961.

8. "Values in Action: a Comment," HUMAN ORGANIZATION, 17 (Spring, 1958), p. 21.

9. "Anti-Minotaur: The Myth of a Value-Free Sociology," SOCIAL PROBLEMS, 9 (Winter, 1962), 199-213. (Presidential address given at the annual meeting of the Society for the Study of Social Problems, 1961.)

10. op. cit.

may lead him to engage in applied sociology or to reject opportunities to do so. Whatever his choice, however, it can be assumed to be based on nonscientific predilections, just as was his decision to enter the field of sociology in the first place. In his role as consultant, the sociologist is required to help solve immediate and practical problems in line with the goals of the organization for which he is working. However, it is assumed that in so far as he acts as a sociological consultant, he suggests the means to particular ends, and cannot on a scientific basis propose the ends themselves. Of course, in choosing to act as a consultant for an organization, the sociologist can indirectly choose the ends for which he wishes to work. Fundamental in the author's assumptions about roles is that the sociological task of the development of systematic knowledge neither demands nor forbids that the sociologist apply his discipline to the area of practical problems. Furthermore, the roles of basic research and practical application have nothing directly to do with the sociologists's choice to take part in partisan activities. The decision to take an active citizen role in race relations, or to refrain from doing so, is a nonrational, nonscientific, moral choice.

Limitations and Contributions of Multiple-Role Activity

With these assumptions as a basis of clarification, the author has found it possible to continue three lines of activity in a controversial area with the realization that there are separate and distinct role requirements in each activity. But this multiple-role engagement has brought problems. Because of partisan activities and consequent public "labelling," some avenues of basic research have been closed. Thus, when the author wanted to pursue his research on the race awareness of nursery school children into public kindergarten and the early elementary grades of Lynchburg, Virginia, the supervisor of instruction did not allow it, in part because of the author's public activity on behalf of can still be alert to sociological aspects of group structure and function. Intimate participation in community and state partisan organizations have revealed to the author new notions about prointegration leadership and segregation opposition, and such participation has opened some doors, particularly with prointegrationists, that might otherwise have remained closed. A warning of sociologists like Alfred McClung Lee and Alvin W. Gouldner is applicable here, namely, that sociologists should guard against rigidity and professionalization. New insights are constantly required to further the discipline, and they can come from many directions. Engaging in the application of sociology and in citizen activities can loosen rigidity and provide stimulation -- as long as the role requirement of each activity is kept clearly in mind, and if it is remembered that effectiveness in applied sociology and in citizen activity are dependent upon the development of sound theory of human groups.

The sociologist would do well to study the interrelationships of roles entered into by sociologists to see what their mutual contributions and limitations might be. The area of race relations in the South provides a suitable setting for such research.

St. Jude
November, 1962
R & R Rel.

Three Races

by Bob Senser

During an episode in the classic novel "Huckleberry Finn," Huck, a white boy of the old South, tells a woman about an accident on a Mississippi steamboat. "Good gracious!" the woman exclaims. "Anybody hurt?"

"No'm," says Huck. "Killed a nigger."

"Well, it's lucky," the lady says, "because sometimes people do get hurt."

When psychologist John Dollard was in a Southern community in 1935 collecting material for his book "Caste and Class in a Southern Town," he heard a speaker tell a courtroom audience (half-Negro, half-white) about the virtues of the Southern people—that is, the "good old Anglo-Saxon stock of which our state is composed."

In 1960, after the Democrats adopted a convention platform pledging action to protect the civil rights of Negroes, Governor Ross Barnett went home to Mississippi grumbling. "The platform is horrible," he told reporters. "I don't see how the people of the South can accept it."

To most modern ears, the casual implication that Negroes are not really people sounds callous. After all, for a century the Federal government has considered the Negro as a full person, not as three-fifths of one, as the Constitution previously provided. Most whites today would readily accept Negroes as persons—"but not our kind of persons," many would add.

In a blank for "color or races," the 1960 U.S. Census form asked whether a person was "White, Negro, American Indian, Japanese, Chinese, Filipino, Hawaiian, part Hawaiian, Aleut, Eskimo (etc.)." After reading this, William A. Wisdom, a New York University graduate student, wrote the Census Bureau director a letter lecturing him on the difficulties of the seemingly easy question. In his own case Mr. Wisdom rejected the obvious classification of White and stated he would have to call himself a "pinkish-gray part of American Caucasoids with probable Negroid and Mongoloid elements."

From one viewpoint, Mr. Wisdom was quibbling. Yet as a student of anthropology, he knew that the question of race is far more elusive than most people realize. Scientists have seen mankind as being divided into as few as two races and into as many as 30 or more. "It is all quite arbitrary," says Father Sylvester Sieber, S.V.D., an anthropologist. "You can make as many as 5,000 different measurements of the human body, and depending on which measurements you select, you can make your own racial classifications."

Most scientists today hold that there are three primary races—the Caucasian, the Mongolian, and the Negro, or what are popularly known as the "white," the "yellow," and the "black" races. The quotation marks indicate an uneasiness with the preciseness of the popular terms. Make a color comparison between a white man's skin and a white shirt, and the looseness of "white" becomes apparent. Even the so-called white person has a light brown color to his skin. Only the albino lacks coloring, and the albino exists in all three racial groups.

(Despite the looseness of the term "white," it is used here in the meaning it has in ordinary language. It is pointless to try to reform the American idiom. The attitude behind the idiom is more important.)

Moreover, skin color by itself is no sure index of racial type. Many people of India, for example, are as dark as the darkest Africans, but are considered Caucasians because of other anatomical characteristics.

The other characteristics include hair coloring and texture, shape of nose, slope of forehead, body hairiness (Caucasians have the most), shape of head, and thickness of lips. These are among the most common of the physical traits measured by scientists today. The importance attached to a given trait may fade as new studies are made. Years ago, when it was thought that the larger the brain, the greater the intelligence, the largest cranial capacity was claimed for the white race—until the skulls of Eskimos were found to be larger yet.

Anatomical differences among the races must be weighed against the much greater amount of sameness in the human race. Careful research has uncovered no consistent racial differences in longevity, size, weight, strength, or sensory acuity. Nor do the internal organs of human beings bear any racial characteristics. As a result, anthropologists point out that race is only skin deep.

Consider blood, which often is used to denote racial and familial kinship. I once heard the late Archbishop William D. O'Brien of Chicago tell a

Mr. Senser's article forms a part of his book, "Primer on Interracial Justice" (Helicon Press).

St. Jude
November, 1962
R & R Rel

One Man A Study in Racial Prejudice

Negro audience: "You know, I have a secret to tell you. I have colored blood." He paused, and then added: "Yes, it's colored. Red, just like yours."

Contrary to a common impression, there is no such thing as "Negro blood." Blood carries no racial identity. Though there are different blood "types," these cut across racial lines. Blood for transfusion must be carefully selected so that the donor's blood type blends with the recipient's type, but in this medical process racial identity is so unimportant that a transfusion from a Negro could save a white man's life, whereas a transfusion from another white (with the wrong blood type) could cause shock and even death.

One could go on and on with the physical likenesses and differences discovered in biological sciences. But this is in large part artificial and meaningless because it assumes that scientific category determines a person's race. It does not. Custom does. The scientific categories do not jibe with American custom. Or putting it the other way round, American custom does not follow the scientific categories of race.

In the United States a person known to have even a single Negro ancestor, however remote he may have been, is considered a Negro. As Gunnar Myrdal writes in his monumental study, "An American Dilemma": "Everybody having a known trace of 'Negro blood' in his veins—no matter how far back it was acquired—is classified as a Negro. No amount of white ancestry, except one hundred per cent, will permit entrance to the white race."

A man may have brown and straight hair, blue eyes, a light skin, a Roman nose, and other characteristics that by all biological standards would qualify him as Caucasian. Yet because of remote Negro ancestry that may have left little or no visible trace, his wife, his friends, his work associates, and others will usually classify him as Negro. And generally he will do so himself.

This American custom is puzzling to many Africans. They can not fathom how persons like Ralph Bunche, Adam Clayton Powell, and Philippa Schuyler can possibly be called Negroes. After Miss Schuyler gave a piano recital in Abidjan, one dark-skinned member of the audience commented: "What is this nonsense about Philippa Schuyler being a black? She's whiter than our Lebanese traders." And of course Miss Schuyler is also whiter than many U.S. citizens of Italian and Mexican origin, people who are classed as members of the white race.

Race relations experts often point out that there are many thousands (perhaps hundreds of thousands) of Negroes who pass as whites. Even the experts are creatures of U.S. habit, for the opposite point is much more significant: millions of persons with predominantly Caucasian characteristics are passing as Negroes. White as they are, they suffer most of the disabilities associated with being black-skinned.

This American custom is not just a point of academic interest or a fascinating oddity for the Sunday feature pages. It is basic to an understanding of the U.S. racial problem. All the generalizations about Negroes — that Negroes are more prone to this or to that than are whites—must take into account that the Americans called "Negroes" are largely of mixed racial origin. Two criminologists, Richard R. Korn and Lloyd W. McCorckle, point up the practical meaning of this fact:

"Since race is a matter of degree, one should not say 'Negro,' 'Chinese,' or 'White,' but how much Negro, how much Chinese, etc. Pursuing the implications of this fact could lead to some startling conclusions about race and criminality. For example: The probability that Negroids commit a proportionately higher percentage of crimes than do whites in this country has led some to assume the existence of a racially selective trait [an innate tendency] for Negro criminality.

"But the overwhelming majority of Negroes in this country have at least some white parentage in their background. It has been estimated that not more than 25 per cent of the persons called Negroes in this country are of unmixed Negro extraction. Consequently, in order to assess the operation of the genetic Negro crime factor, it is necessary to observe the crime rates among the 'racially pure' Negroes of primitive Africa, where, according to the theory, we would expect the criminality to be highest because the racial factor is less diluted. But every index reveals that the extent of criminality among the few still primitive Negroes of Africa is negligible, and very much less than that of the racially mixed Negroes of America. Apparently, then—and contrary to expectation—the Negro crime rate 'rises' when pure Negro racial characteristics are mixed with white racial factors."

Criminality, of course, has nothing at all to do with racial biology, white, Negro, or mixed. But how people look on race, how they treat those who are classified in a different racial group, can create social conditions that increase the temptation to steal, cheat, and commit other crimes. Why should it be so difficult for Catholics to understand that social conditions have a great influence on a person's behavior? Catholics have gone to enormous sacrifice to establish an educational system —Catholic grade schools, high schools, colleges, and universities — precisely because they place so much importance on a proper environment.

Yet the tendency to blame nature rather than nurture exists even on relatively unimportant levels. In the play No Time for Sergeants a hillbilly is amazed when he hears a college-educated Northern Negro speak. "Why," says the hillbilly, "he talks mo' white than Ah do." I have personally observed the disbelief of whites who for the first time heard a Puerto Rican Negro speak with a thick Spanish accent and a Dublin-reared Negro speak with an Irish brogue. In both instances the whites thought the Negroes were "putting on airs," when in fact the accents of the two men reflected those of the society in which they were reared.

Most of us do not realize how much U.S. Negroes have assimilated the American way of life. We do not realize that despite the difference in education, income, and housing, the typical Negro is much more like the typical white than (say) an American Negro is like an African Congolese or an American white is like a Rumanian.

Negroes here do not have African names, nor do they speak an African language; they adopted the white man's names, his language, and even his religions. Bit by bit in the past 150 years, they absorbed the culture of the white majority. They drive the same cars, see the same TV shows, buy the same deep freezes, use the same school textbooks. Even the Negro magazine Ebony is amazingly like Life.

Despite all the efforts to blame nature, racial barriers are man-made. The Negroes themselves have surmounted the artificial wall of segregation to a greater extent than they generally recognize.

Both those who are for and those who are against segregation see the social and economic differences that still exist between Negroes and whites. Negroes are still suffering the after-effects of slavery, which destroyed family ties and turned Negro women into breeders for the slave market. Negroes are still suffering the disabilities of the South's school system, where a Negro who wanted to go beyond the eighth grade was often considered "uppity." Negroes are suffering from the current effects of discrimination in employment, housing, and education.

Those who oppose segregation see these and other disabilities as the reason to eliminate segregation. Those who favor segregation see the disabilities as the reason to enforce segregation.

Let me try to put the segregationist's argument in the most telling way. "All right," he may say, "Negroes have had a tough row to hoe, I grant that. Also, I know that they have improved themselves, and I hope that they continue to do so. But there are great differences between the two races. Negroes are far behind whites. That's a plain fact, and I can't help but be governed accordingly."

This is a fair summary of a common attitude, an attitude shared even by many who do not openly espouse the cause of segregation. This attitude, as already suggested, perpetuates a vicious circle. Second-class citizenship promotes conditions that keep people in second-class citizenship. Life in a ghetto reinforces a psychology of distrust (even among Negroes) that sustains ghettoes.

"What you say may be true," somebody might retort, "but that is unfortunate. They are not up to the standards of white society, and therefore they should stay by themselves."

Such an objector would resist the charge that he is guilty of racism. The word does have a derogatory content, stirring up images of the KKK, lynching, and violent hatred. Let me substitute another term, one with a more neutral connotation — "groupism." Groupism is the habit of looking at Negroes (and other "different" people) as a group and treating them as a group.

Groupism builds on two related mental processes. One moves from the specific to the general—"This American tourist is boorish; therefore Americans are boorish." The second mental process shifts into reverse gear. It moves from the general to the specific—"Americans are boorish; this tourist is an American and therefore boorish." The dual process is used in all expressions of groupism, whether about Mexicans, Jews, Arabs, Catholics, Sioux Indians, or Negroes.

The advocate of groupism usually spares his own group. So when a white man commits a heinous crime, other white men do not say, "Vicious, these Caucasians—how can such people be treated as equals?" but the smallest incidents are used as evidence when one of "them" is involved. A Negro staggers into a bus, and so "Those people are drunkards." Negro teen agers misbehave in a theater, and so "Negro boys and girls are hoodlums." A Negro is lecherous, and so "Negroes have no morals." And so on. Each specific instance balloons to a general statement about a whole group of people.

Thus the punishment for a misdeed or crime may be visited on persons completely unconnected with it. In one-fourth of the lynchings of Negroes in the South between 1889 and 1933 the victim was not even accused of a crime; the person lynched simply provided a convenient substitute outlet for the fury of a white mob.

In such cases the injustice is clear. It is not so clear when Negroes are rejected as a result of statistics indicating racial differences.

"Negro students in this community have IQs averaging 15 points below those of whites." But how can such an average possibly justify segregating this Negro whose IQ is, say, 15 or 20 points above the white average? "Negro workers have a higher absentee rate than whites." But how can such a rate justify rejecting this Negro applicant who was not absent at all at her previous job? "Negroes have a poorer record of maintaining their property." But how can such a record justify excluding this Negro family who kept a house perfectly for ten years?

Groupism refuses to judge people as individuals; the whole philosophy collapses when it does. You can set up all the "standards" that you wish—moral, educational, religious, civic, geographic, cultural. There is a simple test of whether your real interest lies in high standards or in racial exclusion. The test is: What happens to Negroes who do meet the standards? Moreover, what happens to the white people who fail to meet them? The questions strike to the heart of racial segregation.

Three Southern judges of the U.S. circuit court of appeals dealt with this issue in 1957 in a decision affecting Louisiana's school segregation laws. The court was presented with stacks of statistics showing what the judges called an "alleged disparity" between Negroes and whites in IQ ratings, school progress, incidence of certain diseases, and percentage of illegitimate births. The judges declared:

"This represents an effort to justify a classification of students by race on the grounds that one race possesses a higher percentage of undesirable traits, attributes, or conditions. Strangely enough, there seems never to have been any effort to classify the students of Orleans [County] according to the degree to which they possess these traits. That is, there seems to have been no attempt to deny schooling to, or to segregate from other children, those of illegitimate birth or having social diseases or having below average intelligence quotients of learning ability."

It would be all right, concluded the judges, to classify students according to their proficiency or health traits, but to do so on the basis of race alone would be "arbitrary" and unconstitutional. Louisiana, however, did not change its segregation to base it on the standards over which it professed concern.

Father George H. Dunne, a Jesuit who long has fought segregation, once wrote: "The same person who will fight tooth and nail to prevent a Negro from living in his neighborhood will not hesitate to employ a Negro maid or a Negro cook. If he believes that Negroes are lacking in moral integrity, why does he permit a Negro maid to take care of his children? If he believes that Negroes are physically unclean, why does he permit the Negro cook to handle his food?"

The apparent answer, "racial prejudice," is too much of a cliche. Hatred and dislike toward Negroes are widespread, of course. A degree of prejudice probably exists in almost all of us, whatever our race, thanks to environment and personal weaknesses. But it is a mistake—and prejudice of a different sort—automatically to ascribe racial prejudice to every person who will accept a Negro as a maid but not as a neighbor.

What influences racial attitudes and actions more than plain prejudice is another social and moral phenomenon —the concern for status. Each of us operates highly sensitive antennae tuned in on what other people think of us. Their regard for us is determined in part by the kind of company we keep. If I have dinner at the White House regularly, or if a Bing Crosby drops by my house whenever he is in town, or if I can easily get an appointment with a Cardinal, then my friends will tend to look on me with respect. If I associate with people of low social status, such as ex-convicts and Skid Row alcoholics, however, then my own standing will be low too. Though I need not make a hobby of collecting Big Names as acquaintances, the least I must do to maintain a decent status is to avoid associating with persons bearing some type of social stigma. Since I want recognition from others, my ordinary tendency would be to shun people who in society's eyes count for little.

In 1796 a report to a special meeting of the American Philosophical Society attributed the Negro's color to leprosy. Although few people believed this falsehood, slavery and segregation have in the past two centuries created the image that Negroes are social lepers. Like inmates of prisons and mental hospitals, they bear a stigma that gives them a low status in the world's eyes. Status, by definition, lumps together people who are considered alike, and therefore status rubs off on one's friends and associates. Few people like being stigmatized.

The U.S. does not have Europe's class cleavages between workers and employers, but it does have status differences, the biggest being the one separating Negroes from their fellow citizens.

White is more than a race; it is a social status. Especially in the South the status of white determines all of one's social relations. The status is so crucial that official records on race often become the subject of lengthy litigation. In one such case (during which a woman futilely challenged New Orleans' action changing the records of her father's ancestry from "white" to "Negro"), a Louisiana state court declared:

> We feel that nothing can possibly be of more importance than for a person to be absolutely certain as to his genealogy and particularly as to his race. We know that a white person has an absolute right to be known as white and a colored person has the same right to be known as colored, and we know that in this area nothing can cause greater distress and humiliation to those who believe themselves to be of one race and then to find that they have in their veins bloods of another.

The officially discovered "Negro blood" doesn't change the person. It does change his status, and hence means he loses friends fearful of their own social position.

According to psychologist Gardner Murphy, the need for status is the "primary root" of racial discrimination. This explanation clarifies many seemingly irrational attitudes and actions. Take the experience of four officials from Ghana who, like other dark-skinned African visitor, found that they were frequently barred from U.S. restaurants when they were dressed in American clothes, but always admitted when they wore their colorful tribal robes.

"Irrational," charged the Milwaukee Journal, and of course the discrepancy is that, in a fundamental sense. But it does not seem surprising in this context: Ghana's robed visitors, black as they are, do not pose a threat to a community's status system; they can easily be accepted as honored guests from a distant place, visibly different people who set no precedent for the local Negroes across the tracks.

Few people question and even fewer defy a status system. Most simply go along with a community's current norms. "Look," a relative once told me, "I'm no crusader." Another friend of mine distributed literature on interracial justice in his school and was publicly reprimanded by his principal with these words: "You can't rock the boat."

But more and more people, Negroes and whites, are willing to crusade for desegregation. Today those crusading for desegregation far outnumber those crusading against it, and they have provided the breakthrough necessary for changing the status system. Men like Father John LaFarge, S.J., founder of the Catholic Interracial Council movement, have braved scorn and pressure as they labored to awaken the public conscience. Now even in a Southern city like Louisville, according to an Urban League official, "It is no longer fashionable to be publicly in favor of segregation."

The strategic position of the two sides in a racial controversy changes as progress occurs. Before integration, its proponents are the ones rocking the boat, but after integration the opponents must assume this unpopular role.

So (to alter the imagery) the tide has changed. Yet it is wrong to assume that we can depend on being carried forward inevitably to ever-increasing progress, but public opinion about race and racism can still retrogress unless it is more deeply rooted in the personal convictions of a much larger number of people. END

R+RR

NOTES ON

NEGROES and LEADERSHIP

by Mary Dolan

ABOUT EIGHT YEARS AGO I sat in a Negro's living room in the Deep South with a small group and listened to Thurgood Marshall muse aloud about his student-clients in school segregation cases. As legal counsel for the NAACP, he had seen at first hand the suffering endured by these students, some of them young and immature—at least, young when the suits were begun. He cited several specific instances of student-clients who had suffered breakdowns as a result of the strain, parents who had lost jobs and been exposed to ridicule, threats, and crushing pressures, subtle and not-so-subtle.

> If we, who can scarcely be considered a white nation, persist in thinking of ourselves as one, we condemn ourselves, with the truly white nations, to sterility and decay, whereas if we could accept ourselves as we are, we might bring new life to the Western achievements, and transform them. The price of this transformation is the unconditional freedom of the Negro.
>
> —James Baldwin, "Letter from a Region in My Mind," Nov. 17, 1962, The New Yorker

He gave a mirthless laugh as he observed how little, by comparison, he had contributed to the school desegregation battle, and he wondered whether, were their situations reversed, he himself would measure up as well as these often simple, poorly-schooled, modestly - circumstanced men and women and their children.

It seems to be currently popular to speak of the failure of Negro leadership, as, say, Louis Lomax does in his new book The Negro Revolt (Harper & Brothers, $4.50). Several years ago when Lomax first expounded his thesis in a magazine article, it at least had the merit of a certain freshness and originality, and his tendency to slip flamboyantly beyond facts was not so marked. He developed much the same theme in a Friendship House lecture in November, 1961, but here he strayed considerably further from factual moorings, and added a scathing denunciation of all of Christianity, too. By 1963 the idea seems pretty "old hat."

I think of Marshall and other Negro leaders I have known when I read Lomax and when I hear others decry the failure of Negro leadership. (Father Andrew Greeley has been stating a similar theme in a number of recent articles in Catholic periodicals.) I just can't buy it. Rather, I am amazed at how well most Negro leaders represent the diversified Negro community. I submit that Negro leadership speaks more truly for the Negro masses than does any comparable leadership. Or perhaps it would be more accurate to say that there is no comparable leadership. What other minority group has a middle class whose members culturally long ago entered the full stream of American society, who are fifth- and sixth-generation residents in Northern cities, yet are lumped together by the white majority in our race-conscious society with the newest, un-urbanized, uneducated migrant from Southern plantations?

> More and more Negroes are willing and able to move into suburbs and other communities heretofore reserved for whites. Because of their education, income, attitudes, and way of life, the Joneses (a Negro couple who moved into a previously all-white suburb) could never feel at home in a Negro slum. Those who argue that the Joneses belong among their "own kind" miss the point: in Skokie they are among their own kind.
>
> —Robert Senser, Primer on Interracial Justice

This is the fundamental frustration of racial segregation. Until those Negroes who have met all rational, objective standards of worth are able to reap the rewards of worth, are able to move freely in American society, solutions for problems of poor Negroes are blocked.

Nor are the poorer, less educated

Negroes (the lower class, if you will, Negroes) that I have known been as uninterested in walk-ins, sit-ins, wade-ins as Father Greeley seems to think they are. This was brought home to me sharply a number of years ago when at Friendship House we ceased distributing used clothing. The decision to do so was not easily made. We thought long and hard before reaching the conclusion that Friendship House's efforts should be concentrated on programs that reach out from the Negro ghetto, that help more and more whites experience—if only fleetingly, at first—interracial associations, that provide a platform for more and more Negroes to express their concern, their frustrations in Jim-Crow America.

All well and good. But how would the people who came to Friendship House for used clothing take the decision? I, for one, expected them to be irate and bitterly opposed, and I dreaded the first encounter with a would-be clothing room customer. When it came, I did the only thing I could think to do: stated our hope of reaching out to change the pattern of racial discrimination. To my surprise, the response was immediate; this woman (I had talked to her a number of times before when she came asking for clothes) was both approving and enthusiastic. I thought she might have been an exception, but this experience was repeated over and over again. I then realized that I had underestimated the capacity and the need of this group of Negroes to identify with the longer-range goals of human dignity and recognition. Indeed, I found that they and I were meeting and exchanging in a much more meaningful way than we had in the past when our exchange was inevitably tinged by the paternalistic touch of the "hand out."

> There has been a great deal of talk about the "new Negro." I hope there will not be a great lot more and that social scientists will not succumb to the term and try to elevate it into a concept. It is, or so it would seem to me, after all rather condescending to herald the young man or woman acting responsibly in defense of his or her own dignity as a "new Negro." It is patronizing of him and belittling of the labor and ideals of the old Negroes. What should one expect? Should social scientists or liberals be as surprised as is the tradition-minded South to observe educated people asking to be treated as such?
>
> —Leslie W. Dunbar, "Reflection on the Latest Reform of the South," Fall '61 Phylon

Furthermore, I submit that the middle class Negroes and the leaders of Negro organizations best serve not only their own middle class but their deprived Negro brothers by continuing to focus major attention on the goals of equal opportunity and not being sidetracked into concentrating on Negro uplift.

One final personal reminiscence will, I think, make my point clear.

Some years ago I led a "buzz group" discussion, which followed a talk by an articulate, personable Negro. The participants in the discussion were students at a white, Chicago high school and their parents. They had a solution to the problem of Chicago's unskilled and destitute Negroes: let the speaker of the evening and his like teach them urban ways and give them jobs. But wasn't this, I urged, a job requiring social agencies and community welfare funds? Oh, no, the Negroes who had achieved should be willing to sacrifice for their needier brothers.

It so happened that the area in which this group lived was then being "invaded" by white rural migrants—hillbillies, as they described them. I seized upon this parallel. Did they, I asked, think they themselves should sacrifice for their needier brothers? Without hesitation they asserted that they did not intend to make such a sacrifice. Seemingly oblivious to the contradiction this was to the program they wanted middle class Negroes to undertake, they went on to explain that they did not have financial and other resources to help these white hillbillies—and furthermore the hillbillies didn't want to be helped!

Surely, indifference to the poor and needy is a common human failing. It is distressing, therefore, to see this indifference, of which whites are at least as guilty, decried as particularly a Negro failing or the responsibility to do something about need made a special Negro responsibility. ■

★

Participation

The Pius XII Society is a Chicago organization devoted to promoting understanding and interest in the liturgy. A recent issue of their Newsletter ($1.00 a year, 67 East Division Street, Chicago 10, Illinois) suggests a specific format for congregational participation in the Mass. It is reprinted here by permission.

WE HAVE NOTICED that some of churches find themselves having to drop programs of congregational participation in the Mass because of a lack of response from the congregation. We have also noticed a similarity of approach to participation in churches where the program has proven successful; therefore, we offer the following suggestions:

Preparation and assistance must be given to the congregation for the program to be successful. A congregation cannot be expected to recite Latin prayers from beginning to end, without a leader, without preparation, and without understanding.

The problem can be partially overcome by the use of sermons to instruct the congregation, the use of missals and hymnals, and the use of lay lectors. The use of Latin (at a recited Mass) is confined to the short responses, Kyrie, Sanctus, Pater Noster, Agnus Dei, and Domine non sum dignus. A paraphrase prayer in English is used in place of the Gloria, the Apostle's Creed in English is substituted for the Credo. An English entrance hymn replaces the prayers at the foot of the altar.

It is our opinion that if these above items are included in a program of participation, there will be little chance of failure; at least, we have not heard of a parish using the above approaches consistently whose participation program did fail. It is necessary to use these various ideas in a participation program, not only because it makes the program work, but because it is important that the participation be well done, a worship pleasing to God. ■

★

R & R Rel.

WELFARE CONSULTANT IS HOPEFUL

'Future Of Negro In North Carolina Is Bright'

By Jay Jenkins

Observer Raleigh Bureau

RALEIGH — A man who has been most intimately associated with efforts to improve the lot of Negroes in North Carolina is encouraged about the future.

He is John R. Larkins, Negro consultant to the N.C. Department of Public Welfare, the only Negro who serves on the staff of a southern state at the policy - making level.

"I am encouraged," said Larkins. "I feel that the future of the Negro in North Carolina is bright because of the efforts of so many white and colored individuals and organizations.

"We have also been fortunate to have leaders in government, industry and education who have helped to develop a climate conducive to this progress and social change."

LARKINS was quick to add, "We still are not where we want to be." The encouragement comes from the advances he has seen in his 20 years on the job.

When Gov. Terry Sanford recently named the "Good Neighbor Council" to improve opportunities for Negroes, he adopted a thesis Larkins has enlarged upon for years.

"Economics is the major problem among Negroes," Larkins said. "Inadequate income is reflected in disorganized communities, in crime, delinquency and illegitimacy."

Sanford said the same thing in different language as he appointed the biracial council.

A slender, energetic man of 48, Larkins combines the approach of the scholar (he holds advanced degrees in social work) with the adroitness of a politician.

HE IS THE author of numerous publications about the Negro in North Carolina, each based on scientific research and a reverent regard for facts.

"I make the studies," said Larkins. "The people take the action."

A native of Wilmington, Larkins set fixed goals when he took office in 1942. All except one have been achieved, wholly or in large part.

Switzerland says so."

There still is no home for unwed Negro mothers. Larkins brightened, however, and said, "The Interdenominational Ushers Association of N.C. now is purchasing property in Franklin County, and when it's paid for, we'll have the home."

ALTHOUGH he gives credit to everyone but himself, Larkins played an important role in achieving the other goals during the past two decades:

—Facilities were provided for delinquent Negro girls and those for delinquent boys were expanded. The Federation of Negro Women's Clubs, aided by white women's clubs, was instrumental in obtaining the facility for girls at Kinston. Quarters for Negro boys were expanded at Morrison Training School.

—North Carolina made the first attempt to do something tangible, principally through educational techniques, to prevent and reduce the number of Negro children born out of wedlock.

—Negroes now have an institution for mentally retarded children at Goldsboro. Negroes also are in responsible staff positions there.

—Additional day nurseries for Negro children have been set up in local communities. These are considered especially important by Larkins because of the number of Negro mothers who must work. Many are forced to leave children and the community.

—In 20 years, the number of Negroes employed in social work has tripled, to around 100. More are needed and could be placed, Larkins said, if trained workers were available.

In virtually every one of the above categories, a documented study of the needs by Larkins preceded action. Once the study had been made, he moved into local communities, contacting individual leaders and appropriate civic clubs.

LARKINS carries a heavy speaking schedule. He interprets the current project and enlists support for it. As a Negro working with Negroes, he has been able to obtain results more quickly.

Always Larkins returns to the question of job opportunity for his people, mainly because most of the Negro problems stem from the lack of such opportunity.

Buttressing his case with statistics, the results of painstaking research, Larkins said:

"To the mass of North Carolina Negroes, the job means largely four types of work: common labor, personal service, domestic service and agricultural pursuits."

Gov. Sanford in a speech translated what that means for the state's per capita income standing: Excluding the Negro, North Carolina would rank 32nd instead of 42nd among the states.

What Larkins has been trying to show, calmly and objectively, is that a better life for the Negro will mean a better life for everyone, and that an economic surge at the bottom will have a beneficial effect at the top.

"I am convinced that what the Negro wants is an opportunity," Larkins said.

"I THINK the progress he has made over the last 25 years, when he has been handicapped, indicates that if we remove obstructions to jobs and other artificial barriers, he can really go places."

Larkins' interests range over the whole spectrum of Negro life. His unpublicized and unofficial activities include helping Negro students get into college, advising them and seeking scholarships.

Although attached to welfare, he works with and through numerous other state departments.

Tar Heel governors frequently have consulted him, a not unmixed blessing since some Negro groups tend to blame him when their suggestions are not followed on appointments and the like.

Serving as a bridge between two races is not an easy task. His critics often forget that his role is advisory and one which requires artful diplomacy.

Some of his Negro colleagues have complained that Larkins is not militant enough on civil rights (although the record, from the standpoint of solid results, speaks for itself).

AS A research sociologist, Larkins greets the complaint philosophically:

"You need a quarter first, to get on the bus. Then you can worry about where you'll be seated."

Larkins is a prodigious worker, who brings to his job a sense of mission. At the same time he is dispelling myths with facts, and reconciling the theoretical with the practical.

And always he is sounding the theme that better jobs for Negroes will mean a livelier economy for the state, less crime and disease, fewer delinquents and happier human relationships.

More than one million North Carolinians are Negroes, or one in every four persons in the state. That alone is calculated to make the burden Larkins cheerfully shoulders one of the heavier responsibilities in this commonwealth.

CHARLOTTE OBSERVER, January 31, 1963

WINSTON-SALEM SENTINEL - March 19, 1959
Thursday Evening
WINSTON-SALEM, NORTH CAROLINA

Larkins' Contention

Negroes' Poverty Costly

By LUIX OVERBEA
Staff Reporter

Taxpayers and the general public in North Carolina are paying for the poverty of the state's Negroes, John R. Larkins, Negro consultant to the North Carolina State Board of Public Welfare, said today.

Larkins is in Winston-Salem as the guest of two Parent-Teacher Assns. He will speak at 7:30 p.m. today at the Paisley Junior High School PTA banquet. He adressed the PTA of Carver Consolidated School Tuesday.

A native of Wilmington, Larkins speaks in a fast, clipped manner.

"The job squeeze on Negroes in North Carolina is creating a big welfare problem," he said. "The people are paying for this problem.

"Private industry in this state follows the so-called pattern in most instances. This pattern calls for hiring Negroes in the most undesirable, but lowest paying jobs. To often, trained Negroes do not get positions for which they are qualified."

Staff Photo by Tom Pitts

JOHN R. LARKINS (right) consults with H. B. Goodson, Paisley PTA president.

Welfare Funds

Because of the economic situation, Larkins said, Negroes receive a greater proportion of state welfare funds than their percentage in the total population. These conditions also breed crime, slums, juvenile delinquency and displaced children.

Larkins' job as consultant is what he calls a "research sociologist." He explained:

"My job is first, gathering information about the Negro in North Carolina; second, compiling and analyzing the facts; and third, informing the general public, particularly the Negro public, and state officials of these facts."

He has worked in an advisory capacity with such groups as the North Carolina Board of Correction and Training, the North Carolina Council on Human Relations, the Southern Regional Council and the North Carolina Recreation Commission.

His most recent study, published last year, is "The Negro in North Carolina — 1945-55." Other works are "A Study of Negro Parolees," "The Contributions of Sociology to Social Work," "The Employment of Negroes in Public Welfare in Eleven Southern States."

"I make the studies; the people take the action," he said.

There is no perfect blueprint or easy way to solve these problems, he said, but it is time that they are recognized and met.

"A broad program of education and social action is needed," Larkins said. "The general public and persons in positions of influence must feel the need of doing something about the low economic status of Negroes. Employers must become more willing to hire qualified workers.

"Economics is the major problem among Negroes. Inadequate income is reflected in disorganized communities of crime, delinquency and illegitimacy."

In the state welfare department's 1956-58 biennial report, Larkins noted his interest in finding licensed boarding homes for children and the aged, day care setups for children and programs to reduce the number of children born out of wedlock.

Larkins helped with a housing study in Northampton County and a family life study in Edgecombe County. Through his advice, programs to reduce the number of children born out of wedlock were begun in Jones, Edgecombe, Northampton, Pender, Duplin and Cabarrus counties.

B+R Rel

Desegregation

In the eight and a half years that have elapsed since the U.S. Supreme Court handed down its decision banning segregation in the public schools, a civil rights revolution has taken place. For a closer scrutiny of the changing attitude of some liberals toward desegregation, we turn to MURRAY FRIEDMAN, who holds a doctorate in American political and social history from Georgetown University and who has been an intergroup-relations official for eight years.

THE WHITE LIBERAL'S RETREAT

BY MURRAY FRIEDMAN

IN THE forties and fifties, liberals, intellectuals, and many middle-class whites came to believe that the elimination of segregation was the central domestic problem in our country. There was general agreement outside the South that once this was accomplished a host of social, political, and economic problems involving the Negro would disappear and he would finally be able to take his place as an equal partner in American life. When the U.S. Supreme Court handed down its momentous decision in 1954 banning segregation in the public schools, a high-water mark in the alliance of the liberal white and the Negro was reached. The decision set in motion the civil rights revolution we are experiencing today, in which the Negro, aided by a sympathetic white community, has been seeking entry into areas of American life previously closed to him.

In the eight and a half years that have elapsed, a reaction to desegregation and to militant efforts by Negroes to achieve it has emerged among many of those who greeted the High Court decision so enthusiastically. These second thoughts have developed as a result of the pain and turmoil involved in making what proved to be difficult social adjustments. In some measure, too, historical anxieties about and antipathy to the Negro have reasserted themselves. Such a retreat or pullback on the part of liberal whites (including many conservatives who are liberal on race issues) has important consequences for civil rights progress.

One of the indications of this retreat appeared following the wave of resistance that swept through the South after the 1954 decision. Northern liberals expected opposition, but when violence developed in Little Rock, Clinton, and other parts of the South and public schools were closed, they were startled by the extent of the upheaval. Gallup Polls have shown, as Charles Stember has noted in his recent study, Education and Attitude Change, a shift in attitude in 1957 among better-educated whites. Increasingly, they have been willing to accept a slower and smaller amount of desegregation in the South.

This mood was reflected by President Eisenhower at press conferences, where he sidestepped expressing an opinion on the decision itself and cautioned that change must first come about in the hearts and minds of men. It is found in the hesitation of the Kennedy Administration (which has been far better on civil rights than its predecessor) to introduce new civil rights legislation and in the efforts of the President to find a national consensus on racial issues.

While Northern opinion has firmly rejected violence and outright defiance of federal court decisions on desegregation, as demonstrated in Mississippi, it has accepted token integration, the device Southerners have skillfully fashioned to avoid the consequences of integration. Apart from indignant Negroes who have reacted with sit-ins and other direct-action efforts, few voices have been raised against token integration, in spite of the fact that less than 8 percent of Negro children in the South are attending desegregated schools, less than one percent if we exclude border areas such as Washington, D.C., and Baltimore. Northern opinion was satisfied with progress made when Atlanta, Dallas, and a few more cities admitted a handful of Negro children to white public schools for the first time without violence.

This new understanding of Southern adjustment problems on the part of white supporters of integration also results from certain changes that have taken place in the North. The heavy exodus of Negroes from the South since World War II has, to a large degree, shifted the center of the race problem to the metropolitan areas of the North and West. The Negro is no longer an abstraction to the white liberal but a concrete reality — in many instances, a potential or actual next-door neighbor, a classmate of his child's, a coworker at office or workbench. This confrontation very often points up the gap between the worlds of the Negro and the liberal white.

The white lives in a middle-class society marked by an emphasis and overemphasis on education, aspiration, and advancement. The world of the Negro frequently is the urban slum. It is a world of slum housing and slum living, where violence, family dislocation, and blunted hopes are the norms. (There is, of course, a middle-class Negro community, and it is growing, but most whites have little or no experience with it.) Contact with it produces shock and disgust, as in the description by Marya Mannes of the West Seventies in New York, where she grew up. There are still some nice people there, she writes, but they are lost in a "brown sea of squalor."

Liberal whites are, consequently, caught in the dilemma of believing in equal rights for Negroes and even of working for them, while at the same time attempting to escape from the real and fancied disadvantages of desegregation. In recent years, they have helped put on the books of many cities and states laws banning discrimination in the sale or rental of housing, yet they themselves have been moving to the farthest reaches of the cities and to the suburbs. They have pushed up the enrollment at private and parochial schools, shut their eyes to the widespread practice of gerrymandering of school district lines to avoid integration, and helped to create pressures for separating slow from rapid learners in the public schools, a process which often results in keeping middle-class white children apart from Negro and Puerto Rican youngsters.

I do not want to oversimplify this situation. The movement out of the older areas of cities has always been a form of advancement for Americans. And the pressure for separating slow from rapid learners represents in no small measure concern among middle-class whites that educational excellence be encouraged. Liberals are genuinely worried about what the introduction of unprepared slum children will do to their schools. They are fearful that physical commingling of middle-class children with culturally deprived youngsters will depress the level of the schools serving the former while the latter, unable to keep up because of inadequate preparation and background, will become even more embittered and hostile. The result is that many liberals, while opposed to color lines, are helping to make these lines stronger and tighter.

It would be easy to dismiss liberal whites as possessing double standards and being as prejudiced as those they criticize, which some, in fact, are; nearer the truth, however, is the fact that they have been confronted with a series of extraordinarily complex problems growing out of the need to adjust to a modern urban society large numbers of rural Negroes from the South suffering from inferior, segregated educations and other deprivations. The belief of the liberal whites in interracial justice, while morally sound, does not provide a useful guide for dealing with this situation.

To add to his dilemma, the liberal white is increasingly uneasy about the nature and consequences of the Negro revolt. Out of the bitterness and want that have been the lot of the Negro in our society has come a civil rights revolution whose explosive power worries and even frightens those people who traditionally have been sympathetic to the Negro. The N.A.A.C.P. and the Urban League were fashioned early in the century by a coalition of whites and Negroes to change old and create new law on civil rights and help adapt the Negro to his new urban environment. These essentially middle-class techniques of social action are now labeled too slow by newer Negro (and some white) "direct actionists," who have turned to sit-ins and boycotts in the North as well as in the South, "buy Black" campaigns, and strident demands by Negro leaders that Negroes be elected or appointed to office on a frankly racial basis. There has also been a growth in the Negro nationalist movement.

Liberals are increasingly resentful of these demands. In testimony before a congressional committee investigating alleged discrimination against Negroes and Puerto Ricans in unions recently, David Dubinsky cried, "I'll be damned if I will support the idea of the professional Negro, the professional Jew, the professional Italian that a man should be a union officer because of his race, color, or creed. He should be an officer on his merits, ability, character." Quite so. But ethnic and religious considerations have long been a factor in public life, partly for practical reasons but also as a means of providing upward mobility for minorities. It is rather late in the game for liberals to hold up this yardstick rigidly to the Negro.

White leaders who have not or who are thought not to have adjusted to the new tempo of racial change have come under bitter attack. (The Chicago Daily Defender recently called Dean McSwain of Northwestern University, chairman of the Chicago Mayor's Committee on School Board nominations, "a well-known Negro hater" and charged his committee was "composed of men and women who are little removed from the Ku Klux Klan and White Citizens Council mentality" because they had proposed no Negroes for school board vacancies.) These harsh criticisms, which many white liberals see as making little or no distinction between friends and enemies, have angered many of them.

Involved also in the disenchantment of some liberals with the new Negro is the realization that they are being thrust aside from positions of leadership in the civil rights effort. Having controlled this fight for so long and dictated much of its strategy, the liberals resent being pushed out. Jewish civil rights groups, for example, have always felt a special interest in the Negro. Jews were active in the creation of the N.A.A.C.P.; for many years it has had Jewish presidents. More and more, Negroes are going it alone. Newer, completely Negro-led groups, such as Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, and A. Philip Randolph's Negro Labor Council have charged or indicated by their actions that white civil rights groups and the more conservative Negro organizations have been moving too slowly or not moving at all. This has produced considerable friction within the civil rights coalition, as evidenced in the bitter debates between Randolph and George Meany of the AFL-CIO. The N.A.A.C.P. has recently added to the tension by leveling charges of racial discrimination against the Jewish leadership of the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union.

The attacks upon Jewish civil rights leadership have been still another element in the growing estrangement of liberals from the Negro. A middle-class group with special status fears growing out of their own experiences with discrimination, Jews are worried about Negroes' moving into their neighborhoods, which are often the first to be broken in the Negro advance. They are caught between their belief in interracial justice and a desire to join the middle-class exodus to the suburbs, a desire which has been heightened by evidence of Negro anti-Semitism and the rise of the "black nationalist" movements. Jews, however, continue to remain in the forefront of the civil rights fight; they are often found in the leadership of efforts to stabilize mixed neighborhoods and are usually the first to welcome newly moved-in Negro families.

In the final analysis, a liberal, white, middle-class society wants to have change, but without trouble. And this an aroused Negro community cannot provide, as was demonstrated in the freedom rides crisis. When the first riders went into Anniston and Birmingham, Alabama, in May, 1961, and were initially greeted by violence, there was strong sympathy for them. As the rides continued, however, the public mood shifted to apprehension.

Attorney General Robert Kennedy called for a cooling-off period. The head of the St. Louis Catholic Interracial Council, a veteran of more than twenty years in civil rights work, announced his opposition to the efforts of outsiders to bring about racial change while supporting sit-ins. "Whatever is used that increases racial tension," he concluded, "is not good, per se." By June 21, the Gallup Poll reported that 63 percent of those aware of the rides disapproved of them.

In his concern about avoiding social turmoil in race relations, the liberal white stands in danger of trying to contain the civil rights revolution. He cannot do this, nor would it be wise to do so if he could. It is a revolt well within the American tradition of social protest. Negro militancy, while it undoubtedly presents certain dangers, has accomplished the white liberal's goal of bringing about civil rights advances. Within a year after the first rides, barriers to racially integrated travel in the South largely disappeared. Important social change is rarely accomplished without conflict; moreover, such change in the South has always required pressures from other parts of the country. If the pent-up bitterness of the Negro community is not relieved by the type of gains symbolized in the accomplishments of the freedom rides or the equally successful boycotts to obtain jobs organized by Negro ministers in many Northern cities, it might easily burst out in new and socially irresponsible directions, perhaps in the further growth of the racist, Negro nationalist movements.

Another area of difficulty lies in the rift that has been developed between the white intellectual and the Negro. To no group is the Negro more indebted. It was the sociologists, anthropologists, psychologists, and liberal thinkers and writers who, beginning in the thirties, attacked the myth of the inferiority of Negroes and helped gain wide acceptance for the belief that Negroes should be accorded equal rights and opportunities. One of the major grounds on which the U.S. Supreme Court rested its decision on desegregation was the evidence of social scientists that public school segregation created in the minds of Negro children feelings of inferiority and denied them equal protection of the laws. It is significant that the Supreme Court has increasingly come under attack from critics outside the South for the reasoning used in its desegregation decision, although few challenge the end result of the decision. Lawyers have taken the High Court to task for basing itself "upon the quicksands of social psychology."

SINCE 1954, there have been indications of a change in the way in which the Negro and racial problems are viewed by intellectuals. There has even been an attempt to make racism scientifically respectable. One group has emerged which includes Carleton Putnam, a businessman and historian; Henry E. Garrett, former head of the Department of Psychology at Columbia and a past president of the American Psychological Association; and Nathaniel Weyl, author of The Negro in American Civilization, who argue that Negroes are inferior biologically and in innate ability to whites. They cite various studies which show that the I.Q. of Negro children is below that of white youngsters, the discrepancy becoming greater with advancing years, and point to the high rate of Negro crime and social disorganization. They attribute this to differences in brain structure between African Negroes and whites rather than to environmental shortcomings, deprivation, and discrimination.

While theories on racial differences have been repudiated by most social scientists, the appearance of these ideas and the seriousness with which they have been treated by some scholars and liberal thinkers are significant. Commenting on an article by Professor Garrett comparing Negro and white I.Q.'s in the Summer, 1961, issue of Perspectives in Biology, Professor D. J. Ingle, head of the Department of Physiology at the University of Chicago, writes, "There are reasons for thinking that racial differences in intelligence may be real." And in a review of Weyl's book, Nathan Glazer, who collaborated with David Riesman in The Lonely Crowd, while critical of Weyl's reliance on African brain-size data and on other points, concludes that he "is clearly free of any prejudice and deserves credit for having raised for public discussion crucial aspects of the Negro question which receive little discussion in academic and liberal circles, and which are usually left in the hands of bigots and incompetents. . . . What are we to make of the high rates of [Negro] crime and delinquency, illegitimacy, family break-up and school dropout?"

That there are intelligence and behavioral differences between Negroes and whites, taken as groups, is of course true. Most social scientists attribute these differences to the special historical experience of the Negro. The important thing is that these differences are not fixed, as the racial-difference theorists believe. We know that in New York's Demonstration Guidance project and Higher Horizons programs, conducted in slum schools, dramatic successes have been achieved in raising I.Q.'s and improving the behavior of Negro and Puerto Rican children. These programs point to the importance of making up for cultural shortcomings and stimulating the motivation of children to learn and behave rather than investigating African brain size.

The question that Glazer poses has been a source of growing concern to liberal thinkers (and to some Negro leaders) since 1954. John Fischer, in a widely discussed article, several months ago called upon Negro leaders to look up from the civil rights fight they are waging and give attention to remedying the behavioral and cultural shortcomings of the Negro. This emphasis has led to efforts such as Dr. Shepard's in St. Louis, to upgrade Negro slum children before they are thrown into the more difficult world of the middle-class white, and to the dramatic successes achieved by New York's Demonstration Guidance project and Higher Horizons programs. These efforts are a reflection of growth in the liberal's understanding of the full dimensions of the race problem.

There is some indication, however, that the effort, as Fischer puts it, to bring about "changes in the habits, character and ambitions of a lot of Negroes" is causing some liberals to accept postponement of pupil desegregation, especially in slum areas, although they continue to accept the goal of integration. In his important and well-received book Slums and Suburbs, James Conant, while sharply attacking discrimination against the Negro, nevertheless sees no need to try to eliminate public school segregation that results from housing patterns and is not enforced by law. "I think it would be far better for those who are agitating for the deliberate mixing of children," he writes, "to accept de facto segregated schools as a consequence of a present housing situation and to work for the improvement of slum schools whether Negro or white." He would have the community turn its attention to pouring money and social services into these schools and into slum areas in order to bring its citizens up to the level of a middle-class society.

Few would deny that this needs to be done, and in massive proportions, but one can measure the distance the pendulum has swung when it is suggested that public school desegregation be dropped out of the process of dealing with the race problem in Northern cities. It has always been a cardinal tenet of the liberal belief that segregation plays a major role in contributing to the social dynamite stored up in the Negro slum because of the second-class citizenship it automatically confers upon the Negro.

How desegregation should take place and with what safeguards, so as to protect educational excellence and maintain sound educational practice, are, of course, valid questions with which we must wrestle. But the public schools, which shape the thinking and attitudes of children and transmit our goals and values, should not be divorced from the effort to bring about an integrated society.

While the statement that there has been a pullback on the part of liberal whites will shock many of those who sincerely want to help Negroes obtain full citizenship, the phenomenon is nothing new in American history. It occurred following Civil War Reconstruction, when many of the Negro's staunchest allies retreated or withdrew completely from the civil rights battle. It has been difficult to sustain the effort to bring the Negro into the mainstream of American life in the face of the strains this creates — his cultural and economic shortcomings and the open and covert opposition to integration that exists in all parts of the country. For hostility to according the Negro social equality has been almost as powerful a force in American life as has been the effort to secure these rights for him. On a trip through the United States in 1831, Tocqueville wrote, "The prejudice of race appears to be stronger in the states that have abolished slavery than in those where it still exists; and nowhere is it as intolerant as in those states where servitude has never been known."

One other historical parallel may help to illuminate the process I am describing and to account for, particularly, the appearance of racist theories. In the latter part of the nineteenth and early twentieth century, there emerged a racist philosophy among certain intellectuals that coincided with the influx into the country of large numbers of impoverished immigrants from Southern and Eastern Europe. The counterparts of Putnam, Weyl, and Garrett — who, incidentally, came to dominate intellectual thought on racial issues down to the 1930s — also felt there are innate mental and behavioral differences between these new and older racial groups, the inhabitants of Southern and Eastern Europe possessing characteristics that would make them a burden to the community. It is not hard to see that the appearance of many Negroes in the cities of the North and West, the immigrants of our own day, has produced a similar reaction among many, including sympathetic, whites.

I do not mean to imply that all the moral fervor has gone out of the white liberal's crusade on behalf of the Negro. Many whites have taken part in freedom rides and sit-ins. A pilot experiment has been completed in Philadelphia in which 175 college and graduate students from campuses around the country spent part of their summer vacation tutoring primarily Negro youngsters to overcome school difficulties.

Nevertheless, an issue or series of issues has developed between many liberals and the Negro, the heart of which seems to be this: many liberals are hinting to a restless Negro group that they postpone their most urgent demands because many Negroes are not yet ready to be integrated into a white middle-class society and the social costs, in terms of conflict, may be too high. One writer in the liberal New Leader suggests a new Negro strategy of disengagement to repair the damaged communication lines between whites and Negroes. In other words, to the Negro demand for "now," to which the Deep South has replied "never," many liberal whites are increasingly responding "later." But the Negro will accept nothing short of first-class citizenship, now. It will call for a great deal of patience and understanding among those who make up the civil rights coalition if racial progress is not to be seriously jeopardized.

Reprinted by permission of the author from Atlantic Monthly, January, 1963.

R+R Rel

NEWS RELEASE FROM THE OFFICE OF JEWISH INFORMATION
AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS • 15 EAST 84 STREET, NEW YORK 28, N. Y. • TRafalgar 9-4500

Richard Cohen, Director,
Department of Public Relations

LWD ✓
SB

For Immediate Release

NEW YORK -- A stinging rebuke was dealt this week to the editor of "Commentary" for his article in the February issue of the magazine on "My Negro Problem -- and Ours."

Writing in "Congress bi-Weekly" for Feb. 18, Shad and Justine Wise Polier branded the article by Norman Podhoretz as "a rationalization of the witch's brew of fear turned to hatred, characteristic of those who require scapegoats in life in order to feel strong or to justify their own failures."

"Congress bi-Weekly" is published by the American Jewish Congress, of which Mr. Polier is national governing council chairman and Mrs. Polier honorary women's division president. "Commentary" is published by the American Jewish Committee, which in a footnote disclaimed responsibility for the article by the editor of its magazine.

"Podhoretz speaks of being repeatedly beaten up, robbed, terrorized and humiliated by Negroes during his childhood in Brooklyn," the Poliers wrote. "He indulges in a lengthy description of his own treatment, his persecution at the hands of Negro children.

"To what extent this tale is true, enlarged by fantasy, or based on the failure to grow up and the drive to justify his own unresolved fears, it is not possible to say. However, it is clear that very early the writer was super-sensitive to any hurt to himself while being woefully insensitive to what was happening to others."

The Polier article continued:

"There is no reference to what anyone who has grown up in the Thirties must know about the unemployment among Negroes, the lack of opportunity to move forward even if educated, the discrimination in housing, in education, in employment, the daily hurts imposed in a world that treated Negroes as less than equals in every area. Instead, one finds only...self-pity and...resentment..."

In their "Congress bi-Weekly" article, Mr. and Mrs. Polier said it was "tragic" that "as Negroes have their Black Muslims among the hurt and frustrated Negroes, so Jews should have a Podhoretz -- equally reflecting the damage and hurts of childhood fear, envy and hatred which have come to enslave him.

"The extent of that enslavement is finally revealed in Podhoretz's statement that 'In thinking about the Jews I have often wondered whether their survival as a distinct group was worth one hair on the head of a single infant,' and in the question, 'Did the Jews have to survive so that six million people should one day be burned in the ovens of Auschwitz?'

"With these two sentences," the "Congress bi-Weekly" article continued, "the writer reveals his own moral bankruptcy." The Poliers added:

"Conformity achieved through the bulldozing of all differences and the surrender of individual and group contributions to human development is apparently not too high a price -- in Podhoretz's value scale -- to pay for individual physical comfort and survival. Individual physical survival is thus to be purchased at all costs, and the concept of loving oneself not in the terms of narcissism but in terms of self-respect and the ideal of loving one's neighbor and the stranger, the great themes of Judaeo-Christian ethics, are to be cast aside.

"Only a man forgetting the mortality of all men and the immortal value of the human spirit could so degrade the meaning of life."

The Polier article closed with a quotation from a Rosh Hashanah prayer by Rabbi Perry E. Nussbaum of Jackson, Miss., read 48 hours before the beginning of mob violence on the University of Mississippi campus resulting from the admission of James Meredith:

> All men are brothers, whatever the color of their skin. Our state is part of these United States. We cry out in dismay that Mississippi should set itself up against the nation, that statesmanship has surrendered to political opportunism. O Lord, we are small in number, yet we can remain great because of the legacy our fathers have bequeathed to us. May we stride into the future, sustained by the truth of Torah. Give us the strength to declare that we are American and will abide by our nation's laws.

"Adherence to such ideals rooted in a great heritage," the Polier article concluded, "has made the survival of the Jewish people meaningful to Jews as men, and to those lands in which the Jews have lived."

RCvt-2/12/63 -30-
NP:AJ:Off:Aff:Regs.

The Sat Eve Post 2-16-63

R + R R

RETREAT OF THE REDNECKS

Progress goes marching through GEORGIA

Gov. Carl Sanders typifies new political breed. Wide-angle lens makes State Capitol seem to lean away from him.

By Ben Hibbs

Three years ago Georgia stood at the crossroads. A Federal court had ordered the Atlanta schools to integrate, and throughout the state there was deep resentment, with much inflammatory talk about massive resistance, school closings, violence if necessary.

During the preceding 20 years Georgia had piled up a striking record of progress and modernization. Industry had surged in from the North, jobs had multiplied, average family income had risen sharply, people were living better. Education was improving, and the illiteracy rate was dropping. Atlanta had become a gem among cities, and most of the large towns were booming mightily.

And yet in the winter of 1960 there was an air of apprehension in the state. Everyone knew that the Atlanta court order was only the beginning, and, with the threat of social strife hanging there like a storm cloud, cooler heads wondered whether Georgia's fine, straight march ahead was to be halted in its tracks.

Would Atlanta be another Little Rock? Would there be, in Georgia, another Prince Edward County, Virginia, where the public schools had been closed down tight—and remain closed to this day? Already there were signs that industry, which likes to operate in an atmosphere of peace and order, was beginning to look askance at Georgia. Several national companies had reported difficulty in persuading their branch-plant executives, particularly those with children, to move into the state.

The fact that in the end Georgia faced up to its problem and refused to turn back to the nineteenth century is one of the remarkable and encouraging events of our time. Today the state is moving forward at an even more rapid pace—in industrialization, in education, on the racial front, and politically. Last summer it threw out its ancient county-unit voting system, which had long given the balance of power to the rural backwaters—and to the Gene Talmadges they produced. By its example Georgia may very well point the way ahead to some of the other states in the Deep South.

"The changes are convulsive."

Georgia's new attitude is typified perfectly by a comment made to me by Gov. Carl E. Sanders when I asked him to define "a moderate." "In my case," he replied, "'moderate' means that I am a segregationist but not a damned fool."

Then he added: "I am a southerner by birth and at heart, and I believe sincerely in our traditional separation of the races. On the other hand, I am for progress. I am determined that during my administration this state will move ahead—fast. And I know that we can't have real progress in the midst of social upheavals. Consequently while I am governor we are going to obey the laws, we are not going to resist Federal court orders with violence, and we are not going to close any schools. We have seen some pretty sorry examples of that kind of folly in the South, and I want none of it in Georgia."

Sanders, a 37-year-old Augusta attorney, was elected governor last autumn after trouncing Marvin S. Griffin in the September Democratic primary. A slim, neatly dressed man who speaks fluently but without flamboyance, Sanders was a B-17 bomber pilot at age 19 in World War II. He holds a law degree from the University of Georgia, conducts a successful practice in Augusta and has served in both houses of the state legislature.

"A segregationist, but"

In Georgia the governor serves one four-year term, and although he cannot succeed himself he can run for the same office again after standing aside for one or more terms. Griffin, Sanders' opponent in the primary, had occupied the governor's chair from 1955 to 1959, and his administration was riddled with financial scandals. His attempted comeback in 1962 raised the old ghost of corruption in the State House, and Sanders pounded hard on the issue of clean government. He also hammered away on his favorite theme of progress. The state had pushed forward rapidly under Gov. S. Ernest Vandiver, whose term was drawing to a close, and Sanders insisted that nothing must check this march to better things.

And of course the race problem was an issue—although to lesser degree, apparently, than most people thought. Griffin is a forthright segregationist, as undiluted as high-proof bourbon. Sanders made it clear that he is "a segregationist but ——"

"This 'segregationist but' credo," said Ralph McGill, famed columnist and publisher of the Atlanta Constitution, "is a dichotomy that often crops up in the statements of the new breed of southern politician. And that little word 'but' and what follows can be charged with future meaning for the South."

Many of the political soothsayers gave Griffin the edge in the primary. What they overlooked was that Georgia had indeed turned a corner. Most of the voters still wish the old racial status quo could remain, and they deeply resent what they regard as northern interference in their affairs. Yet, almost suddenly, the economic motive has become more important to the majority of Georgians than the perennial battle over Negro rights. Sanders sensed this, and he won. He was unopposed in the November election.

In Georgia, perhaps more clearly than in any other state, it is possible to see with the naked eye the almost convulsive changes which are occurring in this nation's way of life. The revolution in agriculture, the exodus from the land, the urbanization of the people, the industrialization of our economy, the rising standard of living for the rank and file—all these trends are proceeding at an accelerated pace in Georgia.

Georgia is a big, sprawling state, endowed with great natural beauty in many of its areas but ugly and neglected in others. From the mountains of the north—an extension of the Great Smokies—the terrain slopes away through rolling farm country and lovely wooded hills to the broad croplands and lush pastures of the southern coastal plain. Deep, slow streams, some of them navigable in their lower reaches, flow southward to the Gulf and east to the Atlantic Ocean. Georgia's climate is benign, good hunting and fishing abound, and the outdoor life can be enjoyed most of the year.

From the time of the Civil War until the 1930's Georgia was a rural southern state—with all that implies. Its economy was based on cotton; a half century ago its compresses turned out 2,000,000 bales a year. With the exception of some tobacco, there was little other commercial farming worthy of the name. Textiles were the only industry of any consequence. Forty-acre, one-mule farms, eroding and declining in fertility, were the order of the day. On the larger places the ancient sharecropping system still had its stranglehold on the land. Forestry was a hit-and-run business, with the little peckerwood sawmills stripping the countryside and leaving desolation behind.

Fifty years ago two thirds of the population lived on the land, and most of the rural people of both races were bone-poor. Diet and sanitation were bad, and the health quotient was low. Schools were poor, and the roads for the most part were mere gashes in the red earth. The courthouse gangs ruled the political roost and all too frequently remained in power through appeals to ignorance and bias and hatred.

"Don't talk to me about the good old days," one elderly Atlanta businessman said to me. "I lived in those times, and they weren't good at all—for most folks."

Then came the day when Georgia's one-crop economy began its precipitous decline. Cotton fell upon evil days in the Southeast and moved west. Hundreds of thousands of people knew no other way of farming, no other way of life. The flight from the land began. Abandoned cotton fields grew up to weeds, and little frame dwellings along the rural roads stood vacant and sagging—melancholy symbols of an era that was gone.

These Herefords roam David Wainer's Valdosta ranch, reclaimed from devastated forests and worn-out farms.

Lockheed, turning out planes in this plant at Marietta, employs 15,000 workers in a state which industry once shunned and where Cotton ruled.

Even as late as 1940 there were still 1,500,000 people living on Georgia farms. Today all but 400,000—one tenth of the state's population—have fled to the towns and cities; and many of those who remain on farms earn most of their livelihood in the factories of nearby towns. Of Georgia's approximately 100,000 farms, moreover, 65 percent are listed as part-time farming operations.

And yet the state's agricultural income has leaped from $150,000,000 in 1940 to almost $800,000,000 in 1961. What happened was that the gospel of diversification, hybridization, better fertilization, mechanization—in short, more and better cash crops produced more efficiently—finally began to take hold. Cotton and tobacco are still grown in Georgia, but they are now only two of many cash crops. Peanuts, hybrid corn, hogs, cattle, dairy products, truck crops, pecans, peaches run into important money.

Big business in birds

The most spectacular success story of all is poultry. Georgia tops the nation in chicken production, having showed a hundredfold increase since 1940. Gainesville, a lively town in the foothills of the north Georgia mountains, claims to be, and probably is, the broiler capital of the world. Its packing plants process around 230,000,000 broilers a year, turning out everything from the whole bird to quick-frozen chicken pie. Chickens and eggs together yielded an income of $242,208,000 for the state as a whole in 1961—close to one third of the total farm take.

Gradually Georgia's idle croplands are being returned to grass—to support the rapidly growing cattle industry—and to fast-growing pine trees, which have become one of the big-money crops. Farmers are being taught scientific forestry for perpetual yield, and today many a farm realizes more money from its timber than it garnered from cotton in the old days.

One of the finest examples of regrassing and retimbering I have ever seen is the ranch of David S. Wainer near Valdosta in south Georgia. In 1939 Wainer began assembling worn-out farms and devastated woodlands and now has a ranch of 2,381 acres. He built 83,000 feet of terraces to stop erosion, covered the depleted land with fast-spreading grasses, and set out 600,000 trees.

Today the Wainer ranch is a beautiful piece of countryside. More than 300 polled Hereford cattle roam the pastures, 200 acres are in corn and tobacco, and the woodlands are ready to begin harvesting on a perpetual basis. Wainer expects his experiment to start yielding a substantial profit in 1963. "Many authorities predict," he said to me, "that this southeastern coastal plain some day will be the top cattle country of the nation."

The agricultural revolution is by no means at an end in Georgia. The consolidation of small farms into larger holdings goes on apace. People are still leaving the farms in droves for city jobs. But there are still many small, submarginal farms in Georgia. Rural poverty, and the ignorance that always attends it, still exist in some of the little backwaters. The poor whites, or rednecks, as they are often called in Georgia, are still there, although in much smaller numbers. All but 10 percent of the Negroes have gone to the cities along with the white folks. Meantime, coincident with the revolution in farming, manufacturing came to the towns and cities, attended by a vast upsurge in wholesaling and general business.

Today Georgia makes hundreds of products for all manner of human needs, from furniture and fertilizers to ballpoint pens and brassieres. The value of Georgia's manufactured products in 1939 stood at $677,000,000, and by 1960 the figure had risen to $5,756,000,000. In one brief generation the state had become a major manufacturing area, and the trend continues at an increasing pace.

While all this was occurring on the economic and sociological front, Georgia clung to its traditional ways politically and in racial matters. Then, three years ago, things began to happen. The turning point, many leading Georgians will tell you, came early in that apprehensive year of 1960 with hearings on integration of public schools.

In the midst of the uproar which followed the Atlanta integration order, the legislature—it is called the General Assembly in Georgia—decided to set up a commission and sound out public opinion at the grass roots. John A. Sibley, attorney and banker, regarded by many as Atlanta's most distinguished citizen, was persuaded to head the commission, a thankless job which invited brickbats from all directions. Sibley was 72 at the time and entitled, perhaps, to the serenity of advancing years, but he took on the task with quiet aplomb.

"I did it because I felt it should be done," he said to me simply when I visited him in his Atlanta office. Then he went on with a smile, "We can cope with our problems down here when we go about it intelligently. Incidentally, I am told that the North now has almost as many Negroes as we do in the South. You people have your ways, and we have ours, and I often wonder whether you handle the situation any better than we do."

Sibley and his commission held hearings in Georgia's 10 congressional districts and listened to the firebrands and the calm citizens with patience, humor, and good sense. In the end the commission turned in a report which rocked the state. The net of the findings was that, come what might, most people did not want their schools closed. Nor did they want violence. A sharp minority report took issue with Sibley's conclusions, however, and again some of the politicians began to yell bloody murder.

"This is always the pattern," said Eugene Patterson, able young editor of the historic Atlanta Constitution. "The politicians stir up the people, and away we go. If they would quit yapping and show some restraint, we southerners could handle, with peace and order, the inevitable

Atlanta: fed by expressways, hell-bent for culture.

"The state is learning to play by the new changes that are coming. Most folks nowadays simply don't want this kind of trouble."

The first school integration in Georgia came, not in Atlanta, but at the University of Georgia, in Athens, during the winter of 1961. An embryonic riot, which might have grown into a holocaust as damaging as the recent affair in Mississippi, was squelched by state troopers before it got out of control.

In the fall of 1961 the Atlanta public schools were integrated without incident, and much of the credit goes to Mayor William B. Hartsfield, now retired, who mounted a campaign of citizen education. Week after week Bill Hartsfield answered the yammering of the politicians with the clear voice of reason. By the autumn of 1962 about 40 Negro children were attending previously all-white schools in Atlanta. Thus far this is the only public-school integration in the state.

At a higher level, Georgia Tech, Emory University and Georgia State College—all at Atlanta—have now been integrated peacefully, and Agnes Scott College, an old and aristocratic girls' school in nearby Decatur, has announced that it will accept colored students next fall.

Public transportation and various other public facilities are now integrated in Atlanta and in some other Georgia towns. The city's baseball team, the Atlanta Crackers, which won the Little World Series in 1962, has both white and colored players. In some of the factories of Atlanta and other industrial towns I saw Negroes and whites working side by side and in some cases using the same washrooms and eating facilities. Here and there I saw Negro foremen supervising white workers. In Atlanta, which has more good eating places than most northern cities of equal or larger size, Negroes now dine at several of the better restaurants without causing even a ripple of interest among the white patrons.

Many Georgia Negroes own and operate prosperous businesses, and on the southwestern outskirts of Atlanta I saw a large district of handsome Negro homes in the $30,000 to $50,000 class. Residential areas are still tightly segregated throughout most of Georgia, just as they are in northern cities.

Two months ago, in fact, race relations in Atlanta ran, quite literally, into a roadblock. To thwart—at least symbolically—the efforts of some real-estate men to move Negroes into a white residential section, the city's Board of Aldermen on December 17 ordered barricades erected on two streets running between Negro and white residential areas. Sixteen city streets had been quietly desegregated during the preceding year, but now an issue was created, and the two-foot, 10-inch-high barriers have become known as "Atlanta's Berlin Wall." As this is written a suit by the Negro All-Citizens Committee to have the "wall" removed is pending in court. Moderates hope the matter will not spark a reversal in Atlanta's—and the state's—generally impressive record in bettering race relations.

In all Georgia cities and many of the smaller places Negroes now vote as a matter of course. A young Negro attorney, LeRoy Johnson—a Democrat—was elected to the State Senate from one of the Atlanta districts in November. His Republican opponent was a Negro. It is the first time the color line has been broken in the General Assembly since 1907.

In Albany, where there were disturbances last year when Negro leaders attempted to effect the integration of public facilities, I talked with Mayor Asa D. Kelley Jr. Mayor Kelley, an attorney, is a restrained and moderate man, troubled and perhaps a bit resentful that his town was chosen as a target for the seething new forces at work in the South. "When the Negroes came to me with their plan," he said, "I advised them to wait for a court order. They refused and went ahead, and we enforced our long-standing city ordinances against such demonstrations. Now the matter is in the courts, and if and when the order comes down to integrate we'll do our best to conform."

Last summer two Negro churches were burned in southwest Georgia by roughnecks out for some excitement. In the rural counties of southern Georgia, where the colored population runs as high as 75 percent—it is about 29 percent in the state as a whole—segregation is still flint-hard and will be for a long time to come.

Doubtless there will be unhappy incidents from time to time in Georgia, but, by and large, the state is learning to play by the new rules with peace and order. Lately numerous political leaders have begun to soft-pedal their statements.

Perhaps the foremost architect of this changing attitude is Ralph McGill, who was the editor of the Constitution for many years before he became publisher. Short of stature but a towering figure journalistically, McGill writes an eloquent and courageous front-page column, which is also syndicated throughout the nation.

Although a southerner, McGill is no "segregationist, but ——". He believes passionately in the cause of Negro rights, and he wages the battle hard day after day. As a result he is both loved and hated throughout the state and the South. He and his wife, who died last spring, and his son have been subjected to barrages of vicious phone calls. His mailbox was blown up with a small bomb, and one night a shot fired from the street blasted through a window of his home.

When Carl Sanders won his race for the governorship in September, the Augusta Courier, a little weekly newspaper published by a shrill racist named Roy V. Harris, headlined the result with a streamer in red ink: McGill's Race Mixing Philosophy Won Sweeping Victory Sept. 12th. On an inside page was a cartoon showing the sun rising over the Georgia landscape, and on the sun's disk was a sinister caricature of Ralph McGill's face. McGill regards this attack as a delightful tribute and has a framed copy of the paper hanging on the wall of his office. "I'm going to will it to my son," he said to me, laughing.

Muscle for city voters

This has been a year of decision in Georgia in more ways than one. In the spring of 1962 the United States Supreme Court handed down its momentous decision which in effect said that apportionment of voting strength must be more fairly arranged in the states to give our exploding urban areas an equitable ratio of political power. In many states, citizens moved immediately to implement the decision through localized court action. It was one such suit that brought the old county-unit voting system tumbling down in Georgia and gave genuine franchise to the cities.

The State Senate was quickly reapportioned, and reapportionment of the House probably will follow. Equally important, candidates for state offices and Congress could now win or lose by the actual will of the people, solely on the basis of the popular vote. Politicians of the new young breed threw their hats in the air and scrambled to get into various races.

Charles L. Weltner, a 34-year-old Atlanta attorney—a cool customer and a progressive of the Sanders stripe—entered the congressional primary in the Fifth District, which includes Atlanta proper, and licked Congressman James C. Davis, an old-guard Democrat who had served eight terms—and who would have won again under the county-unit system. Ironically, Carl Sanders, who had delayed his decision to run for governor until it was obvious that the old system was on its way out, would have won even under the county-unit plan.

A lot of the impetus for change in Georgia has come from Atlanta, and, as everyone who lives there will tell you, it is a fabulous city. The population of the five-county metropolitan area has leaped 40 percent in the past dozen years and now stands at well over a million. The city's better residential areas are as beautiful as any I have ever seen, and in the midtown area many handsome new office buildings produce an impressive skyline. Subdivisions, dotted with gigantic new shopping centers, push out and out. Atlanta has long been the largest wholesaling and distribution center of the Southeast, and it has now become the leading manufacturing city of that area, with about 1,800 industrial plants in the metropolitan area.

The city was lucky in the fact that much of its industrial growth came late—after the planners had learned that everything doesn't have to be in the middle of town. Atlanta now has 25 pockets of industrial plants on the outskirts of the city proper, and a good many of these are impressive industrial parks, landscaped, green and beflowered. Much of the city's manufacturing is "clean industry," and there are few smokestacks.

Atlanta is also a city hell-bent for culture—perhaps more so than any other city in the South. It has its own symphony of professional quality, a host of other musical activities, numerous art groups and museums and firm plans to create a full-fledged art school. The Metropolitan Opera comes to Atlanta for a week each spring, Broadway shows hit Atlanta regularly, and little-theater groups are active. The city is also a center of higher education, with the previously-named institutions, a wide variety of trade schools, and a complex of five outstanding Negro colleges.

If it was once true that Atlanta was an island of progress in a backward state, this is no longer so. Every town I visited had at least one spanking new public-school building—usually huge and ultra-modern. Much emphasis is now being placed on more and better vocational education, to teach the skills that all this new industry demands. Many of the larger and medium-size towns such as Augusta, Macon, Athens, Gainesville, Columbus, Albany, Valdosta, Waycross and others are showing a lot of foot—with new industry flooding in. Savannah, an old seacoast city steeped in southern traditions, has improved its port facilities and is getting some new industry, but it is not pushing ahead as fast as Atlanta.

Many private firms in the cities are trying hard to see that industry is spread evenly over the state. Among the most effective of these are the railroads and the Georgia Power Company. Another is the Citizens and Southern National Bank, which has 52 branches in the state. Mills Lane, a volatile citizen who sometimes rules of integration."

wears colorful sport shirts to the office, heads this sprawling financial empire and takes the long view that the state as a whole must move forward as a piece. He has a hard-hitting industrial department that has helped bring scores of new plants to many Georgia towns.

Despite all this I suspect that many of the little rural villages are fated to dry up and blow away—at least so far as retail business is concerned. Already the business streets of a lot of them present a dreary spectacle indeed, with half the stores and shops boarded up. Many of the people who live in these crossroads places now drive from 10 to 40 miles over Georgia's good highways to factory jobs in other towns—and do their buying in the larger places where they work.

Georgians want to learn

Georgia's factory labor, at least a dozen plant managers said, is highly productive. Several said their man-hour production was better than in their companies' northern plants. Although most of the workers are relatively unskilled when recruited, I heard much testimony about how easy they are to train.

"These people want to learn," said W. A. Pulver, president of Lockheed-Georgia, which, with 15,000 workers in its vast plant at Marietta, is the largest private industrial employer in the Southeast. Lockheed makes military cargo airplanes at its Georgia plant, and also plush little jet-powered private planes priced at $1,400,000.

Unions have not made as much headway in the South as elsewhere and, generally speaking, are less militant. The Georgia factory worker fresh off the farm is apt to be an independent character, who is usually proud of his job and his company. Georgia has one of those controversial Right-to-Work laws, which in effect says that a man doesn't have to join a union to hold his job, and employers from the North like this too.

In many plants, although by no means all of them, white labor is preferred, and the Negro still gets the short end of the stick—precisely as in the North. A notable exception is Scripto, an old Atlanta firm which makes mechanical pencils, ballpoint pens and cigarette lighters by the millions. When I visited Scripto recently, it had 1,320 employees, and 950 were Negroes, 850 of them Negro women.

"Negro women do better on our type of assembly line than most white workers," said James V. Carmichael, president of the firm. "This is no sociological experiment with us. It's just good business."

Median family income in Georgia stood at $4,208 in 1960, well below the national average of $5,660 but far above Mississippi's $2,884. As in most southern states, the general level of education also falls below the national average, and the illiteracy rate is higher. Georgia still needs more jobs, and it needs to keep more of its talented young people at home instead of sending them north. In fact, the state still has some distance to go on several fronts. But it is catching up. Georgia has turned the corner. THE END

With school integration barely under way, John Henry Carter stars for his Atlanta high school's basketball team.

✓ ML - see page 3. back cover quote?
MA ✓
SB ✓
R+R Rel.

RACIAL RELATIONS OR HUMAN RELATIONS: WHICH DO WE WANT?

by

The Reverend Charles M. Jones
Community Church
Chapel Hill, N. C.

February 24, 1963

I am glad you are having a Human Relations Institute rather than a Race Relations Institute. I am convinced institutes to improve racial relations are primarily valuable as they reduce tension between the races, but "improved racial relations" are not an ultimate solution to the problem of Negro and white people living together. We would have no racial problems if we could let color be incidental in our considerations and humanity be primary.

I am aware of the danger of shifting the emphasis from "racial relations" to "human relations." "Human" is a more general term than "racial" and it is easy to get lost in generalities and miss close-at-hand particularities in this shift of emphasis, especially when these particularities are difficult and painful ones.

This human tendency to approve of general truths but be blind to the particular application was illustrated recently in a state-wide meeting of members of an international service club when an international officer, an oriental Indian, addressed the gathering on the general theme of "Brotherhood." From newspaper reports this was a good talk and it received well-deserved applause. Yet here was a man of color speaking to an all-white audience on brotherhood under conditions that would prevent an American man of color from hearing his talk unless he listened from the kitchen where he cooked or as he served as a waiter at the tables! This is not to suggest that either the speaker or the listeners were insincere on this occasion, it is to point out how easy it is to escape particularities in generalities.

Race is Irrelevant in "Human" Relationships.

It is my belief that any ultimate solution of the race problem will be one that counts race or color as totally irrelevant in human relations and I trust as we continue we shall deal not simply with generalities we can all applaud but with particularities even though they be difficult and painful ones.

Of course, one will not accept this approach unless he believes Negroes and white persons alike are human beings. As one who is a Christian (or perhaps more accurately, attempts to be) I think we must begin with this conviction, -- Negroes and whites, each and all are children of the One God, each and all are made in God's image, each and all more valuable than anything else in God's creation, each and all fallible and imperfect but redeemable, each and all made to love not only God but one another.

The Relationship of Justice - "The Right to Have."

Believing this, let us proceed to ask what a "human" relationship ought to be. The relationship of justice is a good starting point. Surely every human being has a right to justice and an obligation to give justice in his relationships with other human beings. Dr. Kyle Haselden, in a book "The Racial Problem in Christian Perspective" has a chapter entitled "The Right to Have" in which is this quotation from Emil Brunner, "The sphere of justice embraces all that 'belongs,' all that is a man's due, all that he has a right to." And Dr. Haselden adds, "Justice is the relationship that ought to exist between person and person or between persons regarding a 'something,' a thing or a condition."

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

What then are the "things" or "conditions" we human beings have a right to? The list is long and we know them well, -- schools, property, jobs and promotions, eating places, swimming pools -- these and more are the things any human being ought to have, not because he is white nor because he is black, but because he is human. Then there are intangible things like justice in the courts and respect.

When we ask just how "human" are the relationships between our races we can with some truthfulness say they are not as bad here as elsewhere in the South. We might. With something like the words of the Pharisee we might pray, "O Lord, we thank thee that we are not like other Southern States." The notion is abroad that this was wrong for the Pharisee to pray this way, to be thankful he wasn't as bad as someone else. Wrong or not, I am thankful I can try to be a human being in North Carolina instead of Mississippi. I am thankful our governor will ask for the hiring and promotion of persons on a "human" basis and not a racial basis. I am thankful the University of North Carolina has been more "human" in its reception of Negro students than has the University of Mississippi. But the danger is (and that was the trouble with the Pharisee) our relatively better "human" relationships may make us over-estimate our goodness and thus make us complacent and become proud. The danger is having said with truthfulness and genuineness "O Lord, we thank thee we are not like Mississippi", we will not have the insight and grace to further say, "O Lord, we have fallen far short of what we ought to be and do in "human relationships of justice."

As a matter of fact, we do over-estimate our goodness in offering education on a "human" rather than "racial" consideration. With only 16 school districts out of 173 desegregated, with only 900 children out of 340,000 (.265 percent) Negro children in desegregated schools we stand third from the bottom of all Southern states which have any desegregation at all! Virginia has nearly twice as large a percent of her Negro children in this "human" relationship than North Carolina. Here we North Carolinians have had more peace but less progress than Virginia. It is not our "humanity" but our "race" that determines where we can buy homes, rent rooms or purchase meals. Even in publicly-owned facilities like swimming pools and parks, where we are taxed on the basis of humanity (and income), usage is determined not by one's being a member of the human race but by being a Negro or a foreign visitor. We have much improved in granting people the right to be employed and promoted on a "human" rather than "racial" basis. It is my belief that there will soon exist, if they do not now exist, more employers willing to employ without regard to race than there exist Negroes qualified to apply for them as "human beings" along with all others. This area is rapidly becoming "humanized."

How fares North Carolina in the more intangible realms, the right to vote and the right to justice? I believe we may have some few places where subtle and perhaps illegal means are used to cut off a person from this right by reason of race. Such inhumanity must be ferreted out and remedied but there is more freedom here than is used.

Just decisions in our courts as regards guilt or innocence and fair penalties for guilt are, I believe, more often made in our State than many other Southern states. Even so, it seems more difficult to get a conviction of prominent white people for crimes against less prominent Negroes than it is to get the conviction of less prominent Negroes for crimes against white people. There is reason to believe that here in Greensboro you hold a judge in such high respect you have had him speak to you in the Institute of Human Relations. In my own town of Chapel Hill we have a judge who makes his decisions seeing only human beings before him and not Negro or white human beings.

There is one respect in which our local court (I do not know about yours) fails human beings in our town, and that is in the right to have respect. A young Negro, thirty years of age, is sometimes addressed or spoken to as "boy." He is often, perhaps always, addressed by his first name, "Sam," "John" or whatever it may be. I have heard elderly Negro women addressed as "Susie," or "Mamie" or whatever their first name might be. I have never heard a white human being, a woman, sixty years of ages addressed other than "Mrs." I have often longed for a young Negro, thirty years of age, to say, "Sir, I may have done wrong, but I am thirty years old. I am a man, not a boy." How I have wished some elderly Negro woman would upon being called "Susie" by judge or lawyer, say, "Sir, I may have done wrong, but I am old enough to be your mother. My name is Mrs. Susie Smith." I must admit, however, I do not know if I would have that courage in a similar situation.

One further fact should be pointed out as we consider the right of human beings to have. Most of the advancement made in North Carolina has come not by a willing and glad bestowal of these rights but by hard-won and expensive law suits, by picketing and boycotting. It is also important to point out that the winning of this progress was by "human beings" and not simply by "Negro human beings."

Is it not plain when we look not at other states and what they have failed to do but at what a good "human relationship" ought to be, we North Carolinians have more reason to be penitent and humble than proud, dedicated and courageous than satisfied?

Christians unite with Jews in accepting the command of God as passed to us through the prophet Amos: "Let justice roll down as waters, and righteousness as a mighty stream." As justifiedly thankful as we may be, our present task is to let the trickle of justice that is ours become a mighty stream.

Human Beings Have "The Right To Belong."

In Dr. Haselden's book, previously referred to, there is a chapter with the title "The Right To Belong." This, too, is a right human beings should both enjoy and grant. The Bible says, "For God hath made of one blood all nations on the face of the earth" and "God is no respecter of persons." From our Judaic-Christian faith we have been taught to speak of "one family under God" or "the family of mankind." If these be more than slogans they mean that human beings "belong to one another." Dr. Haselden points out that it is discrimination that denies "the right to have", but it is segregation that denies the "right to belong." "Segregation," he writes, "breaks the union of those who ought to be united."

It is at this point Christianity has failed us most, or better put,

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

Christians have failed Christianity most. It is our religion which should have stirred our consciences to see that human beings, colored ones as well as white ones should be granted the "right to have." But had it done that, it would have not been enough. Not only do things belong to people, but people belong to people. So we go to the heart of the matter when we seek not simply better relationships between the races so that Negroes can have more things and better conditions , but to change men's minds and move their hearts so that in the "belongingness" of life we see not "Negro human beings" nor "white human beings" but simply "human beings."

Look at the great change that would take place if "the right to belong" were seen as a "human" and not a "racial" relationship. Descendants of Crispus Attucks, the human being who happened to be black and was killed in the Boston Massacre in 1770 would be invited to "belong" to the Sons or Daughters of the American Revolution. Negro veterans of wars would as "human beings" be invited to join the American Legion. Barbers, restauranteurs, merchants, not Negroes or whites, would belong to the Merchants Association.* Negro doctors would be seen first of all as "human" and not "Negro" and enjoy all the privileges and pleasures of the North Carolina Medical Association; young matrons, with color counted as irrelevant, would be asked to join the Junior Service League. Negro human beings instead of being gingerly welcomed and seated at worship in "white" churches would be gladly received and eagerly sought for as members, not because they were Negroes (as sometimes happens) but because they are human. What a revolution would take place in our "belongingness" if we could get good human relations.

Let us go further and insist that the right to belong applies not only to groups, but to more personal relationships. The oft-skirted and much feared topic of inter-racial marriage needs to be faced honestly in this perspective. It is indeed a sensitive and touchy subject, but it is so only because we do not see each other as human beings, children of the One God, all members of the family of God. The highest and most sacred relationship one human being can have with another is that of marriage which is both first and last a union of love. This ought not be denied by law nor frowned upon by neighbors when human beings with different skin colors are concerned. Because of the long and tragic segregation of the races we have grown fearful of facing the fact that it is inhuman to deny this personal right to belong to one another across racial lines.

No doubt, inter-racial marriages face legal and sociological problems. But two human beings, one white and one black, break only human laws and not God's laws when they marry. Though men may fear, deplore and condemn such marriages, I am convinced they are blessed in the sight of God. Now this is not to advocate the solution of the race problem by racial inter-marriages. Marriages formed to solve problems are seldom successful, whether the problem be the race problem, alcoholism or anything else. Marriage is for love not for reformation. The race problem will not be solved by racial intermarriages but the "right to belong" in this highest and most sacred relationship man knows will be a blessed part of the solution. If only we could see one another as "human beings" rather than "racial beings", all the necessity for pussyfooting, hush-hushing, deploring and fearing of this human relationship would cease.

---

* Since delivering this talk at least one Junior Chamber of Commerce has under consideration the change of its constitution whereby membership will be no longer on a racial basis.)

Lest these last remarks drive out of your minds the full import of what I have tried to say, let me summarize. We do have a tremendous racial problem in our country and in North Carolina. Its ultimate and best solution will not be by "improving race relations," but by establishing good "human relationships" wherein race is a totally irrelevant factor. If we can see each other as fellow human beings we might then grant the right to have and the right to belong each to the other.

We will not solve all the problems of the world but we will take care of the race problem.

---

Kyle Haselden, "The Racial Problem in Christian Perspective"
Harper & Brothers, New York, 1959

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

R+R Rel

ADDRESS OF

Governor Bert Combs

at

Chicago Conference for Brotherhood

PALMER HOUSE, CHICAGO

FEBRUARY 24, 1963

Gov. Bert T. Combs displays the Brotherhood Award presented to him by the Chicago Conference for Brotherhood on the evening he addressed the group. The Governor was honored for the creation of the Kentucky Commission on Human Rights, sponsorship of governors' conferences on human rights, and enactment of a merit system for State employees forbidding racial discrimination. At left is Dr. Charles D. Proctor, chairman of the Chicago group and at right is Frank Stanley, Sr., publisher of the Louisville Defender, who introduced Combs at the Conference meeting.

TO MAKE BROTHERHOOD WEEK more than a mere festive occasion, we must be guided by the tenets which make up Christian brotherhood. It is not sufficient merely to talk about tolerance and charity and brotherhood. Unless we live by those principles, our voices are no more than sounding brass and tinkling cymbal.

Equality and cooperation are the lamps of civilization. As civilized people, then, we Americans must accept the challenge and lead the way by lighting the torch of freedom for oppressed people, both at home and all over the world, so that every human being will glisten with a new light glowing from a living brotherhood of individual merit and private initiative. Only in this manner will our nation become equipped to take its rightful place in the vanguard of the present world liberation movement. And only in this manner can America truly become a contributing part of the world's great revolutionary and liberating forces which are more powerful than atomic fission.

The whole universe knows first-hand that while America attempts to provide food, comfort and protection for most of the distant peoples of the world, it still refuses to provide here at home the most vital of all constitutional rights -- first-class citizenship for everyone. But the time has come when the opponents of decency and right must recognize the inevitability of change. We stand at the dawn of a new day, on a new path toward full citizenship and personal dignity. At the beginning of our great nation, Americans assumed a mortgage on their freedom -- but after almost two centuries, we are in the throes of bankruptcy because we are behind in our payments to the United States Constitution.

World Wars I and II were interest installments. The Supreme Court decisions of May 17, 1954, and May 31, 1955, and all of America's great achievements, scientifically and technologically, were but interest payments. But we are still behind on the principal . . . in spite of our tremendous bank account of friendly harmony without conformity. It is now time for everybody, every state to pay up.

And the most delinquent of all are those who still persist in opposing law and order. No longer can America carry the total burden of freedom without reforming or dispossessing those delinquents. No longer can we be silent about those who would control our house and yet not contribute to its upkeep.

Government, be it at the national level or the state level, should heed the admonition of Washington, who said, "Happily, the government of the United States, which gives to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance, requires only that they who live under its protection should demean themselves as good citizens in giving it on all occasions their effectual support."

In this day and time, freedom has become more than an academic word. It is no longer sufficient merely to talk and write of the ingredients of the good life and the dignity of man. In this grave hour in which you and I are privileged to live, fraught paradoxically with great peril and great promise, the value and durability of full citizenship rights are to be found more in our actions than our words, in our collective efforts and individual beliefs.

Freedom is many things to many people. However, in the final analysis, it is a matter of choice. It is a choice between right and wrong, between good and evil, doing or not doing, and in going forward or backward. We make progress in proportion to our ability to make the right choices in the marketplace of life.

A world unfinished and broken must be made whole. If American freedom is to live, then all segregation must die. There is no more important or basic advance that our country needs than complete liberation of all of our citizens, and the granting of their privilege "of freedom to be free."

Tonight, I particularly salute my Negro fellow citizens, both in my own state and across the nation on this the Centennial of their Emancipation from slavery. As Governor of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, the birth state of the Great Emancipator, I believe that while President Lincoln began a noble task 100 years ago, it still remains unfinished.

Our state and nation will never realize their full potential until every man is privileged to enjoy all the great privileges of democracy. It is time now for those of us in states like Kentucky, as well as all others, to supply modern extensions to the Emancipation Proclamation.

In the words of Lincoln, "The dogmas of the quiet past are not sufficient for these troublesome times. As our case is new, so must we think anew."

We must see to it that there are no second-class citizens in America. We must not only do this because it is morally right, but we must subdue all forces that would destroy by violence and master by fear the mind, souls, and bodies of the underprivileged. I submit that America and every one of our fifty states is richer today for the advancement the Negro has won. And our society is more mature for what it has had to learn in granting him, all too slowly, his freedom. But yet the task ahead poses significant challenges.

As we embark upon the second century following the Emancipation, we observe that there are more forces working for the realization of civil rights for all Americans than ever before in history. And we of the South are happy to report that there are fewer resistant states than ever before, with the number dwindling to only a few. Much of the credit for this progress must go to the Negro himself, because he has demonstrated a remarkable capacity to work with his white neighbors for their common benefit, in addition to the ability to rise from slavery and become an educated contributor to himself and the community.

The Negro must be given credit for having met the patriotic demands made upon him by his nation, all of which have required equal sacrifice in time of war and emergency, while at the same time the Negro was receiving unequal rewards.

In the South, our progress is slow and often painful, but it is steady and appears to be inevitable. But the problem of segregation is not limited to the South alone. For, indeed, the problem of racial segregation which pits the Negro at the bottom of everything is a national, not a sectional, one. For there is no northern city without its tensions and shame. This does not excuse the South, but rather points up the fact that nowhere in our nation is the Negro yet truly free. In the North, the issue is not one of resistance to law. It is de facto rather than de jure, and it is in the North that the last battle for equal rights may be fought in America. I refer to the hidden agreements that bar the minority citizen from housing outside the ghetto; the employment practices that often hold him in menial status, regardless of his capabilities; and the over-burdened neighborhood schools which deprive him of an adequate education, despite his ambition -- these are the subtle forms of denial, the most difficult to eliminate.

The American Negro, while he seeks and has largely found identification with the main stream of American life, has suffered more than any other Americans from occupational and technological dislocations. And yet it is our nation that is the greatest sufferer, because without the spirit of brotherhood there can be no real solution of our economic, social or personal difficulties.

Most of society's ills can be remedied only by the acceptance of responsibility and mutual cooperation to solve common problems. It is important in seeking to effect a living brotherhood of men that we begin by planting the seed wherever we are all over the nation. Because, as you and I know, there are always those among us who pay only lip service to civil rights, tolerance and brotherhood.

Brotherhood needs constant working-at all over America. There is much the Negro can do for himself. In Kentucky, for instance, in the 1960 presidential election, only 59 per cent of the citizens of voting age cast a vote. The average for the United States was 64 per cent. Illinois did remarkably well, comparatively, with 76 per cent of the voting-age residents casting their ballot.

But that is not the whole picture.

A large percentage of our citizens of voting age do not take the trouble to register. It is unfortunately true that in some communities, where Negroes are unhampered by voting restrictions, they do not take full advantage of the privilege to vote. In Louisville, for example, 44 per cent of the white population was registered to vote last fall, but only 28.6 per cent of the Negro population was registered.

We sometimes get the erroneous impression that only groups and organizations can correct social injustice. We forget that one dedicated person can sometimes move a mountain. William Jennings Bryan said, "The humblest citizen of all the land when clad in the armor of righteous cause is stronger than all the hosts of error."

I do not mean that we as individuals will always succeed in these endeavors, but I suggest this thought. It is better to be an outstanding failure than a mediocre do-nothing. In large part, it is the character of the effort, the trying itself, that determines the greatness of the individual. People who do not try anything difficult are the real failures. Life for them is the roll call of what might have been -- a parade of untried opportunities.

We are more likely to succeed in our efforts to correct injustices if we deal from strength rather than from weakness. Americans, more than most people, respect strength. The American Negro can move faster toward economic and social equality by making himself strong at his polling place.

While President Lincoln by proclamation released the Negro from civil bondage, he left a great responsibility to the Americans who followed him. That responsibility -- resting upon all of us -- is to free ourselves of the bonds of prejudice which deny to the Negro his full citizenship rights.

Let us always remember that democracy is never static. It is a constantly moving force that challenges us continuously to reach new and higher levels of achievement each day. There are many ways to meet the challenge of leadership in interracial matters. But I suggest quite simply that we begin anew in our own hearts and minds to strive to treat every man as an individual and never judge anyone in a general sense. Let us become more thoroughly aware of the very patterns of prejudice that yet exist on our jobs, in public accommodation, churches, in our neighborhood and nation, and resolve to use our every influence to eradicate them.

Let us be willing to state intelligently and firmly at all times our own personal opposition to bigotry in all of its varied forms. Let us never acquiesce in discrimination. Let each of us in this audience tonight make the choice for complete freedom, not only for ourselves, but also for our fellow citizens and human brothers all over the world. Making this choice will become easier if we realize that as the spiritual inheritors of all of civilization's past, we are not only the trustees of its glorious present, but we are the architects for its boundless future.

As the late Elmer Davis once said, "Civilization is not what our ancestors have built, but our capacity to build intellectually and spiritually, as well as architecturally." Therefore, the solution to the problems of brotherhood rests squarely on our own shoulders and our willingness to work full-time in quest of human dignity.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF # COMMERCE
Luther H. Hodges, Secretary Washington 25, D. C.

Office of the Secretary

R & RR

For A.M. Release on Tuesday, February 26, 1963

Address by Secretary of Commerce Luther H. Hodges Prepared For Delivery at Second Annual Brotherhood Award Dinner, Memphis Round Table of the National Conference of Christians and Jews, Chisca Hotel, Memphis, Tenn., 8:30 P.M. Monday, February 25, 1963.

It is a pleasure to join with you tonight in thanking Edward Meeman for his many outstanding contributions to the cause of human brotherhood.

You have already heard many things about his constructive leadership as editor of the Press Scimitar and about his dedicated community service activities which have contributed so much to the social and economic progress of this Mid-South region and to the very substantial progress you have made here in Memphis in the crucial area of better human relations.

I want to compliment the people of Memphis for the highly constructive approach they have taken on this difficult problem of race relations. You have demonstrated how much can be accomplished in a relatively short time when responsible leaders of both races work together in good faith to serve the best interests of all of the citizens of the community.

As a Southerner, I congratulate you on the honorable beginning you have made toward meaningful brotherhood in a highly sensitive area of human relations.

Tennessee has enjoyed progressive leadership in many areas of national policy in the past. An example is Mr. Meeman's strong, life-long commitment to the cause of freer trade among the nations of the world--a cause which, I feel is closely related to our national goal of an expanding international brotherhood of free men.

Mr. Meeman was one of the most vigorous supporters of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962--that bold new instrument of the liberal trade philosophy of another great Tennesseean, Cordell Hull, who fashioned the first reciprocal trade act in 1934.

He is also a valued member of the Memphis Regional Export Expansion Council, which is helping the Department of Commerce in its national effort to expand the sale of U. S. products abroad. I am looking forward to meeting with him and with the other members of this council at breakfast tomorrow to discuss ways of putting more steam behind this vital effort.

It is essential that we increase our exports from the Mid-South and from every other part of our nation. We must sell more abroad to strengthen our domestic economic growth. But most importantly, we must increase our export earnings to offset the continuing deficit in our balance of international payments--which is serious indeed.

Since 1957 our total payments to other countries have exceeded our receipts by several billions of dollars a year. In 1960 we were running in the red in our international accounts to the tune of nearly $4 billion a year. The result has been a heavy drain on our gold reserves and a massive build-up of dollar claims on our gold by foreign banks, individuals, and governments.

In two years, through a variety of measures, we have cut this annual deficit nearly in half--to $2.2 billion in 1962. But this reduced deficit is still much too much--so far as I am concerned, $2.2 billion too much. To maintain our financial position in the world--and maintain our position of political leadership in the free world--we must bring our international accounts into balance.

Our balance of payments deficits result largely from our country's heavy moral commitment to the ideal of a world brotherhood of freedom, prosperity, and peace--an ideal implicit in our great Judaic-Christian religious heritage.

Over the years we have continued to enjoy a substantial surplus of exports over imports in our merchandise trade with other nations. But these export earnings have been more than offset by our overseas military expenditures to help safeguard freedom, by our foreign aid expenditures, and by our U. S. private investment in the economic development of other countries.

All of these expenditures, we presently feel, are indispensable to the creation of the kind of world in which free men can live together as brothers with a decent standard of living for all. We are minimizing the dollar outflows through various means, but we cannot in wisdom eliminate them altogether.

The only practical solution is to increase our exports. If our exports were at least 10 percent larger than they are, we would go a long way toward eliminating the annual deficit in our international accounts.

But the required $2 billion or more increase in our exports will not be achieved easily. Competition in world markets is getting keener. And there has been a slowdown in the rate of economic growth in Europe, our largest regional market, so there is a slackening of European demand for imports from the U.S., and we have the uncertainty caused by General De Gaulle's outbursts.

We have to run just to stand still on our export surplus. Last year our sales abroad totaled nearly $21 billion--up about $1 billion from 1961. But our surplus of exports over imports was down about $1 billion because our imports increased even more rapidly as a result of the expansion of our domestic economy.

Nevertheless, there is plenty of room for improvement in our export performance. The United States exports only about 4 percent of its total production of goods. Yet our chief world trade competitors, the six countries of the European Economic Community--the Common Market countries--export 12 percent of their total production.

More American companies must get into the export field, and all of our exporters must work on these export markets as aggressively and as imaginatively as they sell in our domestic market.

To help our exporters and potential exporters, the Department of Commerce has developed an extensive program of trade missions, trade centers, trade fair exhibitions, and specialized export services designed to bring American sellers and foreign purchasers together. You can find out about all of these export services through our Commerce Department Field Office here in Memphis.

The great thrust of this export expansion drive must come from private business and private initiative, but the Department of Commerce stands ready to do everything it can to help U. S. companies enter the export market and succeed in that market.

The Trade Expansion Act, adopted overwhelmingly by the Congress, is designed to open broader markets for U. S. goods, both in Western Europe and in the other countries of the world that account for about two thirds of our total exports. But it can do much more than this; it can help to bind the free nations closer together through expanding, mutually profitable, international trade.

I have always believed that trade among friendly nations promotes greater understanding and strong ties of mutual interest among the peoples of these nations. I feel this even more strongly today when trade and understanding are vital to our efforts to create a prosperous, dynamic, international economic community.

Such a community is essential. It is essential that we have an international atmosphere of increasingly free trade and investment so that enterprising men everywhere will be able to search out new economic opportunities and develop them wherever they may exist. We must have an international community which recognizes both the value and dignity of the individual and the constructive power of individual enterprise.

I am certain we cannot find lasting peace and prosperity in a world which throws up barriers to enterprise in trade or investment. We cannot create a strong community of interests if nations or regional blocs become self-centered and adopt policies of "beggar thy neighbor."

I am confident, therefore, that, despite such incidents as General De Gaulle's recent dash of cold water on the prospects for an outward-looking European Economic Community, the postwar trend toward more liberal trade policies in the world will continue.

History requires that Europe look beyond its borders and join with the United States in shaping a viable, prosperous world community of free peoples.

This trend toward closer cooperation and more meaningful brotherhood in the world must be matched by a keener awareness of our responsibilities to our fellow men at home.

That great Southerner, my fellow North Carolinian, Clarence H. Poe, pointed out more than 50 years ago that "the prosperity of every man depends upon the prosperity of the average man."

"'Every man whose earning power is below par,' he said, 'is a burden on the community; he drags down the whole level of life, and every other man in the community is poorer by reason of his inefficiency, whether he be white man or Negro . . . .'

"This wise observation is as pertinent today as it was when it was made in 1910. It reminds us that what is done to the least of these, our brethren, is a matter of concern to all of us--as practical men as well as humanitarians.

"Let me cite a few examples of how these shortfalls in earning power and economic opportunity affect our communities, our national economy, and even our capacity to compete in markets of the world.

"More than four million of our fellow Americans are currently unemployed for a variety of reasons. A prime reason is our slow rate of economic growth and the under-utilization of our industrial capacity. But there are other causes of unemployment that are just as serious, and some of them may be even more difficult to remedy.

"Last year, young people under 25 accounted for more than one third of ou total unemployment, although they represent only one fifth of our total labor force. Many of these young people are being frustrated by the slow growth in the number of available jobs. But many thousands of them are looking for work without success because they lack adequate education and marketable skills. . . .

Hundreds of thousands of young men and women drop out of school each year before they finish high school. It is estimated that there will be 7-1/2 million such drop-outs during the current decade.

Yet surveys show that the unemployment rate for young people who fail to complete their high school training is twice the rate for high school graduates.

In our present labor force, more than three million workers have not even completed the fifth grade. And among unskilled laborers the rate of unemployment is more than twice the rate for the labor force as a whole.

"The shortfall in earning power among Negro workers is especially large--due both to inadequate education and to the pressures which tend to confine nonwhites to unskilled and low skilled occupations.

"On the average, nearly a million nonwhite workers were without jobs last year. And, again, the rate of unemployment for nonwhite workers was more than twice that for white workers. . . .

Together, these figures describe a serious unemployment problem which will not readily yield to our efforts to step up our national rate of economic growth.

If we achieve our national goal of a full employment economy, civilian employment will rise from about 67 million to more than 80 million in 1970. But there will be no increase at all in jobs for unskilled laborers, as we continue to mechanize and automate!

Stepping up production and our rate of growth will not provide jobs for those who lack useful skills or for those who are barred by custom or prejudice from employment for which they may be fitted.

"Instead of benefiting as a nation from the energies and innate abilities of these potential workers, we will have to bear the social and economic costs of their idleness, their frustration, and in many cases their bitterness and hostility to their communities and everyone around them.

"To avoid this social alienation and this waste of valuable human resources, we must step up our efforts to improve our educational system and, equally important, to strengthen the motivations for self improvement.

"This is a challenge to all of us, as private individuals, as businessmen, as public officials, as people who care about their fellow men and women. . . ."

Our economy falls short of its potential when earning power and consumer buying power are inadequate to maintain a higher rate of growth.

Our economic efficiency and our ability to compete in world markets are threatened when a slack economy causes labor to strive to obtain full employment by drastically restricting the normal hours of work, or when it causes business to seek through higher prices full capacity profits on less than capacity production.

Even full employment itself can lower our productivity if we obtain that full employment by adding unskilled and inefficient workers to our payrolls and production lines.

The development of our human resources is, thus, a matter of concern to each of us. And in view of our domestic and international responsibilities, and our world competition, it is a matter of pressing national interest.

Our most urgent domestic economic business is, of course, the need to lighten the heavy Federal tax burden which is depressing our rate of economic growth.

The President's tax program includes reductions of corporate income taxes to provide both the incentive and the means for greater business investment to create additional jobs. But business profits after taxes could be at least 15 percent higher today if consumption and investment demand were adequate to employ our existing work force and our idle productive facilities.

For this reason, the initial emphasis in the President's three-stage program of tax reduction and reform is on reductions in the excessive individual income tax rates that were instituted in wartime to restrict consumer spending.

Our economists estimate that each $1 put into private consumption as a result of a tax cut will generate $2 to $2.50 of increased production of goods and services. This means, for example, that a $5 billion tax cut, when this "multiplier" effect has time to exert itself fully, would increase our gross national product by $10 to $12 billion a year.

This will help to bring down the rate of unemployment by creating new jobs for those whose unemployment is due, not to lack of marketable skills, but to inadequate consumer demand. Further lowering of our jobless rate will depend heavily upon our ability to upgrade our present labor force and to do a better job of preparing the more than one million new workers entering the labor force each year.

To do this, we must improve our public schools and stimulate our students to develop their abilities to the fullest.

We must expand our community junior colleges and our special facilities for vocational and technical training.

We must also expand our senior colleges and universities. Our ablest young people also must be better prepared to deal with the complex problems of this technological age.

We must improve and expand our industry training programs and our public manpower development programs. Workers on the job must be upgraded and there must be adequate retraining programs for those whose skills are outmoded by automation and structural changes in our economy.

And we must strive unceasingly to remove those barriers in every industry and every community which deny Americans the opportunity to obtain the best educations and the best jobs of which they are capable.

To further these efforts, the President has proposed a comprehensive program of Federal assistance for education and vocational training. This program emphasizes the special areas of need--the expansion of our community college programs, for example, and the improvement of teacher training and teaching research, the expansion of vocational education, the improvement of our public libraries, and the expansion of our adult education and adult literacy programs.

But the greatest responsibility for doing all of these things falls upon our States and our local communities. The development of our human resources is a matter of national concern, but the obligation to see that this development takes place rests upon each of us in his capacity as a citizen of a community and a State, as well as a citizen of these United States.

"This challenge to us as Southerners is especially great. We live in a region that has enormous natural and human resources. But we are not realizing the full benefits of these resources for ourselves or for the nation.

"We have made great economic progress in the South in the last few decades. This is reflected in the rapid increase in Southern per capita incomes.

"Since 1929, when it was only half the national average, per capita income in the South has increased by almost 400 percent. This compares with a 200 percent increase for the nation as a whole.

"But we cannot let this dramatic progress blind us to the fact that per capita income in the South is still only 75 percent of the national average.

"Today, our national economy is operating at about $35 billion below capacity. Our consumer demand and investment demand are this much below what is necessary for full utilization of our available manpower and productive facilities.

"Yet, if per capita income in the South were raised to the level of the rest of the nation, this would generate enough additional spending and investment to restore this country to full employment.

//The whole country suffers when any part lags in the development of its natural resources, in the education of its youth, or in the earning power of its people.

//The South has made substantial progress in its agriculture. The region, you know, has more cropland than all of the rest of the nation. But we are still hampered by generations of inadequate conservation which permitted the depletion of our soils. Southern farmers have had to pay more than half of the nation's fertilizer bill to overcome these deficiencies, and they have had to do it out of about one quarter of our total national farm income.

//The South has about three quarters of the nation's commercial forest land, and we have made striking progress in developing this great resource. But we have to overcome generations of chronic overcutting and inadequate fire protection and restocking which reduced our total timber stand to less than one third of the national total.

//Southern industrial progress in recent years has been a source of justifiable pride for us all. The trend of modern technology is running in the South's direction--emphasizing wood pulp, petrochemicals, petroleum, and other Southern products as basic industrial raw materials.

//The South has all of the nation's reserves of natural sulfur and bauxite. It has 65 percent of the nation's petroleum; 75 percent of its natural gas, phosphate, and titanium; half of the nation's clay and coal; and it ranks very high in the rare-earth metals that are so important in this space age.

//Yet, value added per worker in manufacturing in the South lags behind the value added per worker in the nation as a whole. And this shows up in the comparable lag in incomes of Southern families headed by a year-round, full-time worker.

//This lag underscores the vital importance of improving the education and technical skills of our people--to raise their productivity and their earning power, and consequently the level of per capita income in the South.

//We have made great progress in our public schools. But we can and we must do more. We have further to go than other parts of the country to lift the educational level of our people to the standards imposed by a modern technological society.

//The latest Census figures show that the median number of years of schooling completed by Southerners is a full year below the national average and more than two years below the level of the Western States. Our school expenditures are only 71 percent of the national average--$265 per pupil, compared with $375 for the nation as a whole.

//We must invest more in education to overcome our deficiencies in classroom space, in teachers' salaries, and in teaching equipment--to improve the quality as well as the quantity of our educational effort.

//We also must be concerned about the quality of the employment opportunities we make available to the young people we educate at such great cost.

//I want to be very frank about this last point:

"We cannot continue to waste the talents of our Negro citizens if we ever hope to raise the South to its full economic potential.

"We cannot afford to employ in menial jobs educated Negro men and women who are qualified for better jobs.

"We cannot let the talents of a Negro engineer be wasted in sweeping floors, in sorting mail, or in digging ditches. We cannot use trained stenographers as maids. We cannot make trained electricians rake yards, or use as construction laborers men who have the training to be draftsmen.

"One of the reasons our per capita income is so low is the widespread underemployment of Negroes in our labor force. Less than half of our Negro families are headed by persons with full-time, year, year-round jobs.

"Too many Negro men and women are confined to jobs which produce little for themselves or for those who employ them--to jobs which in other parts of the country have been eliminated by machines, with a resulting rise in the average productivity and average incomes of the people in those areas.

"The right to seek a job in keeping with one's ability--and have a reasonable prospect of finding such a job--is fundamental to my concept of freedom and equality of opportunity in a free enterprise economy and a free society.

"For the South, this matter of better job opportunities for our Negro citizens is an economic necessity, as well as a duty imposed by our sense of fairness and right.

"With constructive local leadership such as you have been showing here in Memphis and with growing public awareness of the importance of developing our region's human resources to the fullest, we can make great progress in this area of better job opportunities in the next few years.

"The South has a great opportunity to demonstrate to the nation and to the world both its capacity for orderly change and the extent of its faith in its future.

"Those of us who know the South and love the South and its people cannot doubt that this region has a great destiny to lead both in our national economic growth and in the development of a deeper understanding of the meaning of practical human brotherhood.

"Challenging opportunities produce growth, and I am confident that the South has only begun its growth to greatness in our times."

~~Thank you, and my best wishes to you all.~~

- 0 -

Commentary
Feb. 1963

R + A R

MY NEGRO PROBLEM—AND OURS

NORMAN PODHORETZ

If we—and . . . I mean the relatively conscious whites and the relatively conscious blacks, who must, like lovers, insist on, or create, the consciousness of the others—do not falter in our duty now, we may be able, handful that we are, to end the racial nightmare, and achieve our country, and change the history of the world.

—James Baldwin

TWO IDEAS puzzled me deeply as a child growing up in Brooklyn during the 1930's in what today would be called an integrated neighborhood. One of them was that all Jews were rich; the other was that all Negroes were persecuted. These ideas had appeared in print; therefore they must be true. My own experience and the evidence of my senses told me they were not true, but that only confirmed what a day-dreaming boy in the provinces—for the lower-class neighborhoods of New York belong as surely to the provinces as any rural town in North Dakota—discovers very early: his experience is unreal and the evidence of his senses is not to be trusted. Yet even a boy with a head full of fantasies incongruously synthesized out of Hollywood movies and English novels cannot altogether deny the reality of his own experience—especially when there is so much deprivation in that experience. Nor can he altogether gainsay the evidence of his own senses—especially such evidence of the senses as comes from being repeatedly beaten up, robbed, and in general hated, terrorized, and humiliated.

And so for a long time I was puzzled to think that Jews were supposed to be rich when the only Jews I knew were poor, and that Negroes were supposed to be persecuted when it was the Negroes who were doing the only persecuting I knew about—and doing it, moreover, to me. During the early years of the war, when my older sister joined a left-wing youth organization, I remember my astonishment at hearing her passionately denounce my father for thinking that Jews were worse off than Negroes. To me, at the age of twelve, it seemed very clear that Negroes were better off than Jews—indeed, than all whites. A city boy's world is contained within three or four square blocks, and in my world it was the whites, the Italians and Jews, who feared the Negroes, not the other way around. The Negroes were tougher than we were, more ruthless, and on the whole they were better athletes. What could it mean, then, to say that they were badly off and that we were more fortunate? Yet my sister's opinions, like print, were sacred, and when she told me about exploitation and economic forces I believed her. I believed her, but I was still afraid of Negroes. And I still hated them with all my heart.

It had not always been so—that much I can recall from early childhood. When did it start, this fear and this hatred? There was a kindergarten in the local public school, and given the character of the neighborhood, at least half of the children in my class must have been Negroes. Yet I have no memory of being aware of color differences at that age, and I know from observing my own children that they attribute no significance to such differences even when they begin noticing them. I think there was a day—first grade? second grade?—when my best friend Carl hit me on the way home from school and announced that he wouldn't play with me any more because I had killed Jesus. When I ran home to my mother crying for an explanation, she told me not to pay any attention to such foolishness, and then in Yiddish she cursed the goyim and the schwartzes, the schwartzes and the goyim. Carl, it turned out, was a schwartze, and so was added a third to the categories into which people were mysteriously divided.

NORMAN PODHORETZ is Editor of COMMENTARY. The views he expresses in this article are strictly his own and are not to be identified either with the magazine or the sponsoring organization.

SOMETIMES I wonder whether this is a true memory at all. It is blazingly vivid, but perhaps it never happened: can anyone really remember back to the age of six? There is no uncertainty in my mind, however, about the years that followed. Carl and I hardly ever spoke, though we met in school every day up through the eighth or ninth grade. There would be embarrassed moments of catching his eye or of his catching mine—for whatever it was that had attracted us to one another as very small children remained alive in spite of the fantastic barrier of hostility that had grown up between us, suddenly and out of nowhere. Nevertheless, friendship would have been impossible, and even if it had been possible, it would have been unthinkable. About that, there was nothing anyone could do by the time we were eight years old.

Item: The orphanage across the street is torn down, a city housing project begins to rise in its place, and on the marvelous vacant lot next to the old orphanage they are building a playground. Much excitement and anticipation as Opening Day draws near. Mayor LaGuardia himself comes to dedicate this great gesture of public benevolence. He speaks of neighborliness and borrowing cups of sugar, and of the playground he says that children of all races, colors, and creeds will learn to live together in harmony. A week later, some of us are swatting flies on the playground's inadequate little ball field. A gang of Negro kids, pretty much our own age, enter from the other side and order us out of the park. We refuse, proudly and indignantly, with superb masculine fervor. There is a fight, they win, and we retreat, half whimpering, half with bravado. My first nauseating experience of cowardice. And my first appalled realization that there are people in the world who do not seem to be afraid of anything, who act as though they have nothing to lose. Thereafter the playground becomes a battleground, sometimes quiet, sometimes the scene of athletic competition between Them and Us. But rocks are thrown as often as baseballs. Gradually we abandon the place and use the streets instead. The streets are safer, though we do not admit this to ourselves. We are not, after all, sissies—that most dreaded epithet of an American boyhood.

Item: I am standing alone in front of the building in which I live. It is late afternoon and getting dark. That day in school the teacher had asked a surly Negro boy named Quentin a question he was unable to answer. As usual I had waved my arm eagerly ("Be a good boy, get good marks, be smart, go to college, become a doctor") and, the right answer bursting from my lips, I was held up lovingly by the teacher as an example to the class. I had seen Quentin's face—a very dark, very cruel, very Oriental-looking face—harden, and there had been enough threat in his eyes to make me run all the way home for fear that he might catch me outside.

Now, standing idly in front of my own house, I see him approaching from the project accompanied by his little brother who is carrying a baseball bat and wearing a grin of malicious anticipation. As in a nightmare, I am trapped. The surroundings are secure and familiar, but terror is suddenly present and there is no one around to help. I am locked to the spot. I will not cry out or run away like a sissy, and I stand there, my heart wild, my throat clogged. He walks up, hurls the familiar epithet ("Hey, mo'f——r"), and to my surprise only pushes me. It is a violent push, but not a punch. A push is not as serious as a punch. Maybe I can still back out without entirely losing my dignity. Maybe I can still say, "Hey, c'mon Quentin, whaddya wanna do that for. I dint do nothin' to you," and walk away, not too rapidly. Instead, before I can stop myself, I push him back—a token gesture—and I say, "Cut that out, I don't wanna fight, I ain't got nothin' to fight about." As I turn to walk back into the building, the corner of my eye catches the motion of the bat his little brother has handed him. I try to duck, but the bat crashes colored lights into my head.

The next thing I know, my mother and sister are standing over me, both of them hysterical. My sister—she who was later to join the "progressive" youth organization—is shouting for the police and screaming imprecations at those dirty little black bastards. They take me upstairs, the doctor comes, the police come. I tell them that the boy who did it was a stranger, that he had been trying to get money from me. They do not believe me, but I am too scared to give them Quentin's name. When I return to school a few days later, Quentin avoids my eyes. He knows that I have not squealed, and he is ashamed. I try to feel proud, but in my heart I know that it was fear of what his friends might do to me that had kept me silent, and not the code of the street.

Item: There is an athletic meet in which the whole of our junior high school is participating. I am in one of the seventh-grade rapid-advance classes, and "segregation" has now set in with a vengeance. In the last three or four years of the elementary school from which we have just graduated, each grade had been divided into three classes, according to "intelligence." (In the earlier grades the divisions had either been arbitrary or else unrecognized by us as having anything to do with brains.) These divisions by IQ, or however it was arranged, had resulted in a preponderance of Jews in the "1" classes and a corresponding preponderance of Negroes in the "3's," with the Italians split unevenly along the spectrum. At least a few Negroes had always made the "1's," just as there had always been a few Jewish kids among the "3's" and more among the "2's" (where Italians dominated). But the junior high's rapid-advance class of which I am now a member is overwhelmingly Jewish and entirely white—except for a shy lonely Negro girl with light skin and reddish hair.

The athletic meet takes place in a city-owned stadium far from the school. It is an important event to which a whole day is given over. The winners are to get those precious little medallions stamped with the New York City emblem that can be screwed into a belt and that prove the wearer to be a distinguished personage. I am a fast runner, and so I am assigned the position of anchor man on my class's team in the relay race. There are three other seventh-grade teams in the race, two of them all Negro, as ours is all white. One of the all-Negro teams is very tall—their anchor man waiting silently next to me on the line looks years older than I am, and I do not recognize him. He is the first to get the baton and crosses the finishing line in a walk. Our team comes in second, but a few minutes later we are declared the winners, for it has been discovered that the anchor man on the first-place team is not a member of the class. We are awarded the medallions, and the following day our home-room teacher makes a speech about how proud she is of us for being superior athletes as well as superior students. We want to believe that we deserve the praise, but we know that we could not have won even if the other class had not cheated.

That afternoon, walking home, I am waylaid and surrounded by five Negroes, among whom is the anchor man of the disqualified team. "Gimme my medal, mo'f——r," he grunts. I do not have it with me and I tell him so. "Anyway, it ain't yours," I say foolishly. He calls me a liar on both counts and pushes me up against the wall on which we sometimes play handball. "Gimme my mo'f——n' medal," he says again. I repeat that I have left it home. "Le's search the li'l mo'f——r," one of them suggests, "he prolly got it hid in his mo'f——n' pants." My panic is now unmanageable. (How many times had I been surrounded like this and asked in soft tones, "Len' me a nickle, boy." How many times had I been called a liar for pleading poverty and pushed around, or searched, or beaten up, unless there happened to be someone in the marauding gang like Carl who liked me across that enormous divide of hatred and who would therefore say, "Aaah, c'mon, le's git someone else, this boy ain't got no money on 'im.") I scream at them through tears of rage and self-contempt, "Keep your f——n' filthy lousy black hands offa me! I swear I'll get the cops." This is all they need to hear, and the five of them set upon me. They bang me around, mostly in the stomach and on the arms and shoulders, and when several adults loitering near the candy store down the block notice what is going on and begin to shout, they run off and away.

I do not tell my parents about the incident. My team-mates, who have also been waylaid, each by a gang led by his opposite number from the disqualified team, have had their medallions taken from them, and they never squeal either. For days, I walk home in terror, expecting to be caught again, but nothing happens. The medallion is put away into a drawer, never to be worn by anyone.

OBVIOUSLY experiences like these have always been a common feature of childhood life in working-class and immigrant neighborhoods, and Negroes do not necessarily figure in them. Wherever, and in whatever combination, they have lived together in the cities, kids of different groups have been at war, beating up and being beaten up: micks against kikes against wops against spicks against polacks. And even relatively homogeneous areas have not been spared the warring of the young: one block against another, one gang (called in my day, in a pathetic effort at gentility, an "S.A.C.," or social-athletic club) against another. But the Negro-white conflict had—and no doubt still has—a special intensity and was conducted with a ferocity unmatched by intramural white battling.

In my own neighborhood, a good deal of animosity existed between the Italian kids (most of whose parents were immigrants from Sicily) and the Jewish kids (who came largely from East European immigrant families). Yet everyone had friends, sometimes close friends, in the other "camp," and we often visited one another's strange-smelling houses, if not for meals, then for glasses of milk, and occasionally for some special event like a wedding or a wake. If it happened that we divided into warring factions and did battle, it would invariably be half-hearted and soon patched up. Our parents, to be sure, had nothing to do with one another and were mutually suspicious and hostile. But we, the kids, who all spoke Yiddish or Italian at home, were Americans, or New Yorkers, or Brooklyn boys: we shared a culture, the culture of the street, and at least for a while this culture proved to be more powerful than the opposing cultures of the home.

Why, why should it have been so different as between the Negroes and us? How was it borne in upon us so early, white and black alike, that we were enemies beyond any possibility of reconciliation? Why did we hate one another so?

I suppose if I tried, I could answer those questions more or less adequately from the perspective of what I have since learned. I could draw upon James Baldwin—what better witness is there?—to describe the sense of entrapment that poisons the soul of the Negro with hatred for the white man whom he knows to be his jailer. On the other side, if I wanted to understand how the white man comes to hate the Negro, I could call upon the psychologists who have spoken of the guilt that white Americans feel toward Negroes and that turns into hatred for lack of acknowledging itself as guilt. These are plausible answers and certainly there is truth in them. Yet when I think back upon my own experience of the Negro and his of me, I find myself troubled and puzzled, much as I was as a child when I heard that all Jews were rich and all Negroes persecuted. How could the Negroes in my neighborhood have regarded the whites across the street and around the corner as jailers? On the whole, the whites were not so poor as the Negroes, but they were quite poor enough, and the years were years of Depression. As for white hatred of the Negro, how could guilt have had anything to do with it? What share had these Italian and Jewish immigrants in the enslavement of the Negro? What share had they—downtrodden people themselves breaking their own necks to eke out a living—in the exploitation of the Negro?

No, I cannot believe that we hated each other back there in Brooklyn because they thought of us as jailers and we felt guilty toward them. But does it matter, given the fact that we all went through an unrepresentative confrontation? I think it matters profoundly, for if we managed the job of hating each other so well without benefit of the aids to hatred that are supposedly at the root of this madness everywhere else, it must mean that the madness is not yet properly understood. I am far from pretending that I understand it, but I would insist that no view of the problem will begin to approach the truth unless it can account for a case like the one I have been trying to describe. Are the elements of any such view available to us?

At least two, I would say, are. One of them is a point we frequently come upon in the work of James Baldwin, and the other is a related point always stressed by psychologists who have studied the mechanisms of prejudice. Baldwin tells us that one of the reasons Negroes hate the white man is that the white man refuses to look at him: the Negro knows that in white eyes all Negroes are alike; they are faceless and therefore not altogether human. The psychologists, in their turn, tell us that the white man hates the Negro because he tends to project those wild impulses that he fears in himself onto an alien group which he then punishes with his contempt. What Baldwin does not tell us, however, is that the principle of facelessness is a two-way street and can operate in both directions with no difficulty at all. Thus, in my neighborhood in Brooklyn, I was as faceless to the Negroes as they were to me, and if they hated me because I never looked at them, I must also have hated them for never looking at me. To the Negroes, my white skin was enough to define me as the enemy, and in a war it is only the uniform that counts and not the person.

So with the mechanism of projection that the psychologists talk about: it too works in both directions at once. There is no question that the psychologists are right about what the Negro represents symbolically to the white man. For me as a child the life lived on the other side of the playground and down the block on Ralph Avenue seemed the very embodiment of the values of the street—free, independent, reckless, brave, masculine, erotic. I put the word "erotic" last, though it is usually stressed above all others, because in fact it came last, in consciousness as in importance. What mainly counted for me about Negro kids of my own age was that they were "bad boys." There were plenty of bad boys among the whites—this was, after all, a neighborhood with a long tradition of crime as a career open to aspiring talents—but the Negroes were really bad, bad in a way that beckoned to one, and made one feel inadequate. We all went home every day for a lunch of spinach-and-potatoes; they roamed around during lunch hour, munching on candy bars. In winter we had to wear itchy woolen hats and mittens and cumbersome galoshes; they were bare-headed and loose as they pleased. We rarely played hookey, or got into serious trouble in school, for all our street-corner bravado; they were defiant, forever staying out (to do what delicious things?), forever making disturbances in class and in the halls, forever being sent to the principal and returning uncowed. But most important of all, they were tough; beautifully, enviably tough, not giving a damn for anyone or anything. To hell with the teacher, the truant officer, the cop; to hell with the whole of the adult world that held us in its grip and that we never had the courage to rebel against except sporadically and in petty ways.

This is what I saw and envied and feared in the Negro: this is what finally made him faceless to me, though some of it, of course, was actually there. (The psychologists also tell us that the alien group which becomes the object of a projection will tend to respond by trying to live up to what is expected of them.) But what, on his side, did the Negro see in me that made me faceless to him? Did he envy me my lunches of spinach-and-potatoes and my itchy woolen caps and my prudent behavior in the face of authority, as I envied him his noon-time candy bars and his bare head in winter and his magnificent rebelliousness? Did those lunches and caps spell for him the prospect of power and riches in the future? Did they mean that there were possibilities open to me that were denied to him? Very likely they did. But if so, one also supposes that he feared the impulses within himself toward submission to authority no less powerfully than I feared the impulses in myself toward defiance. If I represented the jailer to him, it was not because I was oppressing him or keeping him down: it was because I symbolized for him the dangerous and probably pointless temptation toward greater repression, just as he symbolized for me the equally perilous tug toward greater freedom. I personally was to be rewarded for this repression with a new and better life in the future, but how many of my friends paid an even higher price and were given only gall in return.

WE HAVE it on the authority of James Baldwin that all Negroes hate whites. I am trying to suggest that on their side all whites—all American whites, that is—are sick in their feelings about Negroes. There are Negroes, no doubt, who would say that Baldwin is wrong, but I suspect them of being less honest than he is, just as I suspect whites of self-deception who tell me they have no special feeling toward Negroes. Special feelings about color are a contagion to which white Americans seem susceptible even when there is nothing in their background to account for the susceptibility. Thus everywhere we look today in the North, we find the curious phenomenon of white middle-class liberals with no previous personal experience of Negroes—people to whom Negroes have always been faceless in virtue rather than faceless in vice—discovering that their abstract commitment to the cause of Negro rights will not stand the test of a direct confrontation. We find such people fleeing in droves to the suburbs as the Negro population in the inner city grows; and when they stay in the city we find them sending their children to private school rather than to the "integrated" public school in the neighborhood. We find them resisting the demand that gerrymandered school districts be re-zoned for the purpose of overcoming de facto segregation; we find them judiciously considering whether the Negroes (for their own good, of course) are not perhaps pushing too hard; we find them clucking their tongues over Negro militancy; we find them speculating on the question of whether there may not, after all, be something in the theory that the races are biologically different; we find them saying that it will take a very long time for Negroes to achieve full equality, no matter what anyone does; we find them deploring the rise of black nationalism and expressing the solemn hope that the leaders of the Negro community will discover ways of containing the impatience and incipient violence within the Negro ghettos.*

But that is by no means the whole story; there is also the phenomenon of what Kenneth Rexroth once called "crow-jimism." There are the broken-down white boys like Vivaldo Moore in Baldwin's Another Country who go to Harlem in search of sex or simply to brush up against something that looks like primitive vitality, and who are so often punished by the Negroes they meet for crimes that they would have been the last ever to commit and of which they themselves have been as sorry victims as any of the Negroes who take it out on them. There are the writers and intellectuals and artists who romanticize Negroes and pander to them, assuming a guilt that is not properly theirs. And there are all the white liberals who permit Negroes to blackmail them into adopting a double standard of moral judgment, and who lend themselves—again assuming the responsibility for crimes they never committed—to cunning and contemptuous exploitation by Negroes they employ or try to befriend.

AND WHAT about me? What kind of feelings do I have about Negroes today? What happened to me, from Brooklyn, who grew up fearing and envying and hating Negroes? Now that Brooklyn is behind me, do I fear them and envy them and hate them still? The answer is yes, but not in the same proportions and certainly not in the same way. I now live on the upper west side of Manhattan, where there are many Negroes and many Puerto Ricans, and there are nights when I experience the old apprehensiveness again, and there are streets that I avoid when I am walking in the dark, as there were streets that I avoided when I was a child. I find that I am not afraid of Puerto Ricans, but I cannot restrain my nervousness whenever I pass a group of Negroes standing in front of a bar or sauntering down the street. I know now, as I did not know when I was a child, that power is on my side, that the police are working for me and not for them. And knowing this I feel ashamed and guilty, like the good liberal I have grown up to be. Yet the twinges of fear and the resentment they bring and the self-contempt they arouse are not to be gainsaid.

But envy? Why envy? And hatred? Why hatred? Here again the intensities have lessened and everything has been complicated and qualified by the guilts and the resulting over-compensations that are the heritage of the enlightened middle-class world of which I am now a member. Yet just as in childhood I envied Negroes for what seemed to me their superior masculinity, so I envy them today for what seems to me their superior physical grace and beauty. I have come to value physical grace very highly, and I am now capable of aching with all my being when I watch a Negro couple on the dance floor, or a Negro playing baseball or basketball. They are on the kind of terms with their own bodies that I should like to be on with mine, and for that precious quality they seem blessed to me.

The hatred I still feel for Negroes is the hardest of all the old feelings to face or admit, and it is the most hidden and the most overlarded by the conscious attitudes into which I have succeeded in willing myself. It no longer has, as for me it once did, any cause or justification (except, perhaps, that I am constantly being denied my right to an honest expression of the things I earned the right as a child to feel). How, then, do I know that this hatred has never entirely disappeared? I know it from the insane rage that can stir in me at the thought of Negro anti-Semitism; I know it from the disgusting prurience that can stir in me at the sight of a mixed couple; and I know it from the violence that can stir in me whenever I encounter that special brand of paranoid touchiness to which many Negroes are prone.

* For an account of developments like these, see "The White Liberal's Retreat" by Murray Friedman in the January 1963 Atlantic Monthly.

THIS, then, is where I am; it is not exactly where I think all other white liberals are, but it cannot be so very far away either. And it is because I am convinced that we white Americans are—for whatever reason, it no longer matters—so twisted and sick in our feelings about Negroes that I despair of the present push toward integration. If the pace of progress were not a factor here, there would perhaps be no cause for despair: time and the law and even the international political situation are on the side of the Negroes, and ultimately, therefore, victory—of a sort, anyway—must come. But from everything we have learned from observers who ought to know, pace has become as important to the Negroes as substance. They want equality and they want it now, and the white world is yielding to their demand only as much and as fast as it is absolutely being compelled to do. The Negroes know this in the most concrete terms imaginable, and it is thus becoming increasingly difficult to buy them off with rhetoric and promises and pious assurances of support. And so within the Negro community we find more and more people declaring—as Harold R. Isaacs recently put it in these pages*—that they want out: people who say that integration will never come, or that it will take a hundred or a thousand years to come, or that it will come at too high a price in suffering and struggle for the pallid and sodden life of the American middle class that at the very best it may bring.

The most numerous, influential, and dangerous movement that has grown out of Negro despair with the goal of integration is, of course, the Black Muslims. This movement, whatever else we may say about it, must be credited with one enduring achievement: it inspired James Baldwin to write an essay† which deserves to be placed among the classics of our language. Everything Baldwin has ever been trying to tell us is distilled here into a statement of overwhelming persuasiveness and prophetic magnificence. Baldwin's message is and always has been simple. It is this: "Color is not a human or personal reality; it is a political reality." And Baldwin's demand is correspondingly simple: color must be forgotten, lest we all be smited with a vengeance "that does not really depend on, and cannot really be executed by, any person or organization, and that cannot be prevented by any police force or army: historical vengeance, a cosmic vengeance based on the law that we recognize when we say, 'Whatever goes up must come down.' " The Black Muslims Baldwin portrays as a sign and a warning to the intransigent white world. They come to proclaim how deep is the Negro's disaffection with the white world and all its works, and Baldwin implies that no American Negro can fail to respond somewhere in his being to their message: that the white man is the devil, that Allah has doomed him to destruction, and that the black man is about to inherit the earth. Baldwin of course knows that this nightmare inversion of the racism from which the black man has suffered can neither win nor even point to the neighborhood in which victory might be located. For in his view the neighborhood of victory lies in exactly the opposite direction: the transcendence of color through love.

Yet the tragic fact is that love is not the answer to hate—not in the world of politics, at any rate. Color is indeed a political rather than a human or a personal reality and if politics (which is to say power) has made it into a human and a personal reality, then only politics (which is to say power) can unmake it once again. But the way of politics is slow and bitter, and as impatience on the one side is matched by a setting of the jaw on the other, we move closer and closer to an explosion and blood may yet run in the streets.

* "Integration and the Negro Mood," December 1962.

† Originally published last November in the New Yorker under the title "Letter From a Region in My Mind," it has just been reprinted (along with a new introduction) by Dial Press under the title The Fire Next Time (128 pp., $3.50).

Will this madness in which we are all caught never find a resting-place? Is there never to be an end to it? In thinking about the Jews I have often wondered whether their survival as a distinct group was worth one hair on the head of a single infant. Did the Jews have to survive so that six million innocent people should one day be burned in the ovens of Auschwitz? It is a terrible question and no one, not God himself, could ever answer it to my satisfaction. And when I think about the Negroes in America and about the image of integration as a state in which the Negroes would take their rightful place as another of the protected minorities in a pluralistic society, I wonder whether they really believe in their hearts that such a state can actually be attained, and if so why they should wish to survive as a distinct group. I think I know why the Jews once wished to survive (though I am less certain as to why we still do): they not only believed that God had given them no choice, but they were tied to a memory of past glory and a dream of imminent redemption. What does the American Negro have that might correspond to this? His past is a stigma, his color is a stigma, and his vision of the future is the hope of erasing the stigma by making color irrelevant, by making it disappear as a fact of consciousness.

I share this hope, but I cannot see how it will ever be realized unless color does in fact disappear: and that means not integration, it means assimilation, it means —let the brutal word come out—miscegenation. The Black Muslims, like their racist counterparts in the white world, accuse the "so-called Negro leaders" of secretly pursuing miscegenation as a goal. The racists are wrong, but I wish they were right, for I believe that the wholesale merging of the two races is the most desirable alternative for everyone concerned. I am not claiming that this alternative can be pursued programmatically or that it is immediately feasible as a solution; obviously there are even greater barriers to its achievement than to the achievement of integration. What I am saying, however, is that in my opinion the Negro problem can be solved in this country in no other way.

I HAVE told the story of my own twisted feelings about Negroes here, and of how they conflict with the moral convictions I have since developed, in order to assert that such feelings must be acknowledged as honestly as possible so that they can be controlled and ultimately disregarded in favor of the convictions. It is wrong for a man to suffer because of the color of his skin. Beside that clichéd proposition of liberal thought, what argument can stand and be respected? If the arguments are the arguments of feeling, they must be made to yield; and one's own soul is not the worst place to begin working a huge social transformation. Not so long ago, it used to be asked of white liberals, "Would you like your sister to marry one?" When I was a boy and my sister was still unmarried, I would certainly have said no to that question. But now I am a man, my sister is already married, and I have daughters. If I were to be asked today whether I would like a daughter of mine "to marry one," I would have to answer: "No, I wouldn't like it at all. I would rail and rave and rant and tear my hair. And then I hope I would have the courage to curse myself for raving and ranting, and to give her my blessing. How dare I withhold it at the behest of the child I once was and against the man I now have a duty to be?"

attached: Are Negro Militant White Militant Enough?

Current 2/63 R&R Rel.

MAN'S RELATIONS TO MAN

WHAT WILL NEGRO INTEGRATION BE LIKE?

What will it mean to be a Negro in an integrated America, asks the author of Scratches on Our Minds, No Peace for Asia, and Emergent Americans: A Report on "Crossroads Africa." Mr. Isaacs is on the staff of the Center for International Studies at Massachusetts Institute of Technology. (See also Current, September 1962, page 48.)

Harold R. Isaacs

"American Negroes have been rediscovering Africa. In doing so, they are not regaining their identity as long-lost Africans but reshaping their identity as Americans. . . . Like so many other people who have become members of the American society, Negroes must still blend their unique character as a group with the common character they share as Americans.

"Between these two identifications there has been up to now a deep and mutually deforming split. Negroes have had to fight fiercely for the most elementary part of their share of the common American holding—their equality of rights as citizens. The exclusions and denials that were their lot for so long dominated the shaping of their unique character while laming, as with a shriveled limb, the common American identity itself. Now this system of exclusion is coming to an end, or is at least being sweepingly revised. The Negro group identity based upon it is becoming obsolete, and some kind of new group identity must somehow take shape out of the old elements and the new circumstances. Like the restoration of sight or the use of a paralyzed limb, this change in Negroes must at the same time profoundly alter the American organism of which they will now become a more normally functioning part. . . .

" 'New Negro' . . . is a recurring term meaning essentially a newly militant, newly self-assertive Negro who will no longer submit to the humiliations of the past. There have been such Negroes in every generation, and there is nothing really 'new' about them at all. What is new is that today's 'New Negroes' are appearing in a situation where for the first time the odds are with them; their newness, their militancy, and their self-assertion are bound at last to pay off. . . . These are the people who believe that there is a self-respecting status for them to win in the American society and that they are at last winning it. Because they believe this is so, the young Negro novelist Julian Mayfield, who does not believe it, has called these Negroes in sad and bitter words, 'the last defenders of the American dream.'

"Victory comes in sight, but it comes late and it comes slowly. It comes, moreover, not because the democratic creed, much less the Christian, is triumphing at last but because the white world is forced to change its ways out of fear for itself. . . . The victory approaches so late and for so many 'wrong reasons' that for many it begins to bear the visage of defeat. More, it comes here and not there, for some but not for others, enough to end forever the old submission but not enough to assure a new freedom. The changes bring on resistance from the racists, and racist resistance brings on fresh episodes of violence, and the fresh violence strains to breaking the patience of people already strained beyond all reasonableness. Every gain is partial, and some hand is always there to try to take away what some other hand has 'given.' A reluctant or timid white liberalism clings to 'gradualism' in a situation where slowness has become failure.

If you can't get in, get out

"The longer the process stretches out, the more stubborn the resistance within pockets of the white society, the more the issue gets wrapped up in the nation's embattlement for survival as a power in the world, the greater the disarray and disorientation, the greater the cynicism rising hard and ugly, especially among young Negroes who emerge to find the fruit of the struggle rotten. Instead of a relieving sense of achievement with every advance, in some a new kind of despair rises side by side with hope, often in the breast of the same person, bringing with it a new uprush of alienation: if I am really never going to get in, a man says to himself, then let me get the hell out."

The "Black Muslims" [see Current, September 1960, page 31; May 1961, pages 9, 19; and July 1962, page 37] represent the current most extreme form of wanting out. Their leader, Elijah Muhammad, "appeals essentially to racial pride and separateness. His passionately violent indictment of the white world carries the ring of truth to almost any listening Negro, and his defiant rejection of the white society brings an involuntary inward assenting response from many otherwise not at all ready to accept the melancholy suggestion that their road to regeneration lies in black racism and in a total flight from the social reality.

"But there are Negroes who are no longer caught on the deep undersides of the society who do not have to flee quite so far from reality in order to express their moods of despair and their impulse to escape. One finds them among the newly arriving youth, often schooled now up to the higher degrees, but no longer schooled in that peculiar quality of endurance that their elders acquired as a matter of course; or youths from whom the new opportunities demand more than they can give as individuals standing on their own, who cannot bear the frustrations of failure or rejection which might no longer be due to the fact that they are Negroes. From among these comes a new fringe of pseudo-radicals who retreat either into beat apathy or into a new brand of racial nationalism which gives them the chance to dream either of migrating to the new Africa or, preferably, of waiting right here to welcome the triumphant onrush of the newly rising tide of color in the world.

"But a certain despair visibly rises now not only among some youthful newcomers but also, far more poignantly, in older men weary of having to continue a struggle that they thought, for a brief time in the 1950's, might really at last be coming to an end. Here, spread thinly but meaningfully along several layers of the population, one comes upon the feeling that effective integration for Negroes in the American society is unlikely, impossible, or even no longer desirable. Many of the individuals who share this mood also begin to feel, like the Black Muslims, that they want out. . . .

"The goal of 'integration,' like 'freedom' for the anti-colonialists, stands like a great shining blur down at the far end of the struggle road, drawing and inspiring all who fight for it, but becoming not clearer but blurrier the closer one gets to it. . . .

"There is of course a view held in a . . . matter-of-fact way by many, that the Negro will simply blend into the society as all sorts of other groups of people have done in the past, surviving only as a strand or a cast in the common design. This is not a radical miscegenationist view but an acceptance of a process already long under way. The extent of physical blending that has already taken place, combined with three centuries of total absorption and involvement in the American culture, has made for total assimilation of another kind which is not a matter for a more remote future but is already part of our lives now. What Negroes have wanted and needed was not to cease being Negroes, but to cease being 'Negroes,' i.e., the possessors of an identity marked by their skin and their features which automatically and inescapably condemned them to total disability for life. They want to shed this crippling identity and to become free to move out as individuals onto the great common ground where all other Americans move, to cease having to struggle for simple access to the most elementary rights due them as members of the American society, to begin to discover at last what else besides repression life might hold for them, and what they might hold for it.

"This is what Negroes have meant and mean now by integration. It simply means being included in everything that everybody else is included in. The rest would be up to the free interplay of society, group, and individual, for this is what the American society ideally offers and must finally offer in fact to all its members: free scope for individuals to develop by their own gifts and for groups to exist within the society by their own vitality and by the needs they serve. This is the open society, this is pluralism.

Will group identity survive?

"But an integrated open society implies total freedom of movement across all lines. Successful integration of this kind unquestionably threatens the existence of closed parochial groups; the open society is the foe of all tribes. The groups that cherish their separateness do not fear it idly. The attractive power of the society at large is enormous for members of minority or excluded groups who feel stifled in their physical or psychological ghettos and whose struggle to be free is precisely the struggle to move beyond the narrownesses of the group to some larger coherence. Every despised and rejected group produces its own defensively ingrown values and institutions in which some of its members are glad to live their entire lives but which others find to be intolerable shackles. . . . Negroes now, like Jews, have to discover how much of the cement that holds them together as a group has been pounded out of the stuff of their oppression over the centuries. Will the cracking of their bonds also crack their group ties? Or is there something else that gives vitality and power of survival to their group existence? . . .

"What will a new Negro American group identity base itself upon? Upon some surviving measure of rejection under which every recognizably Negro face will remain a badge of apartness? Or some new distinction coming up out of the new place and new share in the community at large in the years to come? Upon the shared history and folk tradition of the long time of oppression, and if so, how maintained from generation to generation? On institutions that will survive the process of integration and preserve their separateness, and if so, which ones, and surviving on what basis? On color and physical characteristics, and if so, what color and what characteristics? On some new form of mutually prideful association with contemporary Africa or involvement in the shaping of a modern African culture? Or in the contrary circumstances of new alienation, on some African alternative as a way out of American hopelessness? Or some new racial mystique, like négritude, summoned up by black French Caribbean poets as a desperate counter to the powerful mystiques of whiteness? It is questions like these that wait for Negro Americans just beyond their ghetto gates.

"These questions suggest only some small part of the complex turmoil that is only beginning now as Negroes in greater and greater numbers shed the burdens of nobodiness and take on the new demands and new burdens of what Martin Luther King calls somebodiness. All the elements of group identity, e.g., name, color, nationality, origins, will have to acquire new shape and new content. All the choices—alienation, assimilation, integration—will have to be redefined. Out of the recombining of all of these elements in a new environment, a new Negro group identity will begin to be formed, and so too will the new shape of the American society." ("Integration and the Negro Mood," Commentary, December 1962)

ARE LIBERAL WHITES MILITANT ENOUGH?

Realization that integration comes at a price, particularly in the schools, has alienated many Northerners from the civil rights movement, according to the Philadelphia area director of the American Jewish Committee and chairman of the Philadelphia metropolitan area chapter of the National Association of Intergroup Relations Officials.

Murray Friedman

"In the Forties and Fifties, liberals, intellectuals, and many middle-class whites came to believe that the elimination of segregation was the central domestic problem in our country. There was general agreement outside the South that once this was accomplished a host of social, political, and economic problems involving the Negro would disappear and he would finally be able to take his place as an equal partner in American life. When the U.S. Supreme Court handed down its momentous decision in 1954 banning segregation in the public schools, a high-water mark in the alliance of the liberal white and the Negro was reached. The decision set in motion the civil rights revolution we are experiencing today, in which the Negro, aided by a sympathetic white community, has been seeking entry into areas of American life previously closed to him. . . .

"[But] while Northern opinion has firmly rejected violence and outright defiance of federal court decisions on desegregation, as demonstrated in Mississippi, it has accepted token integration, the device Southerners have skillfully fashioned to avoid the consequences of integration. Apart from indignant Negroes who have reacted with sit-ins and other direct-action efforts, few voices have been raised against token integration, in spite of the fact that less than 8 per cent of Negro children in the South are attending desegregated schools, less than one per cent if we exclude border areas such as Washington, D.C. and Baltimore. Northern opinion was satisfied with progress made when Atlanta, Dallas, and a few more cities admitted a handful of Negro children to white public schools for the first time without violence.

"This new understanding of Southern adjustment problems on the part of white supporters of integration also results from certain changes that have taken place in the North. The heavy exodus of Negroes from the South since World War II has, to a large degree, shifted the center of the race problem to the metropolitan areas of the North and West. The Negro is no longer an abstraction to the white liberal but a concrete reality—in many instances, a potential or actual next-door neighbor, a classmate of his child's, a coworker at office or workbench. This confrontation very often points up the gap between the worlds of the Negro and the liberal white.

"The white lives in a middle-class society marked by an emphasis and overemphasis on education, aspiration, and advancement. The world of the Negro frequently is the urban slum. It is a world of slum housing and slum living, where violence, family dislocation, and blunted hopes are the norms. (There is, of course, a middle-class Negro community, and it is growing, but most whites have little or no experience with it.)

"Liberal whites are, consequently, caught in the dilemma of believing in equal rights for Negroes and even of working for them, while at the same time attempting to escape from the real and fancied disadvantages of desegregation. In recent years, they have helped put on the books of many cities and states laws banning discrimination in the sale or rental of housing, yet they themselves have been moving to the farthest reaches of the cities and to the suburbs. They have pushed up the enrollment at private and parochial schools, shut their eyes to the widespread practice of gerrymandering of school district lines to avoid integration, and helped to create pressures for separating slow from rapid learners. . . . They are fearful that physical commingling of middle-class children with culturally deprived youngsters will depress the level of the schools serving the former while the latter, unable to keep up because of inadequate preparation and background, will become even more embittered and hostile. The result is that many liberals, while opposed to color lines, are helping to make these lines stronger and tighter.

"It would be easy to dismiss liberal whites as possessing double standards and being as prejudiced as those they criticize, which some, in fact, are; nearer the truth, however, is the fact that they have been confronted with a series of extraordinarily complex problems growing out of the need to adjust to a modern urban society large numbers of rural Negroes from the South suffering from inferior, segregated educations and other deprivations. The belief of the liberal whites in interracial justice, while morally sound, does not provide a useful guide for dealing with this situation.

"To add to his dilemma, the liberal white is increasingly uneasy about the nature and consequences of the Negro revolt. Out of the bitterness and want that have been the lot of the Negro in our society has come a civil rights revolution whose explosive power worries and even frightens those people who traditionally have been sympathetic to the Negro. . . .

Can turmoil be avoided?

"In his concern about avoiding social turmoil in race relations, the liberal white stands in danger of trying to contain the civil rights revolution. He cannot do this, nor would it be wise to do so if he could. . . .

"I do not mean to imply that all the moral fervor has gone out of the white liberal's crusade on behalf of the Negro. Many whites have taken part in freedom rides and sit-ins. . . .

"Nevertheless, an issue or series of issues has developed between many liberals and the Negro, the heart of which seems to be this: many liberals are hinting to a restless Negro group that they postpone their most urgent demands because many Negroes are not yet ready to be integrated into a white middle-class society and the social costs, in terms of conflict, may be too high. . . . In other words, to the Negro demand for 'now,' to which the Deep South has replied 'never,' many liberal whites are increasingly responding 'later.' But the Negro will accept nothing short of first-class citizenship, now. It will call for a great deal of patience and understanding among those who make up the civil rights coalition if racial progress is not to be seriously jeopardized." ("The White Liberal's Retreat," Atlantic, January 1963)

MAKING DEMOCRACY WORK

GIVING CONGRESSMEN THE RIGHT TO VOTE

Mr. Lippmann offers one way of limiting the House Rules Committee's practice of bottling up bills it does not like and preventing them from being voted on by the full House.

Walter Lippmann

"In any legislative body, especially in a very big one like the House of Representatives, there must be some kind of authority to determine the order of business. . . .

"The really substantial issue is where the power to determine the order of business shall be lodged. . . . In my view, the Administration—any administration—should have the right of priority in bringing its measures, as approved by the proper committees, to a vote. There is no good reason that I can see why the Committee on Rules should interpose itself between the Administration and the committees of the House on the one hand and the House itself on the other.

"The Administration should, I believe, have the right of priority even when the other party controls the House. This is in no sense a surrender to the Executive Branch. The Administration measure will still be approved by the committee of the House and by the committee of the Senate, by the House as a whole and by the Senate as a whole. The House will not have yielded to the President any right to legislate. It will have conceded to him only the right to have Congress accept or reject his legislative proposals." (The Washington Post, Jan. 8, 1963)

CAN THE PEOPLE CONTROL THEIR PLANNERS?

Administrative planning is essentially the same as legislation and requires democratic safeguards, according to an associate professor of law at Yale University Law School. Mr. Reich demonstrates how this might work in the administration of publicly owned forest land.

Charles A. Reich

The authority over our nationally owned forests which Congress has delegated to the Department of Agriculture's Forest Service and to the Interior Department's National Park Service and Bureau of Land Management is so vague and sweeping that it amounts to virtually complete power to determine forever the character and use of our forest heritage. Judicial review of agency decisions is almost impossible. Decisions are made without effective check or review beyond the Secretary of Agriculture or of Interior. The agencies give no general notice of pending decisions and provide no general opportunity for the public to be heard. There is no procedure by which the public can initiate proposals.

"One problem common to many groups of professional managers in government is the tendency to lean heavily toward one of the various conflicting elements of the public that they serve." Foresters tend to think about forests "in terms of productivity. A leading forester once spoke of the Adirondack wilderness as an area condemned to 'economic waste,'

EDITORIALS

Saturday Post 3/2/63

LWD ✓
ML —
JS

R x R Rel ⊗ Press

The Post and integration

In recent months we have received many letters from our readers asking us to state our position on integration. We have been accused with considerable vehemence of being pro-Negro, perhaps because we have felt it necessary to deal at great length and depth with the problem of the Negro in America.

Let us put it as frankly as possible. Of course we are pro-Negro. We are also pro-white, pro-Jew, pro-Catholic and pro-Protestant. We believe, as we have frequently said, that the promise of American democracy will never be fulfilled so long as any citizen is deprived of his rights because of his race or religion. Private relationships are matters of conscience, but every American is entitled to full enjoyment of the benefits of citizenship.

We do not suggest that integration is easy. We know very well that there are many forms of discrimination in the North as well as the South. But there is a difference. The Negro in the North is not as frequently reminded of any "inferior" status. He can eat in the restaurants and drink from the fountains and not be publicly humiliated because of his color.

Even if we were not convinced of the moral necessity for ending segregation, we would favor it for another reason, one that is every bit as compelling. We are a nation of laws, and it is the law. Southern governors such as George Wallace of Alabama (p. 11) may delude themselves into believing that they can interpose the authority of a state, but the supreme law is the Federal law. That point was settled a hundred years ago.

There is a third reason, more practical than either of the others, for favoring peaceful integration. It is the utter futility and the self-destructive waste of attempting to check the relentless march of history. Governors Orval Faubus and Ross Barnett proved the point. They swore eternal opposition to the law of the land, but Little Rock today is integrated, James Meredith is attending the University of Mississippi, and all that Faubus and Barnett have to show for their obstruction is bloodshed, suffering and the shame that was heaped upon their states. Gov. George Wallace, Bull Connor and other diehards in Alabama should profit by these examples. It is time we stopped fighting the last century's battles here at home and closed ranks against the common enemy abroad, Communism.

As editors of a national magazine, we at The Post have a very special responsibility to report on the progress of major events in this nation and the world at large. The emergence of the Negro is one of the most profound developments in American history. His rise from economic and political bondage in this nation and his momentous migration to the North and West are stories that compare in importance with the great westward migration of the 19th century, the two world wars and that great American tragedy, the Civil War. School integration, sit-ins and freedom rides are so much a part of the fabric of our times that responsible editors could not conceivably ignore them. The migration of the Negro is staggering in its social, economic and political ramifications for the entire nation. Negroes used to vote—when they could vote—Republican. Some experts, such as Theodore H. White, in his book The Making of the President, contend now that this new Negro population in the Northeast actually swung the 1960 election to Democrat John F. Kennedy.

It is essential that all of us understand these things and place them in proper historical perspective. The Post has covered the story of the American Negro with responsible, illuminating reports. The first and most memorable of these was a five-part series by John Bartlow Martin, THE DEEP SOUTH SAYS NEVER (June 15–July 13, 1957). In recent months we have described the strategy of the Negro youth's new march on Dixie (Sept. 8, 1962). In November we devoted 13 pages to the dramatic, costly desegregation at the University of Mississippi (Nov. 10, 1962). We have published articles on the Negro aristocracy and the Negro hate group, the Black Muslims. Recently we published a SPEAKING OUT by Carl T. Rowan, Negro Assistant Secretary of State, on THE TRAVESTY OF INTEGRATION.

This week The Post is proud to publish a moving and penetrating report on the mood of Birmingham by Joe David Brown (pages 11–19). Birmingham faces the prospect of forced integration. Alabama is the only remaining state where not a single Negro has yet been integrated. Birmingham, as the piece makes clear, is an explosive situation, the next great arena in the integration struggle. It is this kind of dramatic, incisive reporting that is the role of The Post in our rapidly changing era.

A Further Outlook

R+RR

Even Shoeshine Boy Has the Dream

By John Howard Griffin

The following article is reprinted by permission from the Texas Observer, Austin, Tex.

TWO YEARS AGO when I completed a journey through the Deep South during which I lived as a Negro for a number of weeks, I sank into the despair of a Negro. This came not so much from the subhuman existence that is the Negroes' lot as from the hopelessness of its ever getting better.

Communication, a dialogue of some sort, had to be established between the two groups of citizens before there could be hope for improvement. Discrimination long ago destroyed such communication. A Negro who spoke simple truths about justice or inalienable rights was not tolerated. Since most white Southerners lived under the illusion that they alone understood their "nigras" and were thoroughly imprisoned in a culture that said the "system" was for the good of those whom it suppressed, what chance for any true communication?

This "system" is a complex of customs and traditions that have all the force of law, plus the actual Jim Crow ordinances. The system says in effect that the Negro is a citizen of this country, but a special kind of citizen, that he should pay taxes and defend his country but that he should not vote, have equal protection under the law, equality of educational or job opportunities, and that he should not have access to public eating places, parks, hotels, libraries, concert halls, and even hospitals.

John Howard Griffin was born in Dallas in 1920. He lives in Mansfield, near Fort Worth. He has published two novels, "The Devil Rides Outside'" and "Nuni."

He has written, referring to Oct. 29, 1959: "For years the idea had haunted me, and that night it returned more insistently than ever. If a white man became a Negro in the Deep South, what adjustments would he have to make?"

To find out, he disguised himself as a Negro and traveled through the South. His book on his experiences, "Black Like Me," was published by Houghton-Mifflin in 1961 and Signet paperbacks last year.

Understood by Negroes

EVERY NEGRO understands this system, but although it is part of the Southern whites' "way of life," few of them have taken a close hard now; they are part of the mockery. A cracker is a cracker. The "good" ones are just less bad than the bad, bad crackers. They won't join the mob, but they belong to that mob that sees the Negro individual as nothing but the stereotype that talks to him about "your people" and "your problems" and tells him how much it admires "the Negro race"; and some say they are pro-Negro instead of saying they are pro-humanity. And all of this shows that one way or another a cracker is a cracker, more or less, and they'll never realize in time. They won't learn really to love before Negroes learn really to hate.

The new, new Negroes, the ones today, are products of this painful disillusion. They see that gradualism as practiced by Southern whites is going to stretch on into eternity. They see that their children and grand-children will have no more hope than they unless they do something about it now. no inside finish and one toilet for a hundred students. Separate, not equal, but better than before. They say, why don't you look at these good things we are doing for you? Why don't you look at both sides of the question?

Negroes laugh and say that our tax dollars helped pay for that; we'd give more tax dollars if you allowed us to earn fairly; our tax dollars also go to support State Sovereignty Commissions, to pay for psuedo-scientific state-sponsored books that seek to prove we are intrinsically inferior and should be deprived of our rights of citizenship; our tax dollars also go to support public beaches and parks that we are not allowed to enjoy. Our tax dollars, Sir, are used to pay for the rope that lynches us. Now why don't you look at both sides of the question? We have been shouting: "Whatever you do against me you do against yourself, against this country. And I cannot carry the load forever. You cannot ex-found only one person, a professor of sociology, who had even heard of the McComb depredations. The real substance of such scandals simply does not make the local newspapers and therefore usually is not picked up by the wire services; or if it is, many newspapers choose not to run it. Newspapers are reluctant to deal with real controversy or indeed, with anything that might offend popular prejudice and therefore cause them to lose subscribers or advertising revenue.

Lag in Communication

THIS LAG IN communication means that we are at least two versions behind "the New Negro." He is not the "race man" protesting through Hip—not the hipster. That came and went. He is not the loud flash out to impress the white. Not any more. He is the informed, polite, rock-hard, no-nonsense man who says that by-damn again. The word has spread. The shine boy has the dream, too.

Southern white men—white men in East Texas—will react against this, too, will deny it. They know Negroes, see them every day, and although they are more "sullen" perhaps, they are otherwise no different; they don't have these complex personalities, these dreams. White men must realize that they do not know what goes on in Negroes' homes at night, what they say and think and discuss. Complex as the situation is, in a sense it is desolatingly clear. Even a concerned, sympathetic white knows practically nothing about Negroes or their real problems because he seldom stops looking upon a Negro as one of the Negroes. A Negro snatches a purse and this is all Negroes. A white man rapes and murders, but he is an individual white.

On the other hand, Negroes cannot believe any longer that white men are bide their time while we "good whites" think of something else to help them, some new ingredient for the soup.

James Baldwin admirably expressed the Negroes' growing disgust when he remarked, "All of Africa's going to be free before we can get a lousy cup of coffee." Or again, consider the difficulty of establishing any kind of rapport between Negroes and whites on a local level when a Negro tells a white, as Baldwin did recently, that a white man should not ask, "Do you want your daughter to marry a Negro? A white man, Baldwin says, should specify that he means daughters he has had by his white wife, "Because, Gentlemen, we've been marrying your daughters for generations."

A Sobering Schism

ANOTHER POINT of misunderstanding that I encounter more and more frequently is a "good white's" bewilderment that when he smiles and acts "brotherly," a Negro does not fall on his shoulders grateful to have a Great White Buddy. In many Negroes' experience, a white man who is immediately and overtly friendly usually wants something—for a Negro to share his wife or his girl friend or to get him a date with a Negro woman. Even worse, Negroes are offended to see that they are being "loved" because of their pigment, a racial discrimination as offensive as any other.

There is a sobering schism now in Negro leadership. Young Negroes are revolting against the established leadership. Two years ago, the Black Muslim movement could make no headway in the South, because Southern Negroes still had some illusions. Today, the advocates of nonviolent resistance are losing ground to the black racists. This can be attributed to one cause—Negroes' loss of hope that white men will ever throw off the chains of racism; that they will ever do the right thing.

A year ago, on a national radio program, I condemned the Black Muslim movement as an evil that perpetrated the very racism from which the Negro in America has suffered so terribly. This year, with the rapid growth of such hate-movements all over the United States, the same holds true; but we must look to causes, frankly face the fact that we are driving many Negroes to desperation, and admit that they resisted a long, long time before a Negro and traveled through the South. His book on his experiences, "Black Like Me," was published by Houghton-Mifflin in 1961 and Signet paperbacks last year.

portunities, and that he should not have access to public eating places, parks, hotels, libraries, concert halls, and even hospitals.

Understood by Negroes

EVERY NEGRO understands this system, but although it is part of the Southern whites' "way of life," few of them have taken a close hard look at it. The Negroes have lived it, but contrary to the beliefs of many whites, Negroes have never accepted it. They have a remarkable record for resisting subversion, for manifesting a deep love of country; but this is a love of what the country is supposed to be, the American dream—not what it is where racism is practiced.

A Negro has his secrets. He has had to "accommodate" or else suffer reprisals. He has had to climb his mountain of yes-yes-yes and grin at the white man. He has seen the perpetration of the Southern myths that say he is happy, carefree, contented with life as Southern whites have arranged it for him. He knows that these myths are a great lie which white men have had to invent in order to live with their conscience.

When I lived as a Negro we yes-yes-yessed and grinned, but when we went home for the evening we wept and said how could the white man twist his mind enough to think this death of our manhood, our hopes, our dignity—this slavery—was for our own good. The only way to accept it was to lose hope, to despair, to stop thinking and feeling and just exist. Not to give a damn. Not to give a damn for your own people or whites or anybody else—just try to make it, keep the bread on the table. Try to keep from hating. Try to keep from having your belly twisted into knots all the time.

Living under the "system," only the shallowest optimist could resist the temptation to despair; but Negroes could resist temptation to hate Southern whites, and this for two reasons.

First, Negroes understood that Southern whites were as helplessly entrapped by the system as Southern Negroes and that the whites were as devastated by it as the Negroes. Anything that dwarfed and deprived a Negro child also dwarfed and deprived a white child. This was another of the Negroes' secrets, something most white men did not know.

Second, Negroes believed that their misery came from the "white trash" and that the white trash, though powerful, were a minority as oppressive and painful to the "good whites" as to the Negroes. Negroes retained faith in the "good whites," who could be counted on to behave correctly and to swing their weight in favor of justice when a showdown came. Did they not quietly tell the Negroes of their disapproval of the racist bullies, of their shame?

A Great Many Changes

BUT ALL OF THIS has changed, is now changing. The changes are so drastic that those who knew something about the South 10 years ago, or even two years ago, are misinformed if they rely on that information today.

Negroes, particularly young Negroes, have lost their illusions about the "good whites." They have seen "good whites" equivocate endlessly and finally grow silent in times of crisis when issues were bare and words of protest on sanity would have sounded with clarion clarity. A "good white's" quiet words aimed sympathetically at a Negro's ears don't mean anything

Photo by Russell Lee of Austin, Tex.

They see that their actions and reactions are judged not as those of humans defrauded of their rights to grow as humans, but as "nigger reactions"—smart-alecky, cocky, disrespectful.

These American Negroes have learned to be bitter. They see that America is not America, that we have cheated and beaten the American Dream to death. They are sure that if we had time this dream could come to be something great again, but daily events, daily abuses of justice, daily compromises of principles tell them that time is running out, and they say now that since they were born with rights, they will not go on being patient while the system defrauds them of those rights.

Most Southern whites see it differently, of course. They hastily construct slightly better school buildings with brick veneer and with pect me to go on fighting to protect America's freedoms abroad and not fight for them at home." You do not hear.

Perhaps the greatest source of frustration is the fact that more and more we have two groups of citizens with two different sets of knowledge and information. Negroes are fully aware of the many current instances of rank injustice and violations of civil rights, but the non-Negro masses are not aware of them. Uninformed, the national conscience cannot manifest itself.

For example, I have spent most of last fall on a national lecture tour. The McComb, Miss., scandals, which have shaken the Negroes, are almost wholly unknown to the non-Negro population. In speaking to thousands of interested and concerned whites, I this is something worth dying for and none of your soft white-man words are going to fool us ever again.

How many whites realize this? Few, as far as I can tell. To most, the Negro is still the handkerchief-head, the Uncle Tom, or perhaps the hipster. A Negro's actions, his demands, are therefore misinterpreted. They bewilder and frighten many non-Negroes. This new Negro is going to do exactly what a proud white man would do in his place—either stand up and die or else get the rights that are being withheld from him, so that his children won't have to take the garbage they've always taken, so that his children won't have to despair. This new Negro says: "Nothing's worth that. I'm going to be a man." You call him "nigger" when he shines your shoes in a barber shop and he'll never show up for work there simply unaware. Five years ago, Negroes saw Little Rock. Last year they saw Oxford. They saw that they were identical in pattern. Five years have produced nothing.

They are not edified by Southern moderates or liberals who are scarcely better informed than the masses. Moderates are calling for such rare items as justice and compassion as though they were ingredients in a soup—a bit of one here, a bit of another there; and when some little something is accomplished we think the soup is beginning to smell and taste as though it were cooked by Christ and Thomas Jefferson—a real, American nourishment.

But since we whites are not obliged to eat it, we don't realize that to the Negroes it is a thin swill. We further err in thinking that they should be overwhelmingly grateful to us for it and men will ever throw off the chains of racism; that they will ever do the right thing.

A year ago, on a national radio program, I condemned the Black Muslim movement as an evil that perpetrated the very racism from which the Negro in America has suffered so terribly. This year, with the rapid growth of such hate-movements all over the United States, the same holds true; but we must look to causes, frankly face the fact that we are driving many Negroes to desperation, and admit that they resisted a long, long time before they decided to withdraw from further participation in the American Dream.

This withdrawal is not yet a stampede, but it is one of the large lines of the movement, one that we are doing little to help correct. We are still telling Negroes that they must "earn" their rights. This makes no sense when they see that Ph.D.'s are denied, because of pigmentation, rights that we unhesitatingly accord even the most degraded white. We are still talking about Americanism and the great principles of democracy even as we witness the spread of regionalism and sectionalism and the growth of prejudice throughout the Nation.

This was nicely summed up in a letter from a minister of God addressed to "Ralph (Rastus) McGill" recently. The minister said: "I am a Mississippian first, a Southerner second, an American third." Presumably, he was a Christian fourth. To borrow a phrase from P. D. East, this Christian is ass-backwards in his values.

Danger Greater Than Ever

AT THE CONCLUSION of my book, "Black Like Me," fearing intergroup violence, I wrote: "If some spark does set the keg afire, it will be a senseless tragedy of ignorant against ignorant—a holocaust that will drag down the innocent and right thinking masses of human beings. Then we will all pay for not having cried justice long ago."

I wish I could say that fear is now obsolete. No, the danger of a racial holocaust is greater now than it was then. The true issues are evaded in newspapers and other mass communications media. States still seriously claim that they have the right to do wrong. There is still a vast confusion in the public's mind about the contradistinction between inalienable rights and human positive law. Few realize that our problem is not one of race, but of racism, anti-Americanism, and that this problem affects every American regardless of pigmentation.

How can the necessary communication, the dialogue, be established? Can it ever be established as long as truths offend the whites? The Negroes? How can these two blocks of humanity keep from crashing into one another?

I have pondered this until I dream of it at night. In one of the dreams I drew up a 265-point program. As I finished typing it, a delegation of men from the Ku Klux Klan and the White Citizens' Councils along with one distinguished woman from a venerable-lineage society called on me. We discussed humanity and justice. The woman finally spat out in distaste: "But they breed just like animals." In my dream I answered: "And just how do you breed, Madam?" Then I presented my 265-point program. They were indignant. A well informed Southern governor said: "Two hundred and sixty five points! Who do you think you are? Why, Son, even God handed down only ten commandments, and the great Bill of Rights only contained ten points." And in my dream, I told him. "If you'll live by either or both, I'll throw away my 265."

WASHINGTON-U.S.A.

The New Leader
3/18/63 R + R Relations
~~International~~
(Washington DC)

A Colonial Portrait

By Karl E. Meyer

TWO ANTI-COLONIAL rituals take place annually in North America. At the United Nations, Portugal is condemned for its repression in Angola, and in Washington an American President appeals (as Kennedy did last month) for an end to foreign rule in the capital. It is a prudent wager that the sun will set on Portuguese Africa before Congress ever gives self-government to the only city in the United States with a Negro majority.

The story is long and melancholy and familiar to almost everyone who lives in Washington. The Constitution gives Congress the exclusive authority to arrange the government of the District of Columbia. But this need not preclude home rule, and indeed until the 1870s the people of Washington elected a mayor and city council. At that point, Congress decided the capital was not ready for democracy—because, after the Civil War, Negroes had won the right to vote.

The struggle for the principles of the Declaration of Independence has its vast ironies in Washington —beginning with the fact that the Declaration itself is enshrined in a stately marble building located on the site of an old slave market. In recent years, social and economic barriers to equality have been eroded. Yet, perversely, every step forward in desegregation makes it more difficult to wrest the final victory of political self-rule.

In the 1920s, apartheid was almost as rigidly enforced in Washington as it is in South Africa today. In a city consecrated to democracy, a Negro could not eat in a downtown restaurant, stay at a luxury hotel, join the local bar association or press club, or become an apprentice in a buildings-trade craft union. This ugly edifice of discrimination has been chipped away fragment by fragment, and by now most of the walls are nominally down. The Negro, however, still cannot become a union bricklayer or electrician; some labor leaders and real estate dealers remain among the most devoted disciples of Jefferson Davis.

The biggest victory came after the 1954 Supreme Court school decision. Nearly a century after the Civil War, the school system of Abraham Lincoln's city expunged the color bar. One consequence of this belated change was to make Washington more attractive to Negroes. In 1950, 35.5 per cent of the city's 802,178 inhabitants were colored; by 1960, the percentage swelled to 53.9 per cent of its 763,956 persons. Since Negroes generally have large families, this increase has had a disproportionate impact on school enrollment. In 1950, the schools were about evenly divided between the races; 11 years later, 81.5 per cent of the public school students were Negro.

The significance of the increase is various. The segregated schools camouflaged the chasm between the races; pupils from wretched homes are understandably less bookish. When the systems were merged, and Negroes from the old ghetto schools were for the first time able to attend the less flagrantly inadequate white schools, the result was an overall lowering of academic standards. Concerned white parents then joined the exodus to the suburbs, where it is almost impossible for a Negro to buy a home in a lily-white section, assuming he has the money to try it.

Here the vectors cross, because Dixiecrat members of Congress who opposed school desegregation in Washington now want to extract political profit by keeping the schools a Horrible Example. It is an old saw in the capital that General Lee never captured the city in the Civil War but that Confederates have ruled it since. By tradition and the seniority system, either the Senate or the House District of Columbia Committee is invariably in Dixiecrat hands. When he was alive and spitting, the late Senator Theodore G. Bilbo of Mississippi explained with amiable candor why he was happy to become chairman of the Senate District Committee: "I wanted this position so I could keep Washington a segregated city."

KARL E. MEYER is a member of the editorial board of the Washington Post and Washington correspondent for the British New Statesman, where this article also appears.

Thanks to the courts and Presidential orders, and to local conscience, Negroes are now halfway to equality in Washington. And thanks to the House District Committee, headed by Congressman John L. McMillan of South Carolina, the final victory—an end to colonialism—is more elusive than ever. Three successive Presidents have asked for local self-government; both political parties have pledged support; five times the Senate has passed home-rule bills. But Governor General McMillan, the Viceroy of Washington, has made sure that no bills emerge from his committee. Indeed, Congressman McMillan likes his colonial prerogatives, and has an abiding interest in such local affairs as police department promotions, car-dealer licenses and the welfare of parking-lot operators who have made an art out of fleecing commuters and shoppers.

How useful and important Confederate control of Washington can be was illustrated by an incident a few years ago when a notorious Louisiana racist hired a photographer to stir up a few staged fist-fights between white and Negro youngsters in the capital. The idea was to drive home the wickedness of "mixin' and minglin'." Thus the Dixiecrats are sitting pretty. They can starve the Washington school system of funds, harass it by investigations and then condemn the very results they have helped to bring about.

When President Kennedy last month once more asked Congress to liberate Washington, one hopeful change had already occurred. After a half-century of agitation, a constitutional amendment was recently ratified that gave Washington residents the right to vote for President. But it is easier to amend the Constitution than to breach the walls of the impregnable House District Committee. It would take the kind of fight normally uncongenial to the President's temper to give Washington self-government. The White House would be opposed not only in Congress but also by local business interests represented in the Board of Trade. The worthies of the Board talk privately about that ultimate of horrors—a Negro Mayor.

THOUGH IT IS nominally a "local" matter, the implications of Washington's racial problem are in every respect national. What is happening in the capital is only a more drastic version of what is happening in most large American cities. Everywhere there is the same drift to the suburbs by whites, leaving the downtown as a black core—a phenomenon now known as the "doughnut and the hole." This point is forcefully made in an excellent new book about the Negroes in Washington, Dusk at the Mountains, by Haynes Johnson, a Washington Star reporter. Johnson, who is white, also observes, accurately: "From almost my first day in Washingon, I had been struck by the presence of the Negro question. It was perplexing—this awareness of color—so much a part of the city and yet so far removed from the reality of the white man's daily life. But one could not escape it."

Crime statistics here rouse the most mordant discussion among whites. No big city in America has a higher rate of petty street assaults, and each new batch of crime figures is more distressing than the last. It must be unflinchingly noted that the problem will get worse before it gets better. Yet shocked comments usually draw the easy moral and avoid the deeper responsibility.

For generations, Negroes in Washington have been "kept in their place" by custom, Congress and the courts. They have been systematically plundered by landlords and merchants who make them pay once for being black and twice for being ignorant. They have been a faceless community, dimly known to whites mainly as domestic servants and delivery boys.

The fraternal spirit of major craft unions is not even skin deep. Thus when the winds of change came to Washington, they did not blow away the shackles but only the covering of dust. The "tension" that results springs in good part from the hostile discovery that the chains exist. Negro spokesmen are as concerned as are the whites about the violent expressions of this hostility. Last November, Negroes took the lead in censuring their own community for a near race riot that made a shambles of a high school football game.

How the prosperous and comfortable whites of Washington respond to the mood of the majority race will be as much a moral test for America as anything that happens in foreign affairs. The next time someone in Congress lectures Fidel Castro on his failure to hold elections, it would be wholly refreshing if someone else got up to ask Congressman McMillan who elected him Viceroy of Washington, the Formosa of the Confederacy.

---

In Coming Issues:

THE STRANGE CASE OF WILLIAM APPLEMAN WILLIAMS
Theodore Draper

PROFILE OF A SOVIET PRISONER
Moshe Decter

WORLD YOUTH TODAY: A SERIES
Ruth Langdon Inglis
Herbert Lottman
John Mander
Edward Seidensticker and others

---

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

The [illegible] Republic
March 23, 1963

R & R Rel. (see Lead Article, also in R & R Rel)

Return to Research.
L.W.D. ✓
P.A. ✓
S.B. ✓
Jf ✓

MISCEGENATION

Commentary on a Commentary

by Albert Bermel

In a recent article in Commentary (February, 1963) called "My Negro Problem – And Ours" Norman Podhoretz, the editor of the magazine, admits that he has hated and feared Negroes since his boyhood in Brooklyn. Now, at last, he feels free to speak out after "constantly being denied my right to an honest expression of the things I earned the right as a child to feel." It appears that once in class young Podhoretz had noticed a Negro boy named Quentin staring at him resentfully when he Podhoretz, correctly answered a question that Quentin had been unable or unwilling to cope with. Later Quentin's brother, equally a Negro, swung a baseball bat outside Podhoretz's house. "I try to duck," writes Mr. Podhoretz, to whom the experience is so vivid that it calls for the present tense, "but the bat crashes colored lights into my head."

In spite of these and other childhood ordeals Mr. Podhoretz can feel some satisfaction at having become "the good liberal I have grown up to be." Yet his life is still darkened by a hatred-fear of Negroes, which he dwells on passionately. The young Negroes he knew pelted him with such abbreviations as "m – f – r" and "m – f – n'." "They were tough; beautifully, enviably tough, not giving a damn for anyone or anything." Today Mr. Podhoretz not only hates and fears Negroes: he envies them. He envies them their cavalier behavior, as he sees it, their athleticism, erotic qualities and bodily grace ("I am now capable of aching with all my being when I watch a Negro couple on the dance floor, or a Negro playing baseball or basketball. . . .") The envy of today and the humiliations of yesterday add up to a partial explanation of Mr. Podhoretz's feelings of stress; a battery of psychologists, anthropologists, economists and sociologists could work up an exciting symposium disputing over these and additional causes of the Podhoretz hatred. No doubt, too, there are many people – among them people who have grown up to be bad liberals – who have already been shocked by Mr. Podhoretz's painful and painstaking confession. They may cite it as another instance of what Murray Friedman called "The White Liberal's Retreat" in the January, 1963 issue of The Atlantic although, as if to refute them in advance, Mr. Podhoretz refers to this article with what reads like approval. They may claim that Mr. Podhoretz is yet another self-styled intellectual who is intent on proving that he has feelings and not just thoughts; that he thinks he is, in fact, practically nothing but nerve-endings. They may imply that the article is hate propaganda masquerading as honest emotion. They may see his piece as one more descent from the ivory tower of ideals into the swamps of this Beatnik-ridden, anti-rational, back-to-the-intuitions age. They may throw up their hands and say that Mr. Podhoretz and his article are despicable, totally unworthy of a "progressive" Jew.

Personally, though, I am in sympathy with Mr. Podhoretz. He writes, "I am trying to suggest that . . . all whites – all American whites, that is – are sick in their feelings about Negroes." And, both more and less emphatically, he says, "I suspect whites of self-deception when they tell me they have no special feeling toward Negroes."

I cannot speak for all American whites nor even, honestly, for one American white; I am an American white (White?) by naturalization, not by birth, and grew up in what was considered by me, at least, to be one of the roughest boroughs in London. As a member of the only Jewish family in a lower-class Christian neighborhood, and the only Jew in my elementary school, I had more than once to fight for my health, if not my life. But since nobody plays baseball in London, the worst damage I underwent was inflicted by a cricket stump and, admittedly, cricket stumps are not quite as swingable and heavy as baseball bats. Most of the Christians I came into conflict with certainly frightened me, but not because they were Christians. Some of my best friends were Christians. They frightened me because they were bullies. Still, I never met any Negroes at that time, and I definitely don't remember any boys with very dark, very cruel, very Oriental-looking faces – some of the boys were pretty good-looking, as boys go – so once again I am unqualified to pronounce on Mr. Podhoretz's hates and fears. For that reason, I believe that he is right to ventilate them. We all have our hates and we rarely understand them.

---

ALBERT BERMEL is a playwright and is on the staff of Horizon magazine

My sister, for example, a sober and unruffled soul in almost every other respect, has hated butterflies ever since a moth deliberately flew into her left eye many years ago. (Wounds in the left eye are, as we are told by Dr. Hermes in Voltaire's Zadig, incurable.) And my wife, who will face up to somebody as intimidating as a landlord, or a salesman of soap made by the blind, screams at the sight of a mouse. A boyhood friend of mine (Christian again) who had not grown up in the proximity of Negroes and thus never enjoyed the privilege of hating them, would go cold and damp if somebody as much as mentioned lobsters, crabs or snails, even dead and edible specimens. International figures like Dwight Eisenhower and Konrad Adenauer are said to fear, if not hate, such groups as Intellectuals and the next Generation, respectively. Fred Schwarz hates (or fears) Communists. Marshal Voroshilov fears (or hates) American generals. Cats hate dogs. Dogs fear cats. Cowboys hate coyotes; the late Josef Stalin hated Fascist hyenas. Henry James was afraid of women. Dame Edith Sitwell hates all haters of Alexander Pope. One even hears of people who hate and fear in their sleep. We know that when a slumber did Wordsworth's spirit steal he had no human fear, but Wordsworth, on this as on other scores, was an exceptional man.

Neither are heroes and professional soldiers immune to fear. Hate and fear have been accounted as essential a part of the fighting man's equipment as his bayonet. So Mr. Podhoretz need not reproach himself for lack of courage. Indeed, he doesn't do so. We learn from his article that when the Negro boy Quentin pushed him in the shoulder, shortly before the baseball-bat incident, Podhoretz pushed right back.

A Baseball – batful

Mr. Podhoretz can draw further reassurances from fiction, of which he is one of America's most penetrating critics. In literature, as in life, there are numberless honorable precedents for his discomforting emotions. Crevel, in Cousine Bette, says "I fear God, but even more than that I fear the hell of poverty." Raskolnikov fears retribution. Sganarelle, in The Forced Marriage, fears marriage. Chekhov's Three Sisters hate growing old. Fabrice in La Chartreuse de Parme has a horror of making anyone unhappy, while the hero of David Lytton's The Goddam White Man detests the goddam white man. And no wonder: fears and hates are the mainsprings of literature.

It now becomes necessary to explain that Mr. Podhoretz's article was a sort of reply to James Baldwin's essay, "The Fire Next Time." Mr. Baldwin had already shaken up the readers of The New Yorker with this rhetorical sweetmeat, in which he warned, as he repeatedly warned before, that if white Americans (like Mr. Podhoretz, perhaps) don't watch out they will catch a nation-sized baseball-batful from the Negro extremists. Podhoretz calls Baldwin's essay "a statement of overwhelming persuasiveness and prophetic magnificence" which "deserves to be placed among the classics of our language."

He next states that, in Baldwin's view, the victory over racial hatred in this country can be won only by "the transcendence of color through love," and then he proceeds to criticize this view. It is not through love, Mr. Podhoretz tells me, that racial hatred can be abolished. "The tragic fact is that love is not the answer to hate – not in the world of politics, at any rate. . . . The hope of erasing the stigma [of color] . . . means not integration, it means assimilation, it means – let the brutal word come out – miscegenation." There: it's out. And Mr. Podhoretz is decisive about it: "In my opinion the Negro problem can be solved in this country in no other way" than by miscegenation.

Now, this is a most ingenious solution to Mr. Podhoretz's Negro Problem –And Ours. Loveless marriages are not an uncommon phenomenon, but who ever proposed before that we should marry the people we hate? I have heard that in some cases marriage can blight love and turn it into hate. Perhaps marriage, an institution that is always turning up surprises, can blight hate and turn it into love. As a naturalized American who married for love and has found that the love has not merely lasted but increased, I am in no position to be dogmatic about this. But any promising experiment is worth attempting. Mr. Podhoretz too is married, so we cannot ask him to be the pioneer, the astronaut, as it were, of the hateful-marriage orbit. Whom can we ask? I would have been interested to see what resulted if my friend had wed himself into a good lobster family.

Mr. Podhoretz, then, has pointed the way beyond abolishing the barriers between black and white, or, as Bernard Shaw reminded us, brown and pink. Some day the barriers might be struck down between all classes of natural enemies – between men and animals, animals and insects, insects and men and (why not?) men and plants. In this age of biological marvels it is just about possible to imagine a pure white Southern girl grafted to a lily. The Podhoretz thesis, if carried through bravely, would allow us to eradicate all differences between species. We would no longer have to bother to tolerate and respect beings from other categories of life. There would be no need to. Distinctions between people and peoples, and individual characteristics of all kinds, which have been prized in the past, perhaps unwisely, would be gradually eliminated. A homogeneous peace would reign on earth and eventually throughout the universe. It could make a rewarding parlor game to speculate on the kind of creatures we would turn out to be.

Liberation March, 1963
Race & Race Relations

"Safety is an illusion"

The Artist's Struggle for Integrity

James Baldwin

I REALLY don't like words like artist or integrity or courage or nobility. I have a kind of distrust of all those words because I don't really know what they mean, any more than I really know what such words as democracy or peace or peace-loving or war-like or integration mean. And yet one is compelled to recognize that all these imprecise words are attempts made by us all to get to something which is real and which lives behind the words. Whether I like it or not, for example, and no matter what I call myself, I suppose the only word for me, when the chips are down, is that I am an artist. There is such a thing. There is such a thing as integrity. Some people are noble. There is such a thing as courage. The terrible thing is that the reality behind these words depends ultimately on what the human being (meaning every single one of us) believes to be real. The terrible thing is that the reality behind all these words depends on choices one has got to make, for ever and ever and ever, every day.

I am not interested really in talking to you as an artist. It seems to me that the artist's struggle for his integrity must be considered as a kind of metaphor for the struggle which is universal and daily of all human beings on the face of this globe to get to become human beings. It is not your fault, it is not my fault, that I write. And I never would come before you in the position of a complainant for doing something that I must do. What we might get at this evening, if we are lucky, is what the importance of this effort is. However arrogant this may sound, I want to suggest two propositions. The first one is that the poets (by which I mean all artists) are finally the only people who know the truth about us. Soldiers don't. Statesmen don't. Priests don't. Union leaders don't. Only poets. That's my first proposition. We know about the Oedipus Complex not because of Freud but because of a poet who lived in Greece thousands of years ago. And what he said then about what it was like to be alive, is still true in spite of the fact that now we can get to Greece in something like five hours and then it would have taken I don't know how long a time.

The second proposition is really what I want to get at tonight. And it sounds mystical, I think, in a country like ours, and at a time like this when something awful is happening to a civilization, when it ceases to produce poets, and, what is even more crucial, when it ceases in any way whatever to believe in the report that only the poets can make. Conrad told us a long time ago (I think it was in Victory, but I might be wrong about that): "Woe to that man who does not put his trust in life." Henry James said, "Live, live all you can. It's a mistake not to." And Shakespeare said—and this is what I take to be the truth about everybody's life all of the time—"Out of this nettle, danger, we pluck this flower, safety." Art is here to prove, and to help one bear, the fact that all safety is an illusion. In this sense, all artists are divorced from and even necessarily opposed to any system whatever.

Let's trace it, just for kicks, for a minute. And I'll use myself. I won't say "me," but it's my story. The first thing an artist finds out when he is very, very young (when I say young I mean before he is 15, that is to say, before, properly speaking, he or she can walk or talk, before he or she has had enough experience to begin to assess his or her exprience)—and what occurs at that point in this hypothetical artist's life is a kind of silence—the first thing he finds out is that for reasons he cannot explain to himself or to others, he does not belong anywhere. Maybe you're on the football team, maybe you're a runner, maybe you belong to a church, you certainly belong to a family; and abruptly, in other people's eyes—this is very important—you begin to discover that you are moving and you can't stop this movement to what looks like the edge of the world. Now what is crucial, and one begins to understand it much much later, is that if you were this hypothetical artist, if you were in fact the dreamer that everybody says you are, if in fact you were wrong not to settle for the things that you cannot for some mysterious reason settle for, if this were so, the testimony in the eyes of other people would not exist. The crime of which you discover slowly you are guilty is not so much that you are aware, which is bad enough, but that other people see that you are and cannot bear to watch it, because it testifies to the fact that they are not. You're bearing witness helplessly to something which everybody knows and nobody wants to face, least of all the hypothetical misfit who has not learned how to walk or talk and doesn't know enough about experience to know what experience he has had.

Well, one survives that, no matter how. By and by your uncles and your parents and church stop praying for you. They realize it won't do a bit of good. They give you up, and you proceed a little further and your lovers put you down. They don't know what you're doing either and you can't tell them 'cause you don't know. You survive this and in some terrible way, which I suppose no one can ever describe, you are compelled, you are corralled, you are bull-whipped into dealing with whatever it is that hurt you. And what is crucial here is that if it hurt you, that is not what's important. Everybody's hurt. What is important, what corrals you, what bull-whips you, what drives you, torments you, is that you must find some way of using this to connect you with everyone else alive. This is all you have to do it with. You must understand that your pain is trivial except in so far as you can use it to connect with other people's pain; and in so far as you can do that with your pain, you can be released from it, and then hopefully it works the other way around too; in so far as I can tell you what it is to suffer, perhaps I can help you to suffer less. Then, you make—oh fifteen years later, several thousand drinks later, two or three divorces, God knows how many broken friendships and an exile of one kind or another—some kind of breakthrough, which is your first articulation of who you are, that is to say, your first articulation of who you suspect we all are.

Let me put it another way. When I was very young (and, I am sure this is true of everybody here), I assumed that no one had ever been born who was only five-feet-six-inches tall, or been born poor, or been born ugly, or masturbated, or done all those things which were my private property when I was 15. No one had ever suffered the way I suffered. Then you discover, and I discovered this through Dostoevski, that it is common. Everybody did it. Not only did everybody do it, everybody's doing it. And all the time. It's a fantastic and terrifying liberation. The reason it is terrifying is because it makes you once and for all responsible to no one but yourself. Not to God the Father, not to Satan, not to anybody. Just you. If you think it's right, then you've got to do it. If you think it's wrong, then you mustn't do it. And not only do we all know how difficult it is, given what we are, to tell the difference between right and wrong, but the whole nature of life is so terrible that somebody's right is always somebody else's wrong. And these are the terrible choices one has always got to make.

All right, I said the cat survived all that, and—this is a very crucial thing—you know dirty socks can make you feel like nothing but a dirty sock. You walk into a room and somebody says, "what do you do?" And you sap "I write." And they say, "Yeah, but what do you do?" And you wonder, what do you do? And what's it for? Why don't you get a job? And somehow you can't and finally you learn this in the most terrible way because you try. You're in the position of someone on the edge of a field, and it's cold in the field, and there's a house over there, and there's fire in the house, and food and everything you need, everything you want, and you make all kinds of efforts to get into the house. And they would let you in; they would let you in. They're not being cruel. They recognize you as you come to the door, and they can't let you in. You get in, let us say, for five minutes and you can't stay. When I was much younger, people said to me, this is very serious and not just a confession, I'm not just being self-indulgent—"All right, you were working, now stop working. Forget it! Have a drink. Why are you so serious all the time? You can't write all the time, Jimmy. Relax." Have you ever had anyone tell you to relax?

All right, you get through all that and you make your first breakthrough, people have heard your name—and here comes the world again. The world you first encountered when you were 15. The world which has starved you, despised you. Here it comes again. This time it is bearing gifts. The phone didn't ring before—if you had a phone. Now it never stops ringing. Instead of people saying, "What do you do?", they say "Won't you do this?" And you become, or you could become, a Very Important Person. And then, and this is a confession, you find yourself in the position of a woman I don't know who sings a certain song in a certain choir and the song begins: "I said I wasn't gonna tell nobody but I couldn't keep it to myself." You've come full circle. Here you are again, with it all to do all over again, and you must decide all over again whether you want to be famous or whether you want to write. And the two things, in spite of all the evidence, have nothing whatever in common.

Now what is it at the point that the artist, since I must put it this way, begins to come of age, that he cannot keep to himself? This is the trickiest part of the whole argument. I was having lunch today with a very good friend of mine and a friend of his—and they're both artists. The friend of the friend is a man I admire very much but the other one is a cat I really dig. My friend is an actor and there's a role which we all know he ought to play. In fact, we all know—anyone who loves him—that he has no choice but to play it sooner or later and we all know that he's a little afraid to. And God knows he should be. But he knows he's got to do it. And his friend was saying to him—and I paraphrase it very awkwardly—you must remember that most people live in almost total darkness. It is true, said this friend, that we drink too much, we suffer from stagefright and you may get an ulcer or die of cancer, and it is true that it is all very very hard and gets harder all the time. And yet people, millions of people whom you will never see, who don't know you, never will know you, people who may try to kill you in the morning, live in a darkness which—if you have that funny terrible thing which every artist can recognize and no artist can define—you are responsible to those people, to lighten, and it does not matter what happens to you. You are being used in the way a crab is useful, the way sand certainly has some function. It is impersonal. This force which you didn't ask for, and this destiny which you must accept, is also your responsibility. And if you survive it, if you don't cheat, if you don't lie, it is not only, you know, your glory, your achievement, it is almost our only hope—because only an artist can tell, and only artists have told since we have heard of man, what it is like for anyone who gets to this planet to survive it. What it is like to die, or to have somebody die, what it is like to be glad. Hymns don't do this, churches really cannot do it. The trouble is that although the artist can do it, the price that he has to pay himself and that you, the audience, must also pay, is a willingness to give up everything, to realize that although you spent twenty-seven years acquiring this house, this furniture, this position, although you spent forty years raising this child, these children, nothing, none of it belongs to you. You can only have it by letting it go. You can only take if you are prepared to give, and giving is not an investment. It is not a day at the bargain counter. It is a total risk of everything, of you and who you think you are, who you think you'd like to be, where you think you'd like to go—everything, and this forever, forever.

Now I, if I may put it this way, and all my tribe, if I may put it that way, find this very hard to do and it's very hard on my mother, on my sisters and my brothers and all my friends, and it's very hard on me and I may fail in the next two seconds. But then one has got to understand, that is I and all my tribe (I mean artists now), that it is hard for me. If I spend weeks and months avoiding my typewriter—and I do, sharpening pencils, trying to avoid going where I know I've got to go—then one has got to use this to learn humility. After all, there is a kind of saving egotism too, a cruel and dangerous but also saving egotism, about the artist's condition, which is this: I know that if I survive it, when the tears have stopped flowing or when the blood has dried, when the storm has settled, I do have a typewriter which is my torment but is also my work. If I can survive it, I can always go back there, and if I've not turned into a total liar, then I can use it and prepare myself in this way for the next inevitable and possibly fatal disaster. But if I find that hard to do—and I have a weapon which most people don't have—then one must understand how hard it is for almost anybody else to do it at all.

And this is where the whole question in my own private, personal case of being an American artist, of being not yet 65 years old, and of being an American Negro artist in 1963 in this most peculiar of countries begins to be a very frightening assignment. One is dealing all the time with the most inarticulate people that I, in any case, have ever encountered, and I don't hesitate to say the most inarticulate group of people we are ever likely to encounter, I or anybody else, for a very long time, at least in this century. Inarticulate and illiterate and they're very particular and difficult to describe away, unlettered in the language, which may sound a little florid but there's no other way that I can think of to say it, totally unlettered in the language of the heart, totally distrustful of whatever cannot be touched, panic-stricken at the very first hint of pain. A people determined to believe that they can make suffering obsolete. Who don't understand yet a very physiological fact that the pain which signals a toothache is a pain which saves your life. This is very frightening. It frightens me half to death, and I'm not talking now merely about race, and I'm certainly not talking merely about Southerners. I am talking really about two-thirds of my public and technical allies. People who believe that segregation is wrong. People who march on picket lines who yet have overlooked something else and are still under the illusion, I think, that what they've overlooked has something to do with social questions and in my particular case anyway that it has something to do with Negroes. I would like to live long enough—don't misunderstand me, but I would like to live long enough—to see that word or the use to which it's put struck from the American vocabulary. In effect, there is no Negro problem. The problem is that one is still in a kindergarten, an emotional kindergarten, and the Negro in this country operates as some weird kind of gorilla who suddenly is breaking up all the blackboards. I am tired not only of being told to wait, but of people's saying "What should I do?" They mean, "What should I do about the Negro problem; what should I do for you?" There is nothing you can do for me. There is nothing you can do for Negroes. It must be done for you. One is not attempting to save twenty-two million people. One is attempting to save an entire country, and that means an entire civilization, and the price for that is high. The price for that is to understand one's self. The price for that, for example, is to recognize that most of us, white and black, have arrived at a point where we do not know what to tell our children. Most of us have arrived at a point where we still believe and insist on and act on the principle, which is no longer valid, that this is such and such an optimum, that our choice is the lesser of two evils, and this is no longer true. Gonorrhea is not preferable to syphilis.

The time has come, it seems to me, to recognize that the framework in which we operate weighs on us too heavily to be borne and is about to kill us. It is time to ask very hard questions and to take very rude positions. And no matter at what price. It is time, for example, for one example, to recognize that the major effort of our country until today (and I am talking about Washington and all the way down to whoever heads the Women's Christian Temperance Union) is not to change a situation but to seem to have done it. It is spectacular for example, to have been forced ultimately to bring in the entire whatever-it-was—militia, U.S. Marshals—to get James Meredith into school, and from a certain point of view, which I do not at all share, I can see that one could say that no other country would have done it. It's escaped everybody's notice that no other country would have had to. It is easy to admire the sit-in students in the South, and nothing is more delightful than to talk to Martin Luther King, whom I very much admire. But it is too easy to admire a Christian minister, especially if you take no responsibility for what's happening to him or to those people that he tries to represent. It is hard to begin to understand that the drift in American life towards chaos is masked by all these smiling faces and all these do-good efforts.

photograph by Harold Feinstein

(b) To provide funds for assistance to, and in cooperation with, States in study of causative factors in delinquency. For □; Against □.

(c) To strengthen and improve State and local programs for control, treatment, and rehabilitation of juvenile delinquents. For □; Against □.

5. Rural and urban services: The basic principles of equalization of education, recreation, and health services for children and youth, with the improvement of these services where needed, should be maintained in rural areas and in densely populated urban areas. Similar legislation should provide for children of migrant families. For □; Against □.

6. School and community services under the U.S. Government: The Federal Government should see that adequate funds are provided for school and community services in the District of Columbia and in oversea areas where the United States maintains armed forces. For □; Against □.

7. Pure foods and drugs: Federal legislation should provide for complete inspection of food, drug, and cosmetic establishments by the Food and Drug Administration. Legislation should require drug manufacturers to have adequate controls to insure the purity and safety of their products. New drugs and medical devices should be proved effective as well as safe before they are placed on the market. Distributors of dangerous habit-forming drugs should be required to keep records on production and sales of such drugs and to make these reports available for inspection. For □; against □.

LIBRARY SERVICES

Public library services should be extended to all people on an equitable basis. For □; Against □.

PEACE AND NATIONAL SECURITY

1. National defense: In planning the strategy of the national security program, the role of the schools should be carefully considered, because the security of this country and the peace of the world today require a well-educated civilian population as well as a strong military force. A major part of the national security rests upon the ability to prepare young people for the discharge of their military and civic responsibilities. For □; Against □.

An adequate civilian reserve of manpower available for military service should be developed, and a standing miltiary force sufficient to deter aggressors should be maintained. Every effort should be made to meet the personnel needs of the Armed Forces with the least interruption of high school and post high school education of youtha—t the same time with fair consideration for the needs of out-of-school youth. For □; Against □.

2. International Relations:

(a) The United Nations should be supported as the best available instrument for world peace. Diligent efforts for international cooperation should be made through use of United Nations channels—to improve the economic, social, physical, and spiritual welfare of all children and youth. For □; Against □.

(b) The program of the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) should be continued. For □; Against□.

(c) The national congress supports in principle the work of other specialized agencies—such as (1) the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). For □; Against□. (2) The World Health Organization (WHO). For □; Against □. (3) The Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO). For □; Against □. (4) the Bureau of Technical Assistance Operations (TAO). For □; Against □.

(d) The national congress supports a broad program of cultural and educational exchange between the United States and other countries, and assistance by the Untied States in training of teachers and other professional and technical personnel for other countries. For □; Against □.

POSTAL RATES

The national congress will oppose increases in the special postal rates for the mailing of library books and educational materials, and for second-class mailings by nonprofit organizations. For □; Against □.

The following proposition is not part of the national legislation program:

We are in favor of any further extension of Federal aid to Education. For □; Against □.

---

An Appeal for Responsible Negro Leadership in the District of Columbia

R & R Rel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM B. WIDNALL

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 8, 1963

Mr. WIDNALL. Mr. Speaker, the responsibility for the improvement of conditions in the District of Columbia rests not only on Congress, its governing body, but on the people within the District as well. Unfortunately, there has been a trend of late to give too great a weight to statements, at times irresponsible, of certain individuals and groups who have proclaimed themselves the spokesmen for the Negro community.

As I have remarked in the past, it is my belief that there is much room for improvement in the living conditions and educational, employment, and social opportunities of the citizens of the District. At the same time, however, the increasing disrespect for the law cannot be tolerated. Past statements by some of the so-called spokesmen for the community at large have failed to contribute to increased citizen cooperation and individual responsibility so vital to such a diverse society as the District of Columbia.

It has been my feeling that these spokesmen have been out of touch with their own constituents—that their views do not reflect the views of the great majority of our citizens, regardless of race. In the Sunday Star of April 7, 1963, this feeling was borne out by a letter written by Bert Cumby, a respected and intelligent leader of the responsible Negro community in Washington, D.C. I would suggest that the spokesmen who wish to blame everything on the Negro, as well as those I have already mentioned who are willing to blame everything on society and the police, should read this letter carefully, both for its content and approach. This letter may well signify a turning point for the better for all of us living in and working in the District.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Sunday Star, Apr. 7, 1963]

THE NEGRO AND DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CRIME

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—The following views on crime in the Capital and its relation to the Negro community were submitted to the Star in the form of a letter by Bert Cumby, who had a distinguished Army career and is active in church and youth affairs here. As a lieutenant colonel, he was the first Negro instructor in the Army Intelligence School; interrogated prisoners of war during the Korean action and testified before the McClellan committee on POW Exchange Methods. He is a member of St. Stephen and Incarnation Episcopal Church and the National Council of Boy Scouts.)

There seems to be a growing concern within the Negro community over crime in the District, and some self-appointed spokesmen, through statements to the press, create the erroneous impression that they speak for all Negroes here.

This concern is not necessarily over the stated objectives of these persons, but rather over their careless and ill-prepared performances, reflecting certain civic interpretation and thought subsequently and unjustly charged to the Negro community.

Such performances and their impact on the Negro community call for some comment and observations. It is hoped that these observations will be noted with the same spirit in which they are presented, and with the maturity and objectivity befitting a vital segment of the Nation's population that recently celebrated its centennial of the Emancipation Proclamation.

ALARMING CRIME RATE

Every District of Columbia resident who can read a newspaper, listen to radio and view television, knows that crime here has reached alarming proportions, and every segment of the population, including the executive branch of the Federal Government, has expressed concern. The crime picture has been objectively presented to Congress and to the public. It has been supported by hard facts and information, and with cold statistics from the police department, the courts, and from institutions intimately concerned with the problem.

Instead of facing this unpleasant fact and offering practical recommendations for its solution, some seem to think the statistics are rigged and that crime here is normal, whatever that means. But the Negro community is not saying the statistics are rigged and I do not believe the Negro community regards crime in the District as normal. But the implications can be clearly drawn from the performances and statements by some alleged spokesmen for the Negro community.

Recently this writer attended a public meeting in Northwest Washington, at which crime in the District was discussed. When someone asked how it could be curbed, one speaker replied that crime in Washington is not as bad as it might seem. He said New York, Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit, and St. Louis had more crime than Washington. This may be true. But what does crime in those cities have to do with crime here?

HOME RULE NO SOLUTION

As to how crime can be curbed here, one speaker said get home rule. This writer is not against home rule. He has been a District of Columbia taxpayer for 22 years and has religiously shouldered every individual responsibility of citizenship, including 20 years of honorable military service in several parts of the world. But home rule without numerous other individual and group actions, will not solve crime in Washington any more than it will solve it in New York, Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit, and St. Louis—all blessed with home rule and effective political organizations to support them.

The apparent failure on the part of some persons to face up to reality in this problem is reflected in their protestations. This writer is not against protest. The technique of protest is a constitutional right. But this writer does oppose the conference-type of protest where those protesting present a case as special representatives of the Negro community, of which I am a member, with erroneous information, poor preparation and without reliable and verified sources.

LEGAL BACKGROUND

The late and erudite Charles Houston who, with the able assistance of the brilliant Dr. James Nabritt of Howard University, laid the solid legal background for most civil rights the Negro enjoys today, once said that the Negro can not afford to plead his case, whether before a court of law or before public opinion, with faulty information. The life and times of this great Negro leader and legal mind, and that of Dr. Nabritt should be must reading for those who seem so eager to represent the Negro community. At this critical period in the historical development of the American Negro, responsible spokesmanship and leadership are absolutely essential to his continued progress, and vital to his survival.

Protests based on faulty information, unrelated facts, and emotionalism, make a painful contribution to the neutralization of Negro leadership everywhere. Documented instances of this kind are many. Several years ago a self-appointed spokesman for the Negroes here protested against police brutality. The Commissioners took the protest under study for possible action. After much publicity, time-consuming conferences and investigation, it was learned that the principal source of the information in the charges was an ex-convict with a long criminal record. Of course, the charges were withdrawn.

RECENT SHOOTING

Recently an alleged purse snatcher was shot by a policeman. Within hours after the incident and without complete facts, a telegram was dispatched to the Commissioners, the police department, a civil rights agency and the press, protesting "murder." The telegram accused the wrong policeman for the action. However, there is no record to indicate that a corrected copy of the telegram was forwarded to the original receivers.

It seems in this instance no thought or serious consideration was given to the record of the alleged offender, the offense, or the helplessness of the victim, a pregnant woman. This action clearly reflected an interest in the offender, and little or no sympathy with the victim. If the community at large interpreted this action as the attitude of the Negro community toward this matter, it is both unfortunate and erroneous. Perhaps the greatest disservice self-proclaimed Negro spokesmen have inflicted upon the Negro community is the utterly false impression that Negroes are indifferent to crime here. The fact is the Negro community is greatly concerned with crime here, and it has to be when statistics show that 70 or 80 percent of the victims are Negroes. Everything about crime in Washington that is repugnant to the white community is repugnant to the Negro community. It was repugnant when a defenseless woman was attacked while praying in church. It was repugnant when a Catholic priest was murdered by one whom he had helped. It was repugnant to the Negro community when a Jewish shopkeeper was brutally murdered and robbed.

THE GUILTY MUST PAY

It was repugnant when a pregnant mother was attacked while doing her laundry at home. It was repugnant to the Negro community when an aged musician was slain while walking home with groceries. It was repugnant when two men clubbed to death a 40-year-old man in his home. It was repugnant to the Negro community when seven Negro women were criminally assaulted in recent months. And, it is repugnant to the Negro community when these offenders are defended and the victims ignored. If we are to have a society of decency, of the rule of law and not the rule of the jungle, we must not only be against crime, but must demand that offenders pay for all crimes against society.

Persons without qualifications for operating a highly specialized agency such as the police department and other agencies of public safety, have suggested that District police undergo special training in discretion and proper use of their basic weapon. This writer is more concerned about the offender and potential offender, whose rebellion against constitutional authority contributes to his offenses, than about the trained police officer. This writer is more concerned about a weapon in the hands of an offender or potential offender than the weapon in the hands of the policeman.

Nothing reflects the above more dramatically than the fatal shooting of Pvt. Elmer L. Hunter, an intelligent young Negro police officer, by a man with a weapon concealed in an umbrella. This officer was exercising discretion, kindness, and respect for the individual in line of duty. Could this gunman have been under the impression that the policeman would not defend himself because of charges that police are trigger happy?

If there were outcries by the usual spokesmen in this case this writer failed to observe such. Is it that the policeman who shot the alleged purse snatcher was unjustified, and the offender who killed Private Hunter was justified. The useless murder of this Negro policeman was most repugnant to the Negro community, and this writer is proud to say he contributed to his widow's fund.

MEASURES COULD BE TAKEN NOW

Many reasons are advanced for crime here, one being job opportunity. This may have contributed, but to what extent is not known. There have been many suggestions as to how crime could be curbed, including more jobs for youngsters, more policemen and more police dogs on the streets. But implementation of these and other measures for curbing crime here will take time. Other actions can be taken within each segment of the community, and without delay. These actions don't require a Supreme Court decision, approval by congressional committees, or approval by the District Commissioners. They are submitted here in the interest of the Negro community.

No personality in the Negro community has a greater opportunity to serve his people than the Negro minister. He is not only a spiritual leader but a missionary. He enjoys confidence and support and is highly respected in his area. The Negro minister has done much to alert his followers to their need for full citizenship, and stimulating their desire for various aspects of civil rights. The Negro minister could impress upon his followers the necessity for exercising continuous control and discipline over their children.

He could stress that as important as church and school are to the daily lives of children, the home is the real training ground. He could accept the absolute necessity for providing their children with the best educational training and preparation available, they will never take their rightful place in competitive and integrated society. He could emphasize that with citizenshp goes a keen sense of individual conduct and responsibility. He could hammer home the ageless truth, that to demand respect from others one must first respect himself, and that the dignity of the individual starts with the individual.

NEGRO RADIO

Several local radio stations are for all practical purposes, "Negro stations." They are staffed with Negro personnel, their programs are aired to the Negro community, and their advertisers, for the most part, depend upon Negro trade. These outlets could render a vital service in fighting local crime. They could decrease their regular diets of terrifying sounds for a few educational programs.

They could substitute a crime doesn't pay series for programs which serve no useful purpose except to plug advertisers. They could produce programs for children, reflecting the better side of our youth, such as the large number of Negro children in the District High School Symphony which gave a remarkable performance recently at Roosevelt High. They could run a citizenship series, stressing the essential qualities of respectable citizenship. They could do what a highly respectable Negro publication did several years ago: run a series on conduct—good and bad. This does not seem to be suggesting too much of a communication facility that earns its profits from sources that depend largely on Negro business.

COMPLEX PROBLEMS

To those persons whose methods seem to reflect an emotional impulse rather than well-planned thought and action, the area of race relations is complex and delicate. In this area everything is not jet black or pasty white. There are no one-way streets. There is an area between the two shades—call it the gray area, where men of goodwill, of personal integrity and honesty, and of individual responsibility can meet on common ground, work together and produce good for the good of the community in which we live. And until such a relationship is firmly established on all levels, our purposes will be self-defeating and our ultimate goals postponed.

Before critics dismiss these observations as typical name-calling nonsense, the writer wishes to clearly state that as a member of the Negro community, he shares the very same aspiration of every other Negro regarding full citizenship, and he has not in the past and does not now, compromise on any of the fundamentals of this status. These comments are in the interest of responsible leadership—responsible Negro leadership.

BERT CUMBY.

---

The Employment Crisis Ahead

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS B. CURTIS

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 8, 1963

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, the Chicago American recently commended editorially on a speech of the President in Chicago, pointing to the problem which he dealt with and the words left unsaid in his original text. The importance of the problem, that of the maturing of the wartime baby boom and their entry into the labor market, deserves full attention and I commend the Chicago American's editorial, which follows, for turning the thoughts of its readers to this situation.

KENNEDY'S SOBER WARNING

In delivering his speech here Saturday on the Nation's unemployment problems, President Kennedy considerably toned down the grim warnings contained in his original script; he left out, for instance, any reference to "a decade of chronic troubles and recession" that would follow if jobs can't be provided for the tidal wave of new workers. What he did say, though, was sober enough, and the facts do not need any dressing up to be worrisome.

As Kennedy emphasized, the postwar baby flood is now surging through high school and college and is threatening to engulf the labor market. At the same time, advances

HAT. - Race & Race Relations
1963

ADDRESS BY

HONORABLE BERL I. BERNHARD
STAFF DIRECTOR, U.S. COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS

AT

WAKEFIELD HIGH SCHOOL
ARLINGTON, VIRGINIA
APRIL 20, 1963

SLOGANS, SEMANTICS, AND SHIBBOLETHS

At this time of year, young people all over our land are being alternately deafened and sedated by speakers who urge them to go out and conquer the world. The trouble with this is that the student has enough to worry about just to find his place in the world. On the other hand, some of this year's Spring crop of speakers may fare better than usual because -- in my opinion -- there's a good deal more idealism and adventure in today's teenagers than there has been for many generations.

My purpose is to talk to you about slogans, semantics and shibboleths. I couldn't do this with an ordinary adult audience because the slogans they live by, and the things they think they mean by them, have been calcified by time and habit. Consequently, far from coming here to talk down to you as children, I come to talk up to you. You belong to an honor society whose membership is based on academic accomplishment; therefore, I assume you are intelligent, while still young and flexible enough to use your intelligence. The real reasons that parents are driven to distraction by their children's innocent questions -- as you shall find -- as I have found -- is that they can't answer many of them. Later on, when children realize that they will have to find the answers themselves, too many of them stop asking -- even of themselves.

If I accomplish anything here, I want it to be one thing: To implant the desire that you find your own answers by avoiding the slogans and shibboleths that many people accept without question. I have a certain orientation in this matter because of my immediate experience as Staff Director of the United States Commission on Civil Rights. During this period of service, I have been attacked by some people for trying to wreck what they consider to be the American way of life. At the same time, I have been attacked by others who think that the program I serve is not doing enough to further the American way of life. I've learned the hard way that people frequently use exactly the same words with equal conviction to express totally contradictory ideas.

Examine, if you please, a phrase like the "American way of life" or "rugged American individualism." The American way of life to some people simply means continuing to live in the cozy security of their present neighborhood. To some, it means preserving a rigid caste system that denies the equal protection of the laws to minority citizens of the community. For those minority citizens so deprived of equal rights and opportunities, the American way of life is, for them, poverty, inequity, and bitterness. And what society and way of life do we talk about when we refer to "rugged American individualism?" Do we recall our history as revolutionists? Or the severe communal life of the Pilgrim colonies? The lawlessness and vigilante justice of the early Western frontier? The days when fortunes were made by unrestrained exploitation of then abundant natural resources? Or just the carefree period before the income tax?

A well-worn phrase evokes a mental image for each of us and this image is created and conditioned by early teaching and prejudices and a thousand daily experiences. In addition to this, we happen to have a rather inexact language. It has been said that the English-speaking peoples of the world get along rather well together because each nation's representative can leave a conference believing that its words meant exactly what he wanted them to mean. On the other hand, it has been said that you can't ever get along with the French because their language is so precise that it's impossible for you or them to misunderstand its meaning.

If you want an example of how easily we can confuse ourselves, consider the word "fast." It's simple enough but it can simultaneously mean at least four quite different things. The word "fast" can mean motion, in the sense of being held fast, it can mean the absence of motion. In a religious sense, it can mean abstinence. And as a description of promiscuous behavior, it can mean somebody who does everything but abstain.

So much for semantics; what about our shibboleths? One of them, I submit, is the easy assumption that, barring instant destruction, we'll always enjoy an increasingly high standard of living. Yet the world population curve clearly indicates otherwise. By about 1800, after a million or so years of human development, there were about one billion people on this planet. But about 150 years later, there were nearly three billion people and the curve is going nearly straight up. Within the next 40 years in this country alone we are told we will have to duplicate every structure in the United States to house a population that will nearly double in that time.

For newsletter -

Take one population statistic that's a good deal closer to home. You've heard, doubtless, that Negroes comprise over 54 percent of the population of the District of Columbia because their birth rate is so fantastically high. This is misleading; social studies have established that the fertility ratio of Negroes living in the District is about equal to that of white persons living in suburban Washington, where most white families with children live. Moreover, while the Negro population of the District is over 54 percent, for the metropolitan area as a whole, it is 24 percent -- about the same as it was in the time of Abraham Lincoln.

You've heard that the District's crime rate is the highest in the Nation and that this rate continues to soar. Here we have two untrue assumptions that have been taken as gospel by people who don't bother to question the source of their information. Instead of being first, Washington actually ranks thirteenth among America's 25 largest cities in the number of crimes per population thousand, according to FBI Uniform Crime Reporting statistics. Further, compared to a national crime increase of 7 percent for the calendar year 1962 over the year 1961, the crime rate in Washington increased only 4.9 percent.

These statistics are taken from a March 4, 1963, report of the FBI. This report also shows that in murder, non-negligent manslaughter, Atlanta is first with a 13.5% increase over 1961, and Washington is fourth, with an increase of 3.4%; forcible rape, Chicago is first, and Washington eighteenth, with an 18% decrease; robbery, Chicago is first again, and Washington sixth with a 16.6% increase; burglary -- breaking or entering, Los Angeles is first with a 6.4% increase, and Washington is sixteenth, with a 2.4% increase; larceny $50 and over, Los Angeles is first with a 6.5% increase, and Washington is eighteenth with a 8.2% increase; and auto theft, Chicago is first, and Washington is fourteenth, with a 5% increase. Only in aggravated assault is Washington first, with an increase of 1.7%. However, aggravated assaults increased in Los Angeles 2.6%, in Houston 12.9%, and in St. Louis 99.9%.

As an Urban League official in Detroit has said: "Although crime is as old as time, its visitation upon a community has no respect for race, age, sex, affluence, or geography. Its abatement or its increase will depend on the degree to which the total community is willing to assure equality of opportunities in housing, employment, education, distribution of welfare, and equality of treatment by law enforcement officers." Concerning housing, a Richmond, Virginia Times-Dispatch editorial last fall said: "There can be little doubt that there is a correlation between crime and quality of housing.... Crime rates for slum districts are high, whether the people who live there are white or Negro."

Another shibboleth of the prejudiced is the assumption that the Negro came to America as a slave and has risen somewhat above that estate only because of the liberal charity of whites. In fact, the Negro did not come to the United States as a slave but as a bondsman or indentured servant, bound over to a master for a period of time, after which he was to have his freedom. Such Negro freedmen lived in early American communities as master mechanics and skilled workmen of all kinds. It was only during the first quarter of the eighteenth century, when slave labor became an attractive commodity for southern agriculture, that the social privileges of the free Negro were diminished and slavery became an American institution. And far from being the original home of the free, America lagged badly behind other nations in ending human slavery. The major European powers had sought to stamp out the slave trade entirely through the Treaty of London in 1841. Slavery was abolished in the newly-independent South American nations. Chile, Colombia, Bolivia, Guatemala, Mexico, Uruguay, Argentina, and Peru had all outlawed slavery by 1854. And after the Emancipation Proclamation in 1862, how much have we done as a nation to move from the condition of slavery to the realization of full citizenship for all Americans? The fact is that, to the end of the nineteenth century and well into the twentieth, the legally-free Negro was denied the franchise, excluded from public office, barred from juries, assigned to separate and inferior schools (as he still is in Virginia), herded into ghettos (as he still is in the District of Columbia), given menial jobs (as he is throughout this entire area), and segregated in his illness, his worship, and even in his death.

The wonder of it is that the American Negro survived at all or that he ever rose above the social role of laborer. In 1866, there were 4.5 million Negroes in the United States and an estimated 10 percent of them were literate. Today, there are 19 million Negroes and an estimated 93 percent are literate. Negroes are counted among the scholars, scientists, educators, business leaders, and high governmental officials of this country. Just a few days ago, a Negro Air Force Captain was selected as one of the trainees for the manned space program. The Negro has not only survived; he has raised himself to a level which is little short of astonishing, and he has done it against great social odds and with very little help from government. After Lincoln, you have to wait until Theodore Roosevelt before you can find an American President who took a significant interest in equal rights for all Americans. In the legislative area, you can count the Civil Rights Acts of 1866, 1875, 1957, and 1960. Judicially, the cupboard was largely bare until the Supreme Court decision of 1954 -- a decision which has yet to be implemented for many thousands of children who want a decent education.

In the field of civil rights, the shibboleths abound. It took a major court case to establish what most of us knew all the time -- that separate schools weren't equal. Now you may have heard that one-third of the total number of biracial school districts in the South have been desegregated and this is a heartening advance. Statistics don't lie; or do they? In terms of Negro children actually attending desegregated schools in the South, the actual number is less than 8 percent, and less than one-half of one percent if we take only the States of the old Confederacy. The reason for this disparity is summed up in the phrase "token desegregation" -- the practice of admitting a few children and claiming that the law has been obeyed.

You may also have heard that Negroes have been getting along fine in their second-class citizenship status -- that they really don't want to assume civic obligations such as voting and only agitators say they do. But since a court action was concluded in 1961, the registration of Negroes in one Alabama county has tripled. In another Alabama county, Bullock -- one in which the Civil Rights Commission first exposed conspiracies to keep Negroes from voting -- Negro registration has risen from five to 1,000 in one year's time.

This is some of our American history in the struggle toward equal rights for all our citizens, and I urge you to study it further. It will be useful to you in two ways -- first as an intellectual exercise to establish how fact has been distorted by fancy and how emotion can be substituted for reason; and second, so that you may explore a serious flaw in our American life that badly needs your attention.

What I am encouraging you to do is to carry into your community life the same intellectual objectivity and curiosity to know the truth that has served you so well in academic training.

We are told that 90 percent of all of the scientists in man's history are living today. Technically, we are terribly swift in our progress. But like the sorcerer's apprentice, we are bound to create uncontrollable chaos for ourselves if we cannot close the gap between our technical and social progress.

Short of altruism -- far short of humanitarian idealism -- can we apply this intellectual effort to our selfish and selfishly worthy national interest? Can we clearly examine that ideal, that quality of character known by the vastly-abused word "patriotism"? I think that all of us vaguely believe that patriotism in some sense is a desirable personal attribute. But what is it, really? Giving lip service and hand-salute to the flag? Feeling the skin prickle when the band plays and the parade goes by? Samuel Johnson said "that man is little to be envied whose patriotism would not gain force upon the plain of Marathon." Of those who would use it for personal gain, Dr. Johnson also said that "patriotism is the last refuge of the scoundrel."

Obviously, it has many meanings. To some, it means adherence to an ideology that seeks to subjugate men and nations. To others, it means preserving the status quo and sometimes a way of life that never was. To still others it is an active effort to turn back the clock, shut the mind to the present, and see the hobgoblin of cunning conspiracy whenever their narrow minds are confounded by complex events. Here indeed, in one well-worn word, is the place where slogans and shibboleths find their semantical haven.

I urge you to consider the thought that patriotism has a valid function in your life and that its meaning can only be found in one place -- the Constitution of the United States. The more you read this remarkable document, the more you realize the value of the birthright that has been left to us by that little band of 'subversive' revolutionists who created this Nation.

The ideal, the philosophy of equal opportunity for all Americans, is set forth as principle and objective in the Declaration of Independence. It is re-emphasized in the original Constitution, and it is reinforced by amendments which have been adopted by the States. The Fourteenth Amendment forbids the States from making or enforcing any law which abridges the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the United States. Nor, it says, shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law. The Fifteenth Amendment says very clearly and simply that the right to vote shall not be denied or abridged on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. If anyone wants to study patriotism, that quality which we call Americanism, he will find it in the Constitution.

He will also find there the ideal of society that has yet to be realized in America. From the implementation of this ideal can come an enormous national strength -- the exercise of equal rights and equal opportunities to eliminate racial discord, greatly accelerate education, reduce crime and poverty, utilize valuable manpower, add hugely to our economic wealth, and build an impregnable moral fortress whose flying banners will inspire the entire world.

But this fortress can only be built if you, as individuals in your personal life and actions, and as active members of your community, lay the foundation for it. This responsibility is clearly yours and the burden will be a great one. But, if you assume it, I think you will find life a good deal more interesting than if you devote it merely to the conspicuous consumption of consumer goods. If you do not assume the burden, if you do nothing about the corrosive social inequities in your community and your country, then you may yourself lose that freedom you are unwilling to extend to others.

But the definitive word for those who slumber mentally while national ideals become empty slogans comes to us across a century's time from the Great Emancipator, himself, Abraham Lincoln. He said:

> ...are you quite sure that the demon you have roused will not turn and rend you? ...familiarize yourself with the chains of bondage and you prepare your own limbs to wear them. Accustomed to trample on the rights of others, you have lost the genius of your own independence and become the fit subjects of the first cunning tyrant who rises among you.

WB ✓ PA ✓ ML ✓ R+R Rel. LWD ✓ JS

WHAT THE AMERICAN NEGRO WANTS

Interview With Roy Wilkins, Head of the NAACP

After years of conflict over racial issues, how do Negroes feel about the progress they are making? What do they want?

For authoritative answers to such questions, "U. S. News & World Report" invited to its conference room Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

In a 1955 interview, Mr. Wilkins told "U. S. News & World Report" readers what Negroes expected from the Supreme Court's ruling against segregation in schools.

Now, in another exclusive interview, the NAACP leader tells what he feels the Negro has got—and what he hasn't got—and describes the mood of the American Negro today.

Q Mr. Wilkins, can you explain for us the direction policy is taking in the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People?

A Our policy reflects the dominant mood of the Negro today. That mood is one of impatience with the pace of desegregation, or, as we say, impatience with the speed with which the Negro comes into the status of full citizenship. It is a very great impatience, I think, spurred by the resistance to implementing the 1954 Supreme Court decision against segregated public schools.

Q Would you say the Negro's impatience is growing?

A I think it is. It's a mixture of impatience and cynicism. The Black Muslims, of course, are an outgrowth of this sentiment.

The Muslims' idea of black for black has always been around in one form or another. Some of you may recall the Garvey movement of the 1920s—a movement whose leaders claimed 2 million followers. Even if you cut that in half, it's a million, or about 10 per cent of the Negroes at that time. Other estimates had the total nearer 100,000.

The idea of us all getting together—putting our money together and building ourselves an economic structure and electing Negroes to office, running our own affairs, making ourselves rich instead of making the other man rich—has always had an appeal.

Q Is that a form of apartheid—separateness?

A You can call it a form of apartheid, but it didn't reach that kind of dignity in terms of a political-science concept. It was a gesture of desperation born of frustration. I wouldn't say it was apartheid in the sense that it was a conceived-of policy. You might call it counter-apartheid, perhaps.

Now the Muslims have come along and sharpened up the concept by giving it religious and cult overtones.

Q How seriously do you regard the Muslims?

A They aren't serious in numbers. They aren't serious, as yet, psychologically. The American Negro, whatever else he is, is pretty thoroughly American. He's under a lot of handicaps, and he feels terribly frustrated and down at times, but, if I know anything about him, he believes in this country and he believes some way he'll make it.

Along comes a man who says, "Give up Christianity, give up American citizenship, give up the idea of integration, give up the idea of association with white people, working with white people, talking to white people, or expecting any reason from white people, and cut off everything and come with us." The American Negro can't very well accept this philosophy, which goes counter to everything he's been working for and talking about—that is, integration into the American scene as an American citizen.

Q Do the Muslims propose violence?

A No. They want the U. S. Government to give them two or three States, and establish their own Negro country within the United States. But they don't name the States. They don't spell it out the way the Communists did in their heyday.

The Communists in the '30s and '40s drew maps showing counties in the South—the "black belt" counties—over which they wanted Negroes to have hegemony. They wanted the Government to get out and wanted, in effect, to have the land turned over to them.

The Muslims do not spell it out quite that way. Also, the Muslims are a well-disciplined group. They are well behaved. They do not believe or indulge in violence. They do not preach going out and throwing bombs or beating up anybody. They are well dressed, quietly dressed. The youngsters wear ivy-league-cut clothes.

Q Are the Muslims young people for the most part?

A I would say that most are under 40.

Q Do they attract middle-class Negroes?

A I don't know. They don't give out membership figures or breakdowns. They specialize in recruiting the frustrated and the disappointed—the people largely without hope. They recruit people in jail, people who feel that "the white people are all against us, the NAACP is crazy, and Adam Clayton Powell, even, is all wrong. What's he doing wasting his time in Congress? You never get anywhere there. You never get anywhere in the courts. What we black people have to do is stick together and build our own institutions."

Q Where do you think they're going with all this?

A I don't know.

Q Mr. Wilkins, has your association officially expressed disapproval of the Muslims?

A Oh, yes. Years ago. Of course, ideologically, we would have to disagree with them on integration. We believe in integration; they believe in separation. Aside from that, we had to disassociate ourselves from a group that was anti-Semitic and antiwhite.

 Copyright © 1963, U. S. News & World Report, Inc.

Roy Wilkins joined the staff of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in 1931 and has been its executive secretary since 1955. Born in St. Louis, Mo., on Aug. 30, 1901, he grew up in St. Paul, Minn., then attended the University of Minnesota. From graduation in 1923 until joining the NAACP staff in 1931, Mr. Wilkins was managing editor of the "Call," a weekly newspaper for Negroes published in Kansas City, Mo.

—USN&WR Photo

Q Does the militancy of the Muslims compel the NAACP and other organizations for Negroes to be a little more militant?

A I don't think so. You see, the Muslims don't concern themselves with problems of the day. They don't fight in Greenwood, Miss., for example, to get Negroes to register and vote. They don't even register and vote in Harlem, where they are. They say they're through with white civilization. You don't hear of them carrying on any civil-rights program.

Q Why are Negroes so dissatisfied when the federal courts have consistently upheld their rights?

A I think much of their dissatisfaction goes back to that 1954 school decision—the Brown v. Board of Education case. I feel that the Negro had the right to conceive of that decision as getting rid of the doctrine of "separate but equal" facilities for Negroes. That's what the decision said. The Negro was prepared for reasonable progress toward implementing the decision, provided it began and was in good faith.

Q Hasn't that occurred?

A No. Instead of that, resistance broke out—extreme resistance. Now the Negro sees—nine years after the Court decision, come this May 17—still more than 2 million Negro youngsters in segregated schools and school districts, having to fight every step of the way, county by county and school district by school district. Even where there is integration, it's only token. So some Negroes are coming to say: "Why do you put so much stock in the courts? Who cares what the Supreme Court says, because it doesn't have any effect on me, anyway?"

DELAYS IN THE SOUTH—

Q Does your statement apply to cities such as Washington, D. C., or New York or Philadelphia?

A No. It applies to Virginia and similar States. Although Virginia is improving, it's still token. I'm talking about North Carolina and Florida, about South Carolina, which has only one student at Clemson, and about Georgia, which has a few in Georgia State, a few in Georgia Tech, one in Emory, two or three at the University of Georgia, and eight or nine kids in high school in Atlanta.

Louisiana has Negroes in Louisiana State University—one of the earliest to take them in, and they live in the dormitories there. Negroes are in several other State colleges and a few are in grade schools in New Orleans, and that ends integration in Louisiana.

Arkansas, if Governor Faubus had kept quiet, was going right along on its own. The State University there desegregated without a lawsuit. Fayetteville desegregated its high school in September, 1954, without a court order. But Arkansas, even so, has token integration.

West Texas and central Texas might be said to have token integration. East Texas has almost none.

So when we say token integration, that's what I'm talking about. I'm not talking of West Virginia, where all of the counties with biracial school districts now have integrated schools, nor of Missouri, which is 85 to 90 per cent integrated. Nor am I talking about Kentucky, where there is about 50 per cent integration in a slow, steady process.

Q In Washington, D. C., there has been full integration since 1954, but there seems to be voluntary segregation. Is that another problem as you see it?

A Yes. They speak of "resegregation." Well, you've had a large influx of Negroes into the capital, and now 53 per cent of the city's population is black.

Q And 84 per cent of the school population is Negro, because so many white families have moved to the suburbs—

A That's right. Yet, I believe it is true that more youngsters are getting a better education under the present system in Washington than did before the Supreme Court decision. It may be that some youngsters got a better education under the previous system than they would get under this system. But more kids are getting a better education now, because the lower and middle groups get better schools.

Q Did you expect progress on school integration in the South to be faster than it has been?

A I did indeed. I wasn't so naïve as to think the Court's decision would be self-enforcing. But I did believe that, with reasonable representations on the part of the Negro public as to what it wanted, and through conferences with school and public officials, plans would have been worked out for a steady implementation of the Court's ruling, even though at a relatively slow pace.

This has not happened. And this is the reason why some Negroes may lend an ear to appeals for less diplomacy and more action.

Q Won't the vote help Negroes to get more action?

A Most Negroes can't vote in the South. And voting takes a long time to change conditions, too, you know.

Q It has been suggested that the Negro would have made more progress faster if, instead of aiming at integration of schools, he had aimed first at gaining the vote. Do you think that idea has any validity?

A I have a standard answer to that—one which I think is very valid. That answer is: It doesn't really matter what

—USN&WR Photo

"The South is throwing away an opportunity. The Southern people should realize that the Negro is an asset and has value to them—that he's part and parcel of the South."

area the Negro selects for attack, that area becomes the area of great resistance. And the white Southerners say, "Why didn't you pick something else?"

Actually, the NAACP began its campaign against disfranchisement in its first Supreme Court case in 1917, challenging the "grandfather clause." On our third try in the highest court, the white primary was declared unconstitutional in 1944.

Personally, I think we did right in moving on schools. I think education is basic. One of the tragedies right now lies in the consequences of the deprivation of educational opportunities for the Negroes who grew up in the South and have now emigrated to the North. I see great tragedy and heartache for those now entering a space age when they don't even have the education for the automotive age.

But suppose we Negroes had said "No" to the idea of attacking school segregation first and had said, "We'll go for voting first." Then the Southerners would trot out all the old arguments: "Do you think we're going to have a Negro mayor, or chief of police? Why, you're crazy. You should pick out something else."

So, say we pick out housing. Then they say: "We aren't going to have Negroes living next door to us. They'll ruin property values." Actually, it must be said that there is more integration of housing in neighborhoods of some Southern cities than in the North. Whites and Negroes have been living side by side for years in such places as Charleston, S. C., or even Sumter, S. C., in the State where the Civil War began. But on Long Island, N. Y., it causes white folks to have the heebie jeebies when a Negro moves in next door.

All right, so you don't pick housing, but instead you pick fair-employment practices. Then you run into the argument that you are trying to coerce employers, telling them whom to hire.

So the answer is that no matter what right the Negro picks to demand, it is called the thing he should not have picked.

Q So what are the Negroes going to use to get action? The boycott?

A They've been using the boycott for some time. In the NAACP we call it selective buying. We have a campaign on now in Jackson, Miss., and we've run successful campaigns in Savannah, Ga., in Macon, Ga., Durham, N.C., St. Petersburg, Fla., and a variety of other places—some you never even hear about.

Q Have these boycotts proved effective?

A They've been very effective.

Q Will the use of boycotts spread?

A I think it is spreading.

Q How much economic power do Negroes have?

A Well, the Negro market has been estimated at about 15 billions a year—about as large as our Canadian market. This is not to be sneezed at.

Q Is this economic power growing?

A It's growing and will grow more if we can get more and better jobs for Negroes. But the Negro unemployment rate is now more than twice the rate among whites. It's about 14 per cent among Negroes and less than 6 per cent among whites. And automation is pushing the Negro out of more and more jobs.

The South abandoned its plantation economy, went either to mechanized farms or diversified farming, or went industrial. The Negro was kicked off the land.

So where does he go then? He goes to a Southern city. But he can't get a job there, first of all because he's black, but also because he has no skills. He doesn't know any job but farm work, you see. So he drifts north.

Q What happens when the Negro goes to a Northern city?

A Sometimes he gets a job and sometimes he doesn't.

Q When Negroes can't get jobs up North, why don't they go back to the South?

A I would say one third of those who have left the South would go back tomorrow if conditions in the South were changed. They would like it down there if things were different. They're like a lot of white people in the North who don't like cold winters.

I got a letter from a man who is a member of the NAACP in a town in Louisiana. He is an electrician. A few years ago he went to Seattle. His daughters were ready to go to high school and he wanted them to have a good education.

Incidentally, in the past, Negroes not only went north for jobs, but also to get a better education for their children. A lot of them will endure a lot of things for that. They are enduring reprisals today to desegregate their schools in their South.

But this man didn't like Seattle. It was too cold. So he finally decided to leave and go back to Louisiana. There he went to see his old banker. When he told the banker he didn't like it up North the banker was delighted and told him, "You can have anything now."

This man got a loan from the banker, went back into the electrical business again, and now he's very happy.

I think the South is throwing away an opportunity. The Southern people should realize that the Negro is an asset and has value to them—that he's part and parcel of the South.

But the South is losing the Negro. You meet Negroes in the North who are successes in business or in good jobs. Why shouldn't a Negro be as good a policeman in Augusta, Ga., as in Ohio? Or as good a cashier in Jacksonville, Fla., as in New York City?

EXPORTING RACE PROBLEMS—

Q But the South doesn't have all the race problems—

A No, it doesn't. The South has transplanted some of them—shoved them up North. It has become fashionable to say that this is no longer a Southern problem but a national problem. When the North points an accusing finger at the South, the South says back to the North: "Why don't you clean up your own back yard?" The North is no angel in this matter, but, in all fairness, it must be admitted that its back yard does contain many problems exported by the South.

. . . "I'm not anti-South. I'm just antidiscrimination"

Yet, in the North, there is a difference. It is still possible for a Negro in the North in many places to go to a desegregated school and get a good education. Even where Northern schools are segregated by residential patterns, it's often somewhat better than where schools are segregated by law.

The North, bad as it is, hypocritical as it is, still offers an improvement over the South.

No. I'm not anti-South. I'm just antidiscrimination.

I'll tell you, I think the South is more of a devil in this than appears on the surface. I'm not talking just about the outward treatment of the Negro. I'm talking about the lack of preparedness of Negroes who grew up in the South.

You see, most of the Negroes in the North are end products of the system in the South. For years, the South has cheated Negroes out of any kind of training for citizenship or any opportunity to advance their economic skills or their artisan skills. Now, you say, "These people are not good citizens." Why, they never had any opportunity!

NEGRO CRIME AND JUSTICE—

Q Does that account for the crime rate among Negroes?

A It accounts for a great many things.

Now, I don't want to use deprivation as a blanket excuse, because I think people ought to have some restraints on their conduct, regardless of how much they suffer. Whether they kick you around or not, you ought to learn good from bad.

But I do say that this kind of treatment has weakened those restraints among Negroes, and made it easy for them to defy convention, to rob, to steal. Even the Southern system of jurisprudence encouraged this because it said, in effect: "Negroes will steal. If they steal just a little, we won't punish them. If a Negro steals from another Negro, that's no crime. If he kills another Negro, why, that's just a misdemeanor. But, if he kills a white man, why, that means electrocution." Well, that type of justice doesn't breed respect for law.

—USN&WR Photo

IN WASHINGTON, even with "resegregation," Mr. Wilkins says Negro children benefit from integration of the schools.

Q Is that situation changing?

A I think it is. The Southern courts now are better. Some Southern judges are better. And there are more Negro lawyers.

Q Mr. Wilkins, what about Negro family life?

A I can see how some people would point a finger of scorn at some manifestations of Negro family life. But I think, by and large, they are not doing too badly. Personally, when I consider the terrible obstacles, I am proud of most of them.

Q Are they disciplining their children?

A I think they are disciplining their children, where they have a family life. But it's hard in those cases where there is no man in the family.

You see, Negro family life has been matriarchal from slavery days. This is a direct heritage of slavery—where there was no marriage, no family life, no holding of families together. And this had come down, you see, so that it has been the woman who ran the Negro family. And often it has been the woman who got employment. If a man couldn't get a job as a machinist, a woman could always get a job as a washwoman, a cook, or a domestic.

Q Doesn't the Negro father take much interest in his family life?

A He does if he is there. But so many Negro fathers are not at home. They drift off, or they are separated, or they are working in one place while the family lives in another.

This is a result of the system that makes it harder for a Negro to get a job. He often has to leave his family behind while he goes scouting around in some other town for a job. When he gets a job, he may send for his family, and settle down and rear his children. Or he may not. At least, it's harder for Negro men to keep their families together than it is for white men.

So, when you ask me about Negro family life, I have to tell you that, of course, there are a lot of Negro women on relief with illegitimate children, although they are not alone in this—white women also have such children. And there are a lot of juvenile delinquents.

But the vast, solid majority consists of fine Negro families —people who respect conventions, and who believe in rearing their children right and making sacrifices and working at whatever job they can get, buying homes, paying their debts, supporting churches. These are the backbone of the Negro community.

FEARS OF INTERMARRIAGE—

Q One thing that seems to disturb people is the idea that Negroes seek intermarriage with whites—

A I don't know what may happen in the distant future, but I am confident that the Negroes have no goal of intermarriage. If they had, they would have been rushing to marry whites in New York, in Illinois, in Michigan and in all the other States—about 35 in all—where intermarriage is not forbidden by law. But, instead, you have a very few, an infinitesimal number of intermarriages. I think that is the best answer to this question.

Furthermore—women being far more canny at this marriage business than men—white women are not going to marry men who, they've been told since childhood, are inferior, can't earn a good living. The woman naturally wants somebody who's going to have social standing, whom she can introduce to her friends with pride, and whom her family will accept.

Q What is the attitude of Negroes toward intermarriage?

A It disturbs some Negroes, too. I know of a Negro

—USN&WR Photo

"Negroes have been using the boycott for some time. We call it selective buying. The Negro market has been estimated at about 15 billions a year. This is not to be sneezed at."

mother who was greatly disturbed because her boy was going with a white girl. Finally, the two mothers got together and talked about it. And it wasn't a question of one feeling that her family was better than the other one. They just felt that, in the first place, the kids were too young to understand what they were up against. The colored mother was more disturbed than the white mother. The youngsters finally broke off.

Q Was this colored mother typical, would you say?

A I would say "Yes." You'll find some Negroes who consider it to be a great thing to be allied with a white family. But they are in the minority.

Q Is a white person who marries a Negro accepted in Negro circles?

A I'm afraid that I have to admit that such a white person has a tough time. However, the acceptance depends on the sophistication of the groups concerned. Sometimes there is no resentment. Even the Japanese and Korean brides brought back by Negro soldiers had a hard time in Negro neighborhoods, in Negro social circles—to say nothing of the white circles.

Q Why is that?

A Well, the only thing I can say is that Negroes are just as conservative as American white people.

And then there is this: Among Negro women there is great competition for a good Negro husband—a man who can give some promise of making his way in the world and winning some prestige. Negro women, as women all over the world, are looking for security and prestige in marriage. Potential husbands of this caliber are scarce. So, when a white girl comes along and takes one of those Negro men away, that's one possible husband gone. This is one reason why intermarriage meets some hostility in the Negro community.

Q There seems to be considerable interest in Africa among American Negroes. Do many American Negroes aspire to go to these new countries being formed in Africa?

A Some have gone over. Some of them have gone on a purely patriotic basis, because they wanted to go. Some of them have gone on the old American urge to make a fast buck. They've gone to East and West Africa and attempted to set up businesses. Others are teachers, or members of technical teams.

But there is a very great emotional interest in Africa on the part of American Negroes. They are very proud of the new African states. This is one of the things that contribute to Negroes' unrest and dissatisfaction in this country. They read about and see pictures of and meet Negro ambassadors, prime ministers and business leaders from other countries.

They see pictures of Negroes working in oil refineries in the Congo and doing technical work and being locomotive engineers. And they remember that there are very few Negroes in such jobs here. Why, you can't even find one Negro locomotive engineer in this country.

Q How about jobs in this country? Are Negroes making much progress toward getting better jobs?

A They are not getting enough better jobs.

Q Haven't Negroes made tremendous strides in the last 30 years?

A Oh, yes. But, you see, their progress has to be measured against the accelerated progress of white people. I think the Negro's median wage is now slightly less than 50 per cent of the white median wage, whereas it used to be down around a third. So, although the Negro has improved his wage earnings, he is still far behind. The white wage has gone so far ahead of his.

Negroes are largely concentrated in the unskilled categories, and those unskilled categories are the ones that have lost out to automation first, naturally.

Q Where is all this going to lead for the Negro?

A It leads to a big problem, and the NAACP plans a conference soon on unemployment problems.

Now, the Government has initiated a retraining program for workers. It's small, but it's an indication of where you can go. Yet, already, the Negroes have run into trouble on this retraining business.

Q How?

A They and the retraining program got caught in a hassle between two candidates for Congress from the same district in Mississippi. One of them had tentatively endorsed a retraining program and, as soon as the other one found out about it, he came out against it, saying his opponent wanted to train Negroes to take over white jobs. The Federal Government didn't want to get caught in this fight, so it dropped the plan.

HIRING NEGRO CLERKS—

Q Many large companies in the North tell us they have trouble getting clerical help, for example. Are Negro girls getting such jobs in the North?

A Yes, I think Negro girls are working in more and more of these offices. Here's an example: The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company had no Negroes employed in its New York office until New York State passed its fair-employment law in 1945. Then Metropolitan did what the South should do. It said, "Well, it's the law." And the company began hiring Negroes for clerical work. Now they have Negroes in supervisory jobs.

In the early days—the late '40s—some of Metropolitan's Negro girl employes joined a swimming club that had a contract to swim in a pool in a hotel. When the hotel tried to bar the Negroes, the Metropolitan said: "We have a contract to use this pool, and either these Negro girls swim or we sue." That settled it, right there. Now, if somebody in the South would do something like that—

What we need, gentlemen, is a few men in the South with some guts who would simply sit down around a table and say: "Now, look, this is what's got to be done and let's do it. Let's do it without a lawsuit, without Bobby Kennedy coming down here and beating us over the head, without the

. . . "Segregation conflict is not good for business"

NAACP driving us or the North pressuring us. We have said we'd do it if they didn't push us. So, let's do it."

Q What kind of men are you talking about—officials, Governors?

A I think the industrialists, the businessmen, the people who really run things. You will have to bring in the mayors and the Governors eventually, but these businessmen are the kind of people who decide things.

These are the kind of people who decided, for example, that in Little Rock they'd had enough. They were the ones who decided in Norfolk and Charlottesville, Va., that the schools were going to be desegregated. And it was these people in Tuscaloosa, Ala., who held a meeting and said, "If desegregation comes to Alabama, we're not going to have it like it was at Oxford."

Now, of course, there they face a formidable opponent in Alabama's Governor George Wallace. But at least they have made their wishes known in the business community, and my bet is that they are going to win. Segregation conflict is not good for business.

Q Do you see this kind of thing spreading in the South?

A No, I don't see it. But I wish for it. I think whatever solution is arrived at, in order to be effective it will have to have the approval of this kind of citizen.

NEGRO AIM: NO COLOR LINE—

Q What does the Negro regard as the solution? What does he really want?

A Generally, the Negro wants the color line wiped out, because it restricts his rights and opportunities. That's his general objective. And, to be effective, this has got to be on more than just a token basis.

Q Can Robert Kennedy bring integration to the South?

A He's trying like hell, following national policy.

Q How about President Kennedy?

A President Kennedy has a good attitude personally, and has made some little things pay big. For example: The morning after his inaugural parade he had the White House ring up the Coast Guard, and he asked why he didn't see any Negro faces in the Coast Guard contingent that marched in the parade. Now this was just a gesture, but it had the prestige of the White House behind it. This story has been told by Negroes from coast to coast, and the fact that not much has been done about real, solid problems is glossed over. "He has a good attitude," Negroes say. And I say it, too. He has a good attitude.

Q About a year ago in a public statement you said to the Kennedy Administration: "We've come to collect what you promised us in 1960." What do you feel they promised you? And have they fulfilled that promise by now?

A The 1960 platform was the best civil-rights platform ever adopted by the Democratic Party or any party, although the Republican platform came very close to it in 1960. Both of them were very good platforms. The Democrats promised to work for a Fair Employment Practices Act, to put the Civil Rights Commission on a permanent basis; they promised to use legislation, if necessary, to bring about school desegregation. They promised a number of other things.

The Kennedy Administration has worked hard on the voting problem—very hard. They filed almost 30 cases to protect the right to vote under the 1957 and 1960 civil-rights acts, which were passed under the Eisenhower Administration.

Bobby Kennedy has worked like a beaver on this voting. He also worked at those emergencies that developed—like the attacks on "Freedom Riders" in Alabama and Mississippi, and the attempt to bar a Negro from the University of Mississippi. He tried to move into that disgraceful situation in Prince Edward County, Va., where they have shut down their whole public-school system rather than educate Negroes on an integrated basis. It's really refreshing to see a man as high in Government as the Attorney General showing outrage at such things.

Finally, the Administration redeemed its pledge on housing after a fashion by issuing the housing order of last November 20. I say "after a fashion" because the order is so limited, so inadequate. But some of their pledges remain wholly unredeemed. The idea of a Fair Employment Practices Commission has gone by the board. If you reread the 1960 platform, you can pretty well check off what has been done and what has not.

—Black Star Photo

IN VOTING, Negroes "may shift a bit" from the Democrats to the Republicans. Says Mr. Wilkins: "It would be helpful."

Q Negroes in recent years have voted heavily Democratic. Are they likely to shift that political allegiance?

A They might. However, my meaning was exaggerated in the newspaper accounts of a speech I made here recently. I was quoted as saying that the Negro vote is likely to shift to Republican. I don't mean to predict a wholesale shift. I only used that as an illustration of one of several avenues that the Negro might choose to achieve his aims.

Q Why are Negroes mostly Democrats? Do they relate their troubles in the 1930s to the Republicans?

A Not only that. Since Franklin Roosevelt came in, in 1932, the Democrats have had a chance to consolidate their gains among Negroes. They have had all kinds of patronage and prestige jobs to give out on the national, State and local levels. Negroes have become integral parts of the Democratic city machines. You're not going to jar them loose from that very easily.

But it is conceivable that they may shift a bit, and I think it would be helpful. I'm not talking now as a Democrat or as a Republican, but purely as a civil-rights advocate. It doesn't

(continued)

INTERVIEW With Roy Wilkins, Head of the NAACP

—USN&WR Photo

"The American Negro, whatever else he is, is thoroughly American. He's under a lot of handicaps, but he believes in this country and he believes some way he'll make it."

help the Negroes' strategic position to have their voters 79 per cent in the camp of one political party.

Q Why?

A That party begins to take the Negroes and their desires for granted. And at the same time the Republicans say, "How can we expect to get them back?" But, if the Negroes were divided, say 55 per cent or so in one party, then there'd be something for the Democrats to try to hold and for the Republicans to scramble for.

Q How would Negroes react to Nelson Rockefeller as a presidential candidate?

A I would estimate that the Rockefeller name would be very persuasive with Negroes, just as it was in his first campaign for Governor of New York.

Q Why?

A Negroes remember a good many things about the Rockefellers: the Rockefeller Foundation's General Education Board; the Laura Spelman Rockefeller College for Negro girls in Atlanta, Ga.; the University of Chicago, which was practically built by Rockefeller money and which has had Negroes on the faculty for a long time, and has had some distinguished Negro graduates. And, don't forget, it was Standard Oil which opened its rest rooms to Negro travelers in the 1930s. By and large, Negroes tend to believe that a Rockefeller is something special. Yes, the Rockefeller name has some magic among Negroes. I wouldn't predict anything, of course. I'm like most people: I don't think anybody can beat Mr. Kennedy at this point. But, if you ask me, "Would the Rockefeller name have an influence among Negro voters?" my answer has to be "Yes."

Q What can the Republicans do to win back the Negro vote?

A Well, the Republicans are naïve if they believe that they can get back in one year the Negro votes that they threw away in 1932. They can get back some of them. Dwight D. Eisenhower got 17 per cent of the Negro vote in 1952 and 38 per cent in 1956. But the Republicans refused to go after the rest of the Negro vote. If they had, then Richard Nixon might have won in 1960. But the Republican Party leaders didn't work for the Negro vote. They have been very inept on this. They seemed to think the Negroes were "due" to come back to them—because of Abraham Lincoln, or something.

Q How does the NAACP stand in relation to Adam Clayton Powell, the Negro Congressman from Harlem?

A We've had a little exchange of views with Mr. Powell recently. He made some speeches suggesting that Negroes ought to consider boycotting the NAACP because we have white people in policy-making positions—specifically, because we have a white president. Well, Mr. Powell is just talking through his hat. He doesn't know enough about the NAACP and its inside workings to know who supports it and who runs it.

Q Does Representative Powell belong to the NAACP?

A He's a life member.

Q Is Mr. Powell slipping, politically?

A He's not slipping politically. At least, if he is, it is not discernible. You know, in his last election he didn't print a single campaign poster, make a speech or send out a piece of literature. Yet he got 40,000 more votes than his two opponents combined.

Q What is the basis of his political strength? Is it the church of which he is pastor?

A Well, the church is partly the base of it. But Harlem has become used to Adam Powell, and they like the way he talks. Negroes like a man who, as they say, "talks back to the white folks." You see, most Negroes are in no position to talk back to white folks, but Congressman Powell is and he does. That is the reason he's a hero up there in Harlem.

And he does things with a flair, too. He has a way about him. There's a New York newspaper that has just printed a series of articles about him. The first article dwelt upon his charm. Recently, at a Powell rally, one of my staff members sat near some women who kept saying: "Isn't he beautiful? Isn't he wonderful?" They didn't know whether he was talking in Swahili or English and didn't care—just how he looked. This series is very revealing. It helps you to understand why you can't unseat Adam Powell in Harlem. An attack from an outsider just enhances his standing in Harlem.

Q Some Negroes have complained that the NAACP is not tough enough. And yet, to some white Southerners, mentioning the NAACP is like waving a red flag. How do you account for that?

A I account for it by saying that we in the NAACP are the real radicals, the real tough guys, because we espouse the tough ideas—not the tough language. The idea of outlawing racial segregation, deeply imbedded as it had become, was the toughest idea since the drive to abolish slavery. It struck home. It was a root battle. It was ours and we brought it off. Only a truly radical crusade could have brought about the present upheaval and flux.

Q How do you regard CORE – the Congress of Racial Equality?

A I regard CORE as a sort of striking force—like General Patton's spearhead across Europe into the heart of Germany. But the white Southerners who regard the NAACP as most dangerous to their viewpoint are correct. And, if they ever get to believe that the NAACP is the kind of organization they can agree with, then we will have lost something, or they will have abandoned segregation and come over to our side.

HOW SOUTH IS CHANGING—

Q Mr. Wilkins, do you foresee any substantial changes in the South's attitude on Negroes?

A I do, and the changes are occurring. They are not very fast, but they are occurring. There are Southerners now who say that integration is going to happen and we ought to help it to happen "our way" rather than, as they say, the "Kennedy way" or the "NAACP way."

I think changes are taking place in the South, and I think the problem is going to be solved in the South. [END]

Current
April, 1963
R & R Rel.

MAN'S RELATIONS TO MAN

Throughout the world there are groups of people of uncertain or mixed racial background who are not accepted by the dominant race and refuse to identify themselves with the suppressed race. These racial hybrids, suffering social ostracism and worse, spend their entire lives in a desperate search for identity. Following are descriptions of the common misery of such people in two widely separated areas.

SOCIAL LIMBO IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. Berry, chairman of the department of sociology and anthropology at The Ohio State University, has written a book, Almost White, about the "marginal" people in the eastern United States.

Brewton Berry

"There are, throughout the eastern United States, thousands of people who point—sometimes with pride, but not always—to their Indian ancestry, but who are counted as Indians neither by the Bureau of the Census, nor by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, nor by the Public Health Service. For that matter, their claim is received with some skepticism and amusement even by their white and Negro neighbors. Nevertheless, the tradition of Indian ancestry has persisted among them these many years, their racial features lend a measure of credibility to their claim, and they are not to be dismissed lightly as impostors or dreamers.

"These folks, whether or not they are Indians, are indeed America's outcasts. They, more than any other class, might properly be called 'forgotten men.' They spend their lonely lives in a social limbo—not quite white, not quite Negro, not quite Indian. They are ignored, derided, rejected, tolerated."

These marginal people are by no means rare, although their plight is generally not known. Though they have no generic name, they are known by local labels wherever they are found. Thus Tennessee has its Melungeons, West Virginia its Guineas, and New York-New Jersey its Jackson Whites. Pennsylvania has its Keating Mountain Group and its Pools, Maryland its Wesorts, Georgia its Croatans, Florida its Dominickers, and Alabama its Creoles and Cajuns. Virginia, South Carolina, Louisiana, and New England all abound in similar groups. Their origins are clouded by all manner of exotic and sordid legends, but nobody really knows who they are or where they came from.

"All these have one thing in common, and it is not just the fact that their blood is mixed. Anthropologists have long insisted that there are no longer any pure races, if there ever were. All of us are mixed to some degree—English, French, German, or what not. Few American Negroes are of 'pure' stock; they are instead an amalgam of Negro, Indian, and white. Most of us, however, have the good fortune to be identified with, and accepted by, one of the major racial groups. Not so with these 'marginal' folk. They are neither fish nor fowl; neither white, nor black, nor red, nor brown. They are not quite anything entirely."

Their characteristics, as one might expect, do not lend themselves to generalizations. Hardly a statement can be made about them to which exceptions could not be found. Some have the reddish-brown skin and straight, black, coarse hair of the Indian, but some have unmistakable negroid traits, and many could with little difficulty be taken for white, especially away from home.

Most of them are quite poor—but some are well-to-do. Most of them are unskilled—but some are professionals. Most of them are uneducated—but some have college degrees.

Two generalizations, however, can be made with little qualification.

Don't call them Negroes

"First, they are determined not to be Negroes. This is more than a wish with them—it is an obsession—and always has been. They vehemently deny that they have any strain of Negro ancestry (though they often suspect, and say, that certain others in their group have been touched with the tar brush). They are bitter in their prejudice against Negroes, and will disown one of their number who takes up with them. The stranger among them who inadvertently implies, by word or gesture, that they are Negroes or mulattoes runs the risk of bodily harm.

" 'Tell you the truth, Mr. Berry,' said one old fellow . . . , 'we don't know what the hell we is. Some folks say we is Indians. Well, maybe so and maybe not. My old man used to say we was part Cherokee and part Irish. I dunno. But we know we ain't niggers. We know that!' And he made the point emphatic by pounding his right fist into the palm of his left hand."

Second, they detest the epithets others have applied to them. Each locality has its own pet name, and never is it complimentary—nor meant to be. Names such as Brass Ankle, Red Bone, Red Leg, Buckhead, and some fifty others cut them to the quick. Especially infuriating are those names which explicitly identify them with Negroes. Thus, the Jackson Whites loathe the term "Blue-eyed Negroes." Others, such as "Red Niggers," or "Cane River Mulattoes," have similar impacts on other groups. I will from now on refer to all the groups by the generic term "mestizos."

What the whites think

The attitudes of the whites toward the mestizos are mixed and often contradictory. "There is no consensus as to what such people are like. Whites are not agreed, after all these years, whether mestizos are clean or dirty, honest or treacherous, intelligent or stupid. . . . The white man's contacts with the mestizos are brief, rare, and superficial. The mestizo is seldom the topic of conversation. He is never the subject of talks at Rotary, Kiwanis, book clubs, or missionary societies. He is rarely mentioned in the newspapers, and schoolbooks omit all reference to him.

"He has received honest treatment in such novels as Po' Buckra and Red Bone Woman; but I found these books in not a single library in those regions where mestizos live, and none of my informants had ever read or heard of them. In short, the attitude of whites toward mestizos is a jumble of ignorance, indifference, prejudice, suspicion, pity, fear, bewilderment, and above all, contradiction.

"One common and familiar thread, however, runs through all these varied and conflicting attitudes—the conviction that, whatever the mestizo's character, it is the result of the blood, or the mixture of bloods, that flows in his veins. Mestizos, it was repeatedly explained to me, are lazy because of their Negro blood, deceitful because of the Indian, and for whatever virtue there is in them, they can thank their philandering white procreators. . . .

"The Negro's image of the mestizo is more accurate than the white man's. It shows greater insight into the nature of his problem, and deeper understanding of his frustrations, hopes, and tribulations. Moreover, there is often a suggestion of charity and tolerance . . . all too rare among whites.

"This is not to say that Negroes hold mestizos in high esteem, or look up to them even slightly. Sometimes their comments are as caustic as those of any white bigot. . . . More often, however, there is absent from the Negro's disparaging opinions that element of arrogance which whites commonly display. . . .

"An aged Negro man, smoking a pipe as he sat on the porch of his cabin, appeared to have all the time in the world, and I decided, therefore, to stop and have a chat with him. . . . When I thought the subject could be properly introduced, I said, 'Back up the road a piece I saw some people that looked like Indians to me. You have any Indians around here?'

" 'Naw suh, them's what you call Brass Ankle.'

" 'Brass Ankle?' I replied, as though I'd never heard the term. 'What's that?'

" 'Dat,' he said, nodding his head ruefully, 'dat am de worse mess we got in dis country.'

" 'How so?'

" 'Brass Ankle,' he explained, 'is people what is all mix up. De blood is all mix up.'

" 'What kind of folks are they?' I asked.

" 'Oh, dey is no 'count, dey is triflin'. . . . Ah tell you, boss, where you can always find Brass Ankle. You just look fo' de po' lan'—lan wid little scrub oak on it, 'bout dis high. Dat's where you find de Brass Ankle livin'.'

" 'Why do they live on such poor land?' I asked, innocently.

" 'It's like dis,' he went on. 'Dey is lazy people, and po' lan' don't take as much work out o' a man as good lan' do.'. . .

What the Negroes think

"Many Negro informants, even those who have been the butt of mestizos' snubs, express feelings of pity for them. Typical of such opinions was that of the uneducated Negro preacher, who, at the end of a lengthy but perceptive discourse on the subject, said: 'I feel sorry for those people. They don't know where they belong. Now take me, for instance, I know what I am. Ain't no doubt about me. I know how to act. But those Red Legs, they don't know where they belong. Now when I rides on a bus, I know to wait 'till the white folks get on—the white ladies first, then the white men. Then we niggers get on and push right through the white folks sittin' and standin' in the front of the bus. That don't make sense. What they ought to do is to make the niggers get on first and go to the back of the bus. But that's the way they want it, and that's the way it is. But those Red Legs, they don't know when they supposed to get on, and they don't know where to sit. That's how they are all the time, and I feels sorry for 'em.'

"That was Uncle Tom speaking. An hour later I sat in the office of the leader of the local branch of the NAACP. He was light enough to pass easily as white. As a matter of fact, he did just that whenever it suited his purpose to do so. He had done much to improve the Negro's lot. He had written letters of protest to the newspapers, had marched in picket lines, had put pressure on politicians, had prevailed upon employers to open new jobs to Negroes, had fought against discrimination on many fronts. Naturally, we discussed the local mestizos, who had but recently gathered for their annual, well publicized 'powwow,' and who were striving to get the community to accept them as Indians.

" 'They think they can solve their problem with feathers. . . . They ought to forget all that foolishness and join with us. We could do more for them than anybody else.'

"He is probably right. If the mestizos would only cast their lot with the Negroes and their militant organizations, they could enter more remunerative lines of employment, improve their opportunities for education, break through the barriers that isolate them, avail themselves of numerous public services, increase their political power, gain greater mobility, and free themselves from the ambiguous social status that dwarfs and circumscribes their whole existence.

"The price? They have only to say, 'We are Negroes.' But that price, as the mestizos see it, is more than they are willing to pay."

Near the top of the social ladder

The result of all these interacting attitudes is social ambiguity for the mestizos. The social control that derives from racial etiquette leaves the mestizos nowhere. In one community, I observed racial etiquette in action. "Little clusters of Negroes stood on the sidewalk, talking and laughing, or sprawled under the oak trees near the railroad tracks. The mestizos paid them no attention. At the same time, they were cordial to their white acquaintances, who, I observed, either called them by their Christian names or addressed them as 'Mr.' or 'Mrs.' In the stores they were accorded courteous treatment, whereas Negroes would hardly expect to be waited on while white customers were standing around. I saw mestizos enter the barber shop and take their turn in the chair. No Negro would have dared to enter. They stepped up to the town's lone soda fountain, and stood there as they sipped their cokes or licked their ice cream cones. Negroes were served there, too, provided they stood at the end of the counter, and stepped outside to enjoy their refreshment.

"At two o'clock the movie opened its doors. Negroes bought their popcorn along with the others, but they purchased their tickets and entered the theater by the side door, and sat in the balcony. Whites and mestizos entered by the front door, and sat downstairs.

"Mestizos, in this community, certainly seemed to enjoy the privileged status of whites. But everybody, I am convinced, draws the color line somewhere. I discussed the local situation with several of the old-timers. . . .

"Well, we have a swimming hole down on the river that most of the young people around here use in summer. Of course, no Negroes go there; they have another place down the river a piece. The Croatans go to the white place, but not at the same time. If some white children went out there to go swimming and found some Croatans swimming there, they would either go away or wait until the Croatans came out. They don't object to swimming in the same place, but not at the same time.'

" 'Is there no other type of discrimination against them here?'

" 'Come to think of it, I never heard of any Croatan being a member of the Masons. I don't think any of them could get into the Masonic Lodge.'

At the bottom of the social ladder

"The following Saturday found me in another Carolina town just fifty miles from the one just described. There were Negroes in droves, milling around, smiling, joking, talking. A Brass Ankle drove up in his old Ford, took out a string of fish, and sold it to a Negro; but the transaction was strictly business. None of the small talk that usually obtains between buyer and seller. A Negro took out his guitar and began strumming a tune. Whites and Negroes gathered around, obviously enjoying the performance. A few Brass Ankles stood and listened, but apart from the others, their faces inexpressive. Mestizos do not stroll leisurely around the streets; they walk fast, looking straight ahead. They dart into the stores, make their purchases, and dart out again. They try not to see the 'White Only' sign in the window of the café and the barber shop, for they know that, in this community, it means 'No Brass Ankles.' "

In this town, mestizos did not go to the movies as whites. They were not allowed downstairs, but had to sit upstairs with the Negroes. The balcony was itself divided, one half for Negroes, the other for mestizos. This tri-partite pattern of segregation is not uncommon. In one town I saw three separate drinking fountains, and six separate toilet facilities.

"These two communities represent the extremes. The others fall somewhere in between. But, to confound the confusion, not only does the etiquette vary from town to town, it varies also from one individual to another. Those who regard the mestizo as 'nothing but a mulatto trying to get out of his place' will treat him as though he were a Negro; while those who regard him as white, or mostly white, or as part Indian, will adjust the etiquette to fit the definition. The poor mestizo, accordingly, never knows quite where he stands. Every personal contact with one he does not know becomes something of an adventure."

Many mestizos, if they can, try to be white. Many try desperately to be Indian. "Most of them would doubtless prefer to be whites. But, since that goal is beyond their reach, they will settle for Indian. It is better to be red than black." (Almost White)

Business – Next Target for Integration?

By JOHN PERRY

JOHN PERRY is a member of the management consulting firm of Pritchard, Schaffer & Woodyatt. In 19 years as an industrial executive and consultant, he has worked in a variety of industries in both the North and the South.

REPRINTED FROM HARVARD BUSINESS REVIEW
MARCH–APRIL 1963

Harvard Business Review

MARCH/APRIL 1963

VOL. 41, NO. 2

Edward C. Bursk: EDITOR

JOHN F. CHAPMAN, Associate Editor
VIRGINIA B. FALES, Managing Editor
DAVID W. EWING, Assistant Editor
JOHN FIELDEN, Assistant Editor
STEPHEN A. GREYSER, Assistant Editor
T. K. WORTHINGTON, Business Manager
ERNEST D. FRAWLEY, Circulation Director
AGNES M. JORDAN, Circulation Manager
RAY RING, Consulting Artist

Editorial, Business, Circulation Offices
Soldiers Field, Boston 63, Massachusetts
KIrkland 7-9800

Annual index is published in the November-December issue. Contents are indexed in the Business Periodicals Index and Bulletin of the Public Affairs Information Service.

BUSINESS REVIEW BOARD

GEORGE P. BAKER, DEAN, Ex Officio
ROBERT W. AUSTIN, Chairman
JAMES R. BRIGHT
EDWARD C. BURSK
PAUL W. CHERINGTON
E. RAYMOND COREY
GORDON DONALDSON
BERTRAND FOX
STEPHEN H. FULLER
RALPH W. HIDY
WINFIELD G. KNOPF
E. ROBERT LIVERNASH
HOWARD RAIFFA
THOMAS C. RAYMOND
RICHARD F. VANCIL
LEWIS B. WARD

HARVARD BUSINESS REVIEW

March–April 1963, Vol. 41, No. 2.
Published bimonthly by the Graduate School of Business Administration, Harvard University. Printed in U.S.A.

Second-class postage paid at Boston, Mass., and at additional mailing offices.

Subscriptions $10.00 a year in U.S.A. and Canada.

© 1963 by the President and Fellows of Harvard College.

6 ARE SBICs DOING THEIR JOB?
Samuel L. Hayes and Donald H. Woods

20 DIVERGENT VIEWS ON PRICING POLICY
William H. Peterson

53 FINANCING OVERSEAS EXPANSION
John G. McLean

66 PROFIT-PLANNING ACCOUNTING FOR SMALL FIRMS
John Dearden

77 CHAMPIONS FOR RADICAL NEW INVENTIONS
Donald A. Schon

87 'SOURCING' ABROAD FOR DOMESTIC PROFIT
Dennis J. O'Connell and John J. Benson

95 HOW TO CONSPIRE TO FIX PRICES
John Q. Lawyer

104 BUSINESS—NEXT TARGET FOR INTEGRATION?
John Perry

116 THE CORPORATE PROFIT EQUATION
Richard E. Speagle and Hugh R. Chace

128 EXPLORING THE EXPLORATORY SAMPLE
Raymond A. Bauer

132 CLUES FOR ACTION FROM SHOPPER PREFERENCES
Stuart U. Rich and Bernard Portis

150 MINORITY OWNERS CAN AVOID SQUEEZE-OUTS
F. Hodge O'Neal

Additional Copies Available from

SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL, INC.
5 Forsyth Street, N. W.
Atlanta 3, Georgia

Until now business has been left pretty much alone, and for the most part management has followed a do-nothing policy; but forces are gathering which may well develop into active conflict.

BUSINESS– Next Target for Integration?

By John Perry

Will CORE, the NAACP, and other antisegregation groups make American industry their next major target?

Management is worried:

"I wonder why they've waited so long," a corporation president confessed. "We're vulnerable. Take my company. We have no official policy against hiring Negroes. But, the fact is, we don't have one on the payroll!"

His general counsel had warned him that the company was in obvious violation of both government contract provisions and state equal-opportunities laws. Its union contract, too, pledged nondiscrimination.

"Personnel told me that three Negroes came in last week, looking for work," the president continued. "We have men on layoff, so we weren't hiring. But Personnel thinks it may have been a test case. We hadn't had a Negro applicant for over a year. Now, three at once. Made us wonder who sent them."

"What are your plans?" I asked.

"That's the damnedest thing!" he exclaimed. "I don't know what to do. Sure, open up, hire strictly on ability! We'll have to do it. But as a rule we just don't have Negro applicants. And Personnel tells me we'll stir up a hornet's nest in the plant if we hire Negroes. We talked with a couple of union officers and they just shrugged it off; said it was our problem, not theirs."

The Gathering Storm

Will industry be next? The American Negro's struggle for a place in the sun has been fought on a widening front since World War II. The mood and temper are well expressed by James M. Nabrit, Jr., president of Howard University:

"We are sick of evasions, weary of excuses, fed up with promises and want action now, liberty now, equality now."

Action there has been, at a quickening pace. Racial bars have been broken in schools, colleges, restaurants, theaters, hotels, swimming pools, parks, playgrounds, hospitals, blood banks, department stores, public housing, the armed forces, public conveyances, YMCAs, Scout troops, professional and amateur sports, fraternities, private clubs. Not everywhere, not all at once; but the trend is massive.

Influential Negro leaders make it plain that gradualism is not enough, even if it be called "progress." Indeed, leaders who planned the strategy of progress are being shoved aside by others who want no compromises. Some white liberals have been hurt and confused at being told that the kind of help they provided for so long is now called "go-slowism." Many Negroes favor all-Negro leadership for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), which were interracial when founded.

The new forces are confident, determined, and militant, and they are rapidly abandoning lawsuits as their chief tactic. Direct action is replacing it: sit-ins, kneel-ins, wade-ins, boycotts, demonstrations, picket lines.

So, will industry be next? The Negro has been at a tremendous disadvantage in the job market. Economic equality is a principal goal.

Surely there will be a maximum effort to redress the balance. Will American industry have its Little Rock and its Oxford?

I do not think so. But this is not because the demand for equal opportunity will be tempered. On the contrary, it seems certain that Negroes and their allies will make job equality an immediate goal, and be prepared for confrontation on any scale. The difference between Little Rock and business, however, is that industry leaders are not massing for the defense. Whatever their private prejudices may be, they will not commit their corporations to them. For business, equal opportunity is not a fighting issue.

Nor is this a new position. Racial discrimination in industry has been a product of nonpolicy rather than policy. True, some national corporations have formalized it: "Let local customs prevail." But in most cases the pattern has simply evolved, growing out of customs, habits, and tacit understandings.

Inevitable Change

Letting sleeping dogs lie was a comfortable and noncontroversial policy for business while community customs remained static or changed slowly. Industry's problem now is that community customs are changing fast. Unfortunately, these changes do not flow easily and automatically through factory gates. Inside the plant, yesterday's customs have become structures, often frozen into seniority rules and job assignments, and closely linked to status and job security.

But more and more executives are feeling squeezed between the pressures for change from without and the structured customs within their organizations. At least half convinced that the change must come, they are understandably reluctant to take action which might make racial conflict a disturbing issue within their organizations.

At the same time, a growing number of companies — including some of the largest corporations — have, instead of yielding to pressures, seized the initiative. Evidence of this initiative is the work of the National Urban League, an interracial organization seeking to end segregation and discrimination.

Among the members of the National Urban League's Commerce and Industry Council are the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, General Electric Company, General Foods Corporation, General Motors Corporation, International Harvester Company, International Business Machines Corporation, Western Electric Company, Incorporated, American Machine & Foundry Company, Radio Corporation of America, St. Regis Paper Company, Schenley Industries, Inc., Union Carbide Corporation, Westinghouse Electric Corporation, Pitney-Bowes, Inc., Bristol-Myers Company, Campbell Soup Company, General Cable Corporation, Hanes Hosiery Mills Co., Budd Company, and others. Corporate membership on the council signifies that each company is helping to finance the organization's work. It also signifies that each member company has taken at least the first steps toward hiring and promoting without regard to race. And key officials of these companies are, on behalf of the League, opening friendly and helpful conversations with leaders of other companies that have yet to make a serious beginning.

Patterns of Discrimination

What are companies like these really trying to overcome? What are the causes of job discrimination, anyway? The answers are not as simple as some think. An incident from my experience helps make this clear:

> For a time I was involved in the management of a southern manufacturing plant. Our contract with the United Automobile Workers of America included the standard nondiscrimination clause. Its seniority provisions were such that new employees were first assigned to foundry labor.
>
> Negro and white laborers worked together in the foundry. State law required that there be separate washrooms and drinking fountains, but foundry labor is hot, heavy, and dirty, and men who drank quarts of water daily sought it at whatever fountain was nearest. At noon, when the weather was good, Negro and white workers ate together on the grassy bank outside.
>
> The Negroes did feel free to go after one kind of better-paying work. They bid up to the top foundry jobs: push-up, shake-out, and pour-off. The highest-paid hourly worker in the plant was our Negro cupola tender. Factors of skill, hazard, and physical effort gave this job top rating, and the Negro operator earned an hour of overtime pay every morning.
>
> But outside of foundry work no Negro ever bid on a job. We had no Negro press operators, no Negro welders, no Negroes on assembly or painting or die-setting. The bids were open and posted, and many Negroes had enough seniority and ability to have bid successfully. No member of management discouraged Negroes from bidding, and I doubt that any union leaders did so.

Had I wanted to change this pattern, how would I have done so? We hired without discrimination. We promoted those who bid on the jobs. Yet all but one department was "lily white."

What if a Negro had bid into another department? I think we would have followed the contract, but with some apprehension. Would he be heckled, threatened, sabotaged? Would we have a wildcat strike or a slowdown? When two Negro employees of an outside contractor used the assembly washroom, the line was stopped for an hour in protest.

This case is typical only in that it illustrates some of the bewildering array of customs, situations, and practices lumped together as "discrimination." Here are other contradictions:

◖ One company I know of employs a preponderance of Negroes, about two-thirds of its total manning; but the Negroes are rigidly confined to certain categories.

◖ Another company employs only a few Negroes, but they seem to have been hired and promoted without regard to race; in fact, one of them heads a predominantly white department.

◖ In a South Carolina plant, the standard crew for a certain machine line is a white woman and a Negro man. Any white man in the plant would refuse transfer to the job now held by Negroes. But, in a plant not far away, identical machines have all-white crews, and it would cause a storm if Negroes were assigned.

◖ A New Jersey company has a number of Negro scientists and engineers in its employ, several Negro typists, and a Negro bookkeeper; but no Negroes are on the hourly payroll.

◖ In several plants I have visited, Negroes are hired and promoted freely in all the production classifications, but none are in the skilled-trades progressions.

Unchanging Status

There are some well-established patterns, of course, and they can be summed up by saying that Negroes are at the bottom of the heap — except where that unenviable position is held by Mexicans, Puerto Ricans, or Asiatics. (In one small eastern town, the descendants of a native Indian tribe sometimes seek to elevate their status by passing as Negroes.) In general, Negroes find it harder to get jobs; they are more likely to be in hot, heavy, dirty, and menial jobs; they are in the lowest wage categories.

But is this the true face of racial discrimination? The same generalizations were true for the Irish, the Italians, the Poles, and other groups, following each great wave of immigration. But many of their children and most of their grandchildren were educated side by side with other citizens, entered the job market on equal terms, and moved up wherever their drive and ability took them. Obviously there has been something different about the Negro's situation, about his cultural segregation in the community. A third-generation Pole might speak with a New England twang. An Adamowski could become an Adams. But the Negro's most conspicuous characteristic will not change; he cannot change his color.

So, in the community, racial segregation has been an absolute, a yes/no matter. It takes only one black face to break the color line in a school or a restaurant, at least symbolically. James Meredith is the smallest possible minority at the University of Mississippi, but no one has doubted the meaning of his presence there.

It is not that simple in industry, and the manager who contemplates the need to change may well ask himself, "Change what?" If his company is reasonably large, the chances are that some Negroes are on the payroll now. Segregated washrooms are side issues, not useful indexes. Equal pay for equal work is the general practice in manufacturing industry; discrimination on this score survives only in scattered and backward enclaves.

Indeed, he will find no single yes/no issue as the determinant, no single policy or practice which sustains or abolishes discrimination. The wisest thing he can do to make sense out of the problem is to put aside the slogan words of "segregation" and "integration," and to substitute instead the subtler and more meaningful concept of place.

"OK in Their Place"

Every Negro knows what place means. Place is where he is accepted, where white people think he belongs. A Negro is more than accepted in his place; he is often welcomed, warmly regarded, respected, admired. Especially in the South, place involves far more than where a Negro lives or what job he holds. It includes nuances of behavior and demeanor which neither white nor black could codify but which both fully understand.

Place is an elusive thing. A northern housewife would be shocked if a servant, white or black, addressed her with the easy familiarity commonly enjoyed by the southern Negro housekeeper. Yet in parts of the South, the white man who sees a Negro look him in the eye as they pass on the street reads this as a message of challenge, of defiance, and brands the black man as "uppity" and potentially dangerous.

Geographical Concept

Place is precisely what a local group thinks it is — no more, no less. It can differ from area to area, community to community, factory to factory, and department to department. It has no standard form or boundaries, but — in any given locale — place is categorical, exact, and tacitly understood by all. The Negroes in our foundry were in their place, including the top-pay cupola tender. The Negroes teamed with white women in the South Carolina plant were in their place; yet in the plant nearby a Negro assigned to this same job would have been conspicuously out of place.

Place describes, if it does not explain, the bewildering variety of discriminations in the community at large. Thus:

¶ In one southern department store Negroes were welcomed as customers but out of place as clerks. In another store they were in place as clerks but not as customers.

¶ In a southern city the most fashionable barber shop was owned and operated by Negroes. This would have been unthinkable in another city not far away.

¶ In a small Tennessee town, I followed two white men into a small cafe, sat near them on one side of the horseshoe-shaped counter. The counterman was a Negro and, I soon learned, the owner. Negro customers entered and sat on the other side. Gradually the place filled. I soon saw that the racial barrier was invisibly drawn between two seats at the counter's end. Negro and white sat side by side there and pleasantries were exchanged across the horseshoe. But any latecomer would stand, waiting for a seat on his side.

¶ In parts of the South, at least, a Negro physician is not out of place treating white patients. I spent an evening with a Negro doctor who practices in Fairfax County, Virginia. Almost half of his regular patients are white, he told me. "People from the North who came down to work for the government?" I asked, naively. He shook his head. "Indeed not," he said; "in fact, when I've been called out on night emergencies by strangers, people who got my name out of the Classified, the only times I've been turned away have been by people from the North."

Dick Gregory, the Negro comedian who has made a career of poking fun at the contradiction of place, has quipped, "In the South, they don't care how close we are if we don't get too big. In the North, they don't care how big we are if we don't get too close!"

North or South, place is what the manager must deal with if he decides it is time for a change.

The Company's Role

Is it time for a change? If so, what can be done about place? It would be difficult to find any large employer, North or South, who has successfully and completely eliminated the restrictive aspects of place. Even in those companies that are determined and courageous in their efforts to be equal-opportunity employers, vestiges of discrimination persist — largely as a result of place considerations.

But only a few companies have gone all-out to erase the barriers. Conversely, only a few remain "lily white." An executive can get a rough reading on his company's situation by taking a walk through the offices, laboratories, and plant. He will probably see conspicuous evidence that Negroes are, for one reason or another, limited in number and occupations.

Until recently, this kind of evidence exposed the company to little, if any, risk of legal action. The machinery of law enforcement was usually actuated only by complaints, and investigation limited to the allegations of the individual complainant. With employers being free to select new employees in any way they please, which includes hunch and whim, it is seldom possible to prove racial discrimination in any given case.

The Law's Role

Today the law enforcement agencies are taking more initiative and broadening the scope of their investigations. They are now likely to look at the results of hiring practices, not just the practices themselves. They are beginning to consider discrimination in promotions, not just in hiring. Yet, on the record to date, it can be said that the risk of prosecution, conviction, and penalty is small. A determined segregationist, willing to fight his case up through the courts, could expect to maintain his position for a long time, perhaps indefinitely.

The vast majority of managers, however, want no part of such a struggle. They are well aware that even an accusation is damaging, because such accusations are often well publicized. Recently, for example, a number of New Jersey employers and their employment agencies were publicly charged with using a secret code to identify the jobs for which Negro applicants would be considered. The charges against most of them were subsequently dropped, but in public relations terms the damage had been done.

The integrationists have sought and obtained stronger federal laws. They will continue to work for equal-opportunities laws in states that have not as yet adopted them. They will, when it seems strategically advantageous, file charges and complaints, and press them. But, for the most part, these are tactical maneuvers. They expect to win by pressure and persuasion, not court decrees. Here is one possible method:

> The manager of a company which employs a significant number of people in a metropolitan area can safely assume that his company's hiring practices have been considered by desegregationist groups. If he has not heard from them already, he surely will. How the approach is made depends on which group takes the initiative first.
>
> The approach may be a telephone call from a business friend, an officer of another company; and the manager may be surprised to learn that his friend is identified with the National Urban League. The call may suggest a three-way conference: the two executives and a member of the League's staff, who is likely to be a Negro with a graduate degree in industrial relations.
>
> The first conference will be exploratory. They will discuss the company's practices and problems, review what's going on in other companies, explain the League's role, and offer to help the manager change the practices of his own company. The combination of pressure and persuasion is approximate to what one would expect if the subject were a contribution to a local charity.

The New Approach

But there is a new tone and temper in the Negro community, and other groups impatient with the Urban League's pragmatic methods are emerging. They want action now, and their methods are vigorous and public.

Avoiding Conflict

What might they do? Some answers to this question are in the daily headlines. Companies have been singled out for attack, and most have given ground. But few managers have other than academic interest in knowing what strategies might be used against them, or what the costs might be. It is enough for them to know that the attack might come, and that it would be pressed with vigor and determination.

This is not a contest in which they choose to engage. What they want is a way of avoiding the conflict altogether, of being responsive to the times. Most of the managers I have talked with say — and, I believe, honestly — that neither principle nor prejudice holds them back from providing equal opportunity. But they are deterred from affirmative action by real concern lest this disrupt their organizations.

What are the risks of initiating change? How much conflict and commotion may be precipitated if Negroes move into jobs heretofore considered out of place for them? There is little to go on, because so few managements have risked discovering how much of the threatened reaction was substance, how much shadow. No one likes to thrust an arm in a lion's mouth.

It would be well first to consider what the organized opposition might be — specifically the attitude of labor unions. In some situations, at least, organized labor appears to be a vigorous defender of racial discrimination.

The Unions' Stand

In certain of the craft unions, especially in the building trades, the racial barriers are out in the open for everyone to see. Some unions are strictly white; others are Jim Crow, confining Negroes to separate locals, where they may have no voice in union policies and may get only the leftover jobs.

The history of craft unions illuminates what is going on today. Since the days of the guilds, craftsmen have attempted to buttress their economic position by restricting intake to their crafts. At times their rules were designed to exclude immigrants. At times only members' sons could be apprenticed. Some unions set enormous initiation fees to limit intake. Those that exclude Negroes today do so, not because they are Negroes, but because they are competitors. Racial prejudice is a convenient rationalization, not a cause.

Few of the unions that represent the bulk of organized industrial employees practice racial segregation officially. Indeed, most of their charters declare a quite opposite position. Recent targets of the NAACP have been international unions that publicly denounce discrimination. The NAACP attacks, not their international policies, but their practices, especially the conduct of certain locals.

A case in which I was briefly involved suggests what the NAACP has in mind:

This concerned a factory in southwestern Illinois which had a contract with the United Steelworkers of America, a union which, nationally, stands four-square against any form of discrimination. On its face, the union contract seemed to reflect this policy. It contained the standard nondiscrimination clause. But there was a certain peculiarity about the seniority arrangements of the contract. They puzzled me because they ran counter to what unions usually demand; but the minutes of the bargaining sessions showed the union negotiators had insisted on these with considerable passion.

The Steelworkers' international representative finally took pity on me and explained. The odd clauses had been ingeniously fashioned to confine Negro employees to certain departments and occupations. "I wish I'd been able to get some signals across the table during the negotiations," he confessed. "I did everything I could to stop it, and I lost. Then I hoped management would take a stand. It was just one faction in the local, but they had the whip hand."

This man, like many international union representatives, had an assignment that is largely political. A union local enjoys considerable autonomy. In theory, the international has both governing policies and disciplinary powers. But, against these, a rebellious local has a potent threat: disaffiliation.

Thus, where racial discrimination is practiced within a plant, management and union are often equally guilty, and for the same reason: both of them have hesitated to tangle with what appears to be deep-seated prejudice among hourly employees.

Outflanking Prejudice

What happens when a company shows enough courage to attack these deep-rooted racial prejudices among its employees? Do unrest and discontent necessarily follow? It all depends on how intelligently the company has gone about its attempts at change. Let me offer an example:

Mrs. Evelyn M. Hairston is a chief inspector, or foreman, for 11 machines manned by white and Negro workers in a large tobacco factory. The factory is in North Carolina. Mrs. Hairston is a Negro. In the crew she supervises whites outnumber Negroes by more than two to one. Four other Negroes are supervisors on her shift.

A visit to this plant would astonish many northern executives who think of the South in stereotypes. There is little visible evidence of restrictive place. Negro and white workers are a random mix. Whites supervise Negroes, and Negroes supervise whites.

State law requires that there be separate washrooms, but there is no segregation in the company's cafeteria. There is some sorting-out at the cafeteria tables, but it is a social rather than a racial pattern; no eyebrows are raised when Negro and white individuals choose to sit together.

How did this pattern, which would be unusual in a northern setting, come about in the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company factory in the South? First, the company was committed firmly to a policy of equal opportunity. Next, Winston-Salem is noted for good race relations; schools and other public places desegregated without incident. Finally, the Whitaker Park plant is new. Thus, place had no prior structure. Within this plant, place was made from the beginning, starting with a clean slate.

Starting Fresh

Recently I was asked by some corporation executives what racial policies could and should be followed in manning a factory they were about to build in a border state. Corporate policy, as stated to me, was "equal opportunity, to the extent that this doesn't get us in trouble locally."

Ten years ago this area was rigidly segregated. Now, I learned, racial barriers are gone or rapidly vanishing in the schools and most public places. The community pool has been integrated; the chief lifeguard is a Negro. The new public hospital is unsegregated. A small but increasing number of white students now attend what once had been an all-Negro state college. Not everyone likes the changes, to be sure. I talked with prominent citizens who made no effort to conceal their distaste. But they join with other white spokesmen and Negro leaders in a clear consensus: a new company, just starting up, can set almost any pattern it chooses. Several warn that it would be more difficult to change the pattern later.

In this case, as well as that of the Reynolds company, it is significant that the community environment was not hostile to an integrated business in its midst. For a northern firm to "invade" a deep-South town with such a proposition would not be quite so easy and might be impossible. But "might" is the proper word. If the northern managers made integrated operations a condition, and stuck to it; if the community needed the industry badly enough; if the "invaders," though firm, were willing to discuss how it could be done — out of this could emerge at least a more liberal restructuring of place. Several companies that determined to make the change and went about it skillfully are now operating racially integrated plants in Georgia, Texas, and other southern states.[1]

An Inside Job

No company is likely to tear down a plant and build anew just to have this opportunity to restructure relationships. But if a new plant can move toward equal opportunity with considerable freedom, while an established plant in the same community seems tied to the past, one useful fact is demonstrated: the problem of change is primarily internal.

In some cases, management is challenged to find ways of updating internal patterns which have lagged behind community changes. But the examples suggest that management is not limited to conforming. It can, if it so chooses, move ahead of local customs. Two experiences that I have had in performing reconnaissance work for a new plant location are worth recounting:

¶ First, I talked with a number of people in the community about the current racial practices of the county's largest industry. Most white business leaders said this company practiced "token integration," hiring a few Negroes to avoid trouble on government contracts. But, to my surprise, even the most militant Negro leaders praised this company for its open-door policies!

I went back to one Negro leader and demanded an explanation. The county's population was divided about equally between Negro and white. The company in question employed about 50 Negroes in a total manning of about 1,000. Why did he consider this a case of equal opportunity?

"They hire on the basis of ability," he told me. "This has been a rural area. There aren't many Negroes with the skills they need. Our young men need training. We want equal opportunity, not favoritism."

¶ Two days later I sat on the front porch of a small house ten miles away and talked with a machinist, a tobacco-chewing oldster wearing suspenders over a ragged undershirt. . . . Would he be interested in working in the new factory? He sure would! How would he feel about working side by side with Negroes? He looked at me sharply and spat tobacco juice.

"You mean Negroes or niggers?" he demanded.

"What's the difference?"

"If you mean niggers like we got in the shacks over there, you couldn't pay me to. But if you mean a Negro, somebody who does my work as well as I do, hell! he's folks!"

Here we see one of the reasons why, in the past, racial barriers in industry were, to some degree, natural boundaries. Industry necessarily discriminates on the basis of ability. Formerly, this alone would have left most Negroes outside the gates or in the lowest-paid jobs. Until the separate-but-equal strategy developed as a defense against school integration, few Negroes could get a decent education, and even fewer were prepared for jobs in industry. Southern Negro educators have told me that their vocational courses were limited to farming and service trades.

Tarnished Hopes

This is why World War II was such a significant turning point. War plants grabbed for whatever labor was to be had, regardless of age, sex, or race, and regardless of skill. Negro women with little education were taught complex bombsight assembly, and Negro men were given hurry-up courses in welding, machine shop operations, and other skills. When the war ended, Negro veterans entered the job market with new skills developed in the armed forces. And, under the G.I. Bill of Rights, thousands of Negro youths entered colleges and universities, graduating with degrees in medicine, engineering, chemistry, physics, biology, law, and business administration.

Some of the skilled and educated Negroes found jobs at the levels for which they were qualified. Many did not. Graduate engineers became janitors and laborers. Graduates in business administration often found it difficult to get work even as clerks. From this large group of vocationally frustrated people has arisen a great deal of the insistent drive for equality of opportunity.

[1] For other examples of industry leadership, see Helen Hill Miller, "Private Business & Public Education in the South," HBR July–August 1960, p. 75.

Here is a clue to the dynamics of change, furnished by my friend, the tobacco-chewing machinist. Discrimination has a cultural base. Immigrants who came to America from the cultural equivalents of southern Negro farming communities were treated in much the same way as Negroes who migrate northward from the rural South. The children of the European immigrants, however, could go to school with other citizens. Until recently, most Negro children could not. Now this is changing, and with it is coming a profound, though slow, change of attitudes. It's hard to hate a man whose background is the same as yours.

Initiating Change

Few industrial managers have to be hit over the head before they know what's going on. It is part of their managerial skill to anticipate, to sense which way the wind is blowing, to respond to trends in marketing or technology or economics almost before they happen. In my opinion neither legal threats nor fear of publicity is causing so many managers to take a fresh look at the hiring and promotion of Negro workers. Rather, it is their close observation of today's social scene.

The manager has become accustomed to seeing well-dressed Negroes in good restaurants, on planes and trains, in church, in hotel lobbies, at United Fund meetings, on television, at his university club. Only a few years ago, if he met a Negro at some civic or political meeting, he understood that the man was there because he was a Negro; he was a kind of exhibit. Today it is much more likely that the Negro is there because of his position or profession. It makes a difference that everyone feels.

The manager is aware that companies other than his are changing. He sees it happening. He reads about it. It is talked about, usually off the record and informally, at business gatherings. So, in due course, questions are shaped in his mind: "How can we keep in step? How can we change, without making a big deal of it? Can we do it without a lot of uproar?"

There is some advice I can give to managers who ask these questions. But I must issue the obvious warning that this kind of change is not achieved by any "how to do it" formula. Place has many meanings; discrimination takes many forms; no two communities or groups are quite alike. Sometimes change is best achieved by a bold, deliberate act of management, a careful assessment of the situation followed by a determination to see it through. Sometimes it is best to take it a step at a time, choosing the points for change with considerable care.

But there are enough integrated plants, North and South, to demonstrate that the goal is not unrealistic or unattainable. And there are more than enough instances of management-initiated change to demonstrate that such changes are feasible, that they can be brought about without short-term or long-term penalties.

Let us take up some of the problems that occur in the hiring and training of Negro hourly workers, professionals, office workers, supervisors, and managers.

In the Personnel Office

It takes more than a quiet word to the personnel director to change what happens at the point of hiring. The reputation of every significant company is well known in the Negro community. If the company has hired no Negroes, or very few, then few will apply. No one likes to invite rejection. Employment agencies know company reputations, too. Though companies and agencies alike are bound by law in some states not to discriminate, agencies hesitate to send Negroes where they will not be welcome. Even the official agencies often refrain from sending applicants on futile quests.

If nothing had happened before, the essence of fairness might be recruiting efforts that give no heed to race. But, realistically, a company must make a point of recruiting Negroes to redress past imbalances. This is not difficult. Any good personnel man does his recruiting where the people he wants can be found. Calls can be sent to schools and institutes where Negroes are trained, to agencies where they apply for work, and to neighborhoods where they live. A number of companies have initiated change by hiring Negroes for their personnel offices.

With the flow of applicants stimulated, the next problem is selection. It may seem that the essence of equality is applying the same criteria to white and Negro applicants. As some Negroes see it, this is anything but fair. Thus:

"We hear too much of that!" a Negro militant told me angrily — " 'Be like us and we'll let you in.' Equal opportunity — on the white man's ground, measured by his standards. Act like a white man; dress like a white man; talk like a white man; think like a white man. That's not the kind of equality we want!"

On its face, this is an extreme position, and most of the equal-opportunity advocates would consider it a tremendous step forward if Negro and white job applicants were selected by the same standards. But there are two special aspects of the militant's complaint that deserve consideration by a manager who wants to make an affirmative effort:

(1) There are subjective factors that influence selection, and a personnel man may find it difficult, at first, to set aside conscious or unconscious prejudice. Company policy is one thing; when responsibility for its practice depends on him, the personnel man may be overzealous in screening Negro applicants.

(2) White applicants are often judged by their work histories and craft training. A Negro with equivalent skills is likely to have acquired them in different ways, and in settings with which the personnel man is not familiar. One way to adjust the balance is to base selection more on job tests — the direct measurement of skills — rather than on background evidence.

In situations where Negroes have not been hired before, management may be tempted to experiment: hire one or two and see what happens. How will the white employees feel about it? If the goal is successful desegregation, one cannot ignore the parallel question: How will the Negro feel about it? How would a white worker feel if thrust into an all-Negro factory, alone? More than once, the subject of such an experiment has simply quit.

Often the best time to change is when a new department is opened, a new line installed, or a new shift added. It is likely to go more easily if a group of Negroes are included in a batch of new hires, rather than hiring one today, another next month. A new and rigid example of place would be instituted if a new machine were manned by an all-Negro crew. On the other hand, if several Negroes are hired, the group situation is likely to be better if they are associated in mixed work groups, rather than scattered in individual isolation.

Many companies have found it strategic to break the ice by hiring college-trained Negro personnel men. No doubt one reason is the input of special knowledge and perspective to the personnel staff. But even more important is the clear signal this gives to both employees and applicants. The job-seeker, Negro or white, gets the message at once. For instance:

A Louisville company hired two Negro interviewers and stationed them behind the long counter where applicants were received. Management expected that Negro applicants would prefer to be interviewed by Negroes, white applicants by whites. But applicants read the message differently, and approached whichever interviewer was free.

Hiring Professionals

In many large companies, the color line was first broken by the hiring of Negro scientists and engineers. More than 20 years ago a Negro chemist became research director of a large midwestern company. In the professional categories, desegregation seems to have been no problem where it has been undertaken. Among the 20 largest corporations I happen to know about, there are none without some Negro professionals at work, and promotion on the basis of ability seems not to be an issue.

Nearly all of the Negro professionals I have met in these settings are graduates of nonsegregated universities. Their professional integration predates their hiring by industry. They were educated with the same people they now work beside. The relationship has simply extended into a new environment. In a sense, industry did not desegregate here. It simply appropriated a desegregated pattern which began in the classroom.

No doubt the shortage of engineers contributed to the rapid disappearance of racial barriers in professional categories. It may also be a reason why recruiters for a number of large corporations have added the top-ranking Negro colleges and universities to the list of campuses they visit. (As a sidenote, some of them have been surprised to find that many of these "Negro colleges" are no longer all-Negro. The proportion of white students has increased year by year. In at least one case, they have become a majority!)

Hiring Office Workers

In a border-state high school I saw 11 Negro girls in a typing class of 33. Any local employer who chose to do so could "appropriate" this established group relationship for his own office. But male personnel people are often jittery about any move that might upset the office girls. Status patterns develop in an office in bizarre and puzzling ways. Sometimes, though, these patterns are clear and blunt: on a washroom door in an Ohio plant, I saw a hand-lettered sign, OFFICE GIRLS ONLY. The factory girls came from the same backgrounds as the clerks and typists, some from the same families. They were the better paid, but it was the office girls who wore the fancy dresses to work.

When I was a government official some years ago, I had occasion to interview several girls, including one Negro, for a clerical job. At the end of the day my secretary, a young lady from Alabama, told me firmly that, if I hired the Negro, she could not work in the same room with her. Politely, I told her my intention was to hire the best qualified of the applicants: the Negro. If, in view of her feelings, she chose to resign, I would accept her resignation with regret. But, if she remained and refused to work with the new girl, she'd be fired. Three weeks later I saw them lunching together in the cafeteria.

One large company hired two Negro male accountants. In time, one was promoted and became the supervisor of several white keypunch operators. A few weeks later a personnel man talked with each of these girls. Admitting that the appointment had been a shock at first, each said this had not lasted. The new supervisor was capable, a good instructor, courteous, and fair. The interviewer reported two impressions he gathered from the interviews. First, the girls recognized that the supervisor was better educated than they. Secondly, he was a man, and women in industry are as keenly aware of their second-class status as are Negroes!

In achieving office desegregation, this suggests, there is considerable weight to both the male and the managerial prerogatives!

Training & Promotion

What can be done in plants where Negroes are already employed but seem to be confined by place to certain departments or categories? What if, despite open job bidding, the Negroes simply don't bid up?

In a New Jersey plant, I made a quick comparison of the original job applications of Negro and white workers. On the average, the Negroes had much less formal education. Several were marginal illiterates. In hiring, management had set lower standards for Negroes than for whites! The personnel man admitted this was so. White workers were expected to move up the ladder; Negroes were not. This may not be a common pattern, but it is well to check it out.

Management's Role

Many managements have adopted a defensive posture in the face of seniority-ability clauses in union contracts, feeling they have lost the right to choose men for promotion. No doubt this is often true, though current practices are frequently much more restrictive than contract language; and management, in many cases, has lost ground by not devising and using objective standards of ability. But, aside from this, there are two prerogatives usually open to management. One is to train workers. The other, perhaps too seldom exercised, is to encourage individual employees to develop their skills and to bid up.

Management has retained substantially more control over entrance to skilled-trade progressions. Few plants today have formal apprenticeships. Men bid in at the helper level and, thereafter, get most of their training informally, on the job.

These observations are no more than clues, not suggested lines of action. If restrictive place seems frozen into the plant structure, it would certainly be well to discover how and why. If management seeks change, this is the time to consider where initiative could be strategically applied. Expectation has much to do with the answer. If a qualified man, Negro or white, enters a training-progression system, it is a normal expectation that he will move up. Expectation enters into hiring and selection, and into placement, as well.

As Supervisors

What happens when a Negro is named foreman over a group of hourly workers? In such plants as the R. J. Reynolds operation, desegregation has encompassed this relationship without incident. But, obviously, this depends on the setting in which such a change occurs, and on the individual so named.

Most foremen occupy a nebulous position, neither part of the hourly group nor wholly part of management. In most industries, it is becoming rare for an hourly man to move all the way up into management. Foremanship is often the boundary. In some plants, foreman jobs go begging; no one seems to want the added responsibility, and the loss of the protection of the union contract, in exchange for a small boost in pay (in some cases, an actual cut) and whatever status the position carries.

In unionized plants, a clue may be offered by what happens inside the union. Hourly men with leadership qualities often turn to union office if they feel the road to management is closed. Many Negroes hold union offices as stewards, vice presidents, local presidents, and international representatives. Where Negroes play genuine leadership roles within the union, it is a fair assumption that a capable Negro foreman could hold his own.

But in a plant where Negroes are employed only as hourly workers, not in white-collar jobs, management might question the role into which a Negro foreman would be forced by circumstance. His position would be difficult indeed.

Then, too, in some plants, new engineers are often assigned as foremen as part of their development. What happens if a Negro engineer is so assigned? If rigid segregation patterns still exist in the hourly group, his position would be precarious. Would he supervise an all-white crew, or a crew whose Negro members were confined to laborer status? On the other hand, if the hourly group is well integrated, the engineer's status should give him a chance to test his ability.

In the final analysis, the development of the Negro supervisor will usually be contingent on how far desegregation has progressed in both the hourly and the salaried groups.

As Managers

Scattered through American industry are a few Negroes who have reached top-management status: vice presidents, department heads, regional managers, and so on. But there is no insistent demand by desegregationists for change at the top. Their prime concern is entrance jobs. This most definitely includes entrance jobs for Negro college graduates.

The Negro engineer and scientist have done reasonably well. Negro teachers are in demand. But the Negro liberal arts graduate has had hard going. Many a man who has been graduated with honors from a top-flight northern university has vainly searched for the kind of opening his classmates readily found.

Now a considerable number of large corporations are enrolling Negro trainees in their management-development programs. The trend is significant because of its future implications; trainees are expected to move up into positions of progressively greater responsibility. A few companies have boldly experimented in what might seem to be the most sensitve area of all, adding Negroes to their field sales organizations — and not for the sole purpose of calling on Negro customers either. One such salesman has made a fine record calling on industrial accounts in Texas.

A Philadelphia employment agency, interracial in its management and clientele, reports that the demand for qualified Negro executives, salesmen, and technical personnel exceeds the supply. Recently they have filled — or attempted to fill — requests from chemical, oil, aircraft, automobile, and business machine companies.

But while desegregationists are concerned with opening opportunities in management for college-trained Negroes, this is but a small part of the total problem with which they deal. Though the gains in recent years have been dramatic, the average Negro is still educationally handicapped. Economic pressures alone are responsible for many dropouts.

Thus, where Negroes have been added to the management rosters of large companies, as trainees or in higher posts, something more has happened than a lowering of the bars, a willingness to select applicants on ability alone. In most cases these companies have actively recruited Negroes. One top executive told me:

> "As we see it, management sets the tone for the whole company. If we mean what we say about equal opportunity — and we do — this is the way to show it, not to outsiders but to everyone on the payroll. It says loud and clear: this is the kind of company you work for."

Conclusion

It has not been my purpose here to advocate change, to argue for equal opportunity in moral, ethical, economic, or political terms. I realize that the road to equality is long and that the difficulties and obstacles of passage are real. In saying that any company is likely to become a target for militant desegregationists, I have done no more than capsule what anyone can see, read, and judge for himself.

When I characterize certain desegregationist forces as "militant" and perhaps imply that groups such as the National Urban League are "moderate," I do not mean to suggest that, so far as industrial employment is concerned, they differ in their objectives or in their determination. It is more a matter of method and role.

The "militants" demand. They publicize. And they are resourceful in applying pressure at vulnerable points. In more than one case they have persuaded a company's management that it is time for a change. But the question "how" is left unanswered, and a hasty, unplanned change can fail disastrously. The successful changes have been planned and managed. The managers approaching such change have, in many cases, perhaps most, taken counsel with others who have experience to draw upon, directly, through the industrial members of the National Urban League, or in other ways.

And successful, peaceful change is, in the future as in the past, most likely to stem from a recognition by management of the distinction between place and prejudice. A quick dramatic change can hardly be effected in people's prejudices. But much can be, and has been, done in changing place, and in making the Negro's place in industrial jobs the same as that enjoyed by the white worker of equal ability.

---

THE Negro leader, the Negro social scientist, the Negro man of art and letters is disposed to view all social, economic, political, indeed, even aesthetic and philosophical issues from the Negro angle. What is more, he is expected to do so. He would seem entirely out of place if he spoke simply as a member of a community, a citizen of America or as a man of the world. In the existing American civilization he can grow to a degree of distinction, but always as a representative of 'his people', not as an ordinary American or an individual in humanity. He might protest; if he does it for the proper audience and in the proper forms, he is allowed to protest: but he protests as a Negro. He can criticize, but only as a Negro defending Negro interests. This is the social role awarded him, and he cannot step out of it. He is defined as a 'race man' regardless of the role he might wish to choose for himself. He cannot publicly argue about collective bargaining generally in America, the need of a national budgetary reform, monetary schemes for world organization, moral philosophies and aesthetic principles. . . . The Negro leader, sensing that his own people need him and conscious that his racial origin offers him an easy opportunity for a role in life, thus acquires his characteristic direction. Even women in modern times do not have their souls so pressed into one single narrow furrow of human interests by the tyrannic expectancy of society, although the women's lot in this, as in many other respects, offers the nearest analogy. The Negro genius is imprisoned in the Negro problem. There is throughout the entire history of the United States no single example of an exception to this rule important enough to be cited.

The difference in this respect between the Negro and other 'racial' minorities — the Jews, for example — is notable. The difference is not explainable simply in terms of differences in natural and cultural abilities between the two groups. A Jewish economist is not expected to be a specialist on Jewish labour. A Jewish sociologist is not assumed to confine himself always to studying the Ghetto. A Jewish singer is not doomed eternally to perform Jewish folk songs. A Jew is not out of place either as a governor of a state or as a planner of world reconstruction. The Jew is discriminated against in America, but there is a quantitative difference between this and the discrimination against the Negro which is so great that it becomes qualitative. On the intellectual level, which we are now discussing, the fettering of the Negro spirit within the Negro problem is not accomplished so much by simple discrimination as by the prejudice inherent even in the most friendly but restrictive expectancy, including the expectancy of the Negro people.

Gunnar Myrdal, Value in Social Theory, edited by Paul Streeten
New York, Harper & Brothers, 1958, pp. 91–93.

Reprints of Harvard Business Review articles are available at the following prices:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Single reprint | $ 1.00 | Additional 100's up to 1,000, each | $ 20.00 |
| Two reprints | 1.30 | | |
| Three reprints | 1.50 | First 1,000 | 215.00 |
| Four to 99, each | 0.40 | Additional 100's over 1,000, each | 15.00 |
| First 100 | 39.70 | | |

Harvard Business Review
SOLDIERS FIELD, BOSTON 63, MASSACHUSETTS

Commentary April, 1963

R & R Rel

Jx I

L.W.D. ✓
P.A. ✓
M.L. ✓
S.B. ✓

LETTERS FROM READERS

"MY NEGRO PROBLEM"—I

To the Editor of Commentary:

"My Negro Problem—And Ours" [Feb.] is important, at times profound, and above all, honest. The level of dialogue on the racial and other important social and political issues cannot, at this particular time in American history, be determined by the anticipation of angry protests or intense disagreements. Those who dare to think and feel deeply about social problems are obligated to organize their thoughts as coherently as they can and communicate them with candor. It is my opinion that Mr. Podhoretz's article is an eloquent example of the fact that the true intellectual has no choice. . . .

It happens that I agree with most of what Mr. Podhoretz says. But I do not share completely his belief that the racial problem in America, or anywhere else, can be solved by miscegenation or intermarriage. The fact is, there has been and will be an undetermined amount of miscegenation, and this has not softened the problem. And of course there is a distinction between miscegenation and intermarriage. The type of miscegenation which has occurred in America has reflected an important aspect of the total pattern of racial injustice; namely, the desire of white men to exploit Negro women sexually as part of a system in which they exploit Negro men economically and politically. While white Americans have not invented this system wherein higher status individuals seek to maintain a system in which they have priority socially, sexually, and economically, they certainly have reinforced this pattern in race relations. This is precisely the distinction between miscegenation and intermarriage. Intermarriage takes place in a situation of equal status—miscegenation involves sexual exploitation of individuals of unequal status. It would follow, therefore, that if one had widespread intermarriage, this would be indicative of the absence of the problem with which we are concerned—widespread miscegenation, without intermarriage would be a symptom of the intensification of the problem. . . .

Without the type of honest and courageous communication represented by James Baldwin's article and Mr. Podhoretz's we are all doomed to that stagnation of self-delusion which is tantamount to intellectual, moral, and probably literal death.

Kenneth B. Clark
Department of Psychology
The City College
New York City

To the Editor of Commentary:

Reading Norman Podhoretz's candid article, I reflected on the nearly infinite variety of settings in which young people grow up and go to school in this country. Are there boys who grow up in America without ever having a fight—or ever realizing that they are afraid of fights? (What girls encounter is different again and little is said about it in most accounts we have.) To illustrate: my own childhood was quite unlike Mr. Podhoretz's; when he was fighting his way home, fending off Negro boys who perhaps resented the fact that he and others like him had organized homes, I was being taken by a governess to Rittenhouse Square, geographically not far from the Negro South Side of Philadelphia, or attending country day schools, or the downtown William Penn Charter School. Like Podhoretz I feared and admired the graceful athletes in school, but all of them were white and some of them aristocratic. Indeed, what for Mr. Podhoretz and many others were issues on the margins of race were for me in my childhood issues on the margins of social class. I learned to fear tough whites, not only as a child but later—the slowly-hardening gaze of the drunk who concludes that I feel superior to him and proceeds to want to beat me up. I have never thought of America as a peace-loving democracy.

Our personal experiences are, as it were, replaced by categories of social visibility; and the very emphasis Mr. Podhoretz puts on physical grace is a benign side of the emphasis our society puts on appearance—not only color but height, good looks, shape, and outward marks of breeding. Mr. Podhoretz's experiences as a child could easily have been forced, as he suggests, to flow into the general pattern of anti-Negro feeling in our society. Indeed the problem of all candor, in this field as in many others, is the multiplicity of unintended audiences: most importantly, of course, the white racists who wait to pounce on every scrap of evidence of Negro indolence and violence and disorganization to support their preconceptions; but also the Negro racists for whom it is more convenient that all whites "are sick in their feelings about Negroes" because then one can never be disappointed or gulled or robbed of one's well-justified hatred. (There are many Jews who feel this way about Germans, and some about all non-Jews.) Those whose experiences do not fit them for the prevailing preconceptions can often acquire a false childhood, a false memory, shaped to the present prejudices of their sub-group.

There is even a certain amount of distortion in James Baldwin's magnetic New Yorker essay. Baldwin modestly attributes to his being a Negro miseries that were his as a special kind of Negro (among other things, a preacher's son), in Harlem but not of it. But his situation seems to me to be far more difficult than that of Norman Podhoretz (as I'm sure the latter would grant also), for he had opposition rather than support to fall back upon at home and was working toward a personal future in which only he believed and to which virtually nothing in his Negro environment gave the slightest support but only mockery and despair.

For me and for other fortunately situated whites, "the racial nightmare" was not central in our childhood and has become central through intellectual understanding rather than through projecting onto Negroes resentment for the inhibitions and overprotectiveness that were the other side of our advantages. . . .

I mention all this, as I have said, to illustrate the great diversity of childhood in America about which we know so little, and to warn against the dangers of overgeneralization to which we can be tempted by the very concreteness of Mr. Baldwin's and Mr. Podhoretz's accounts. For example, though I think I have a pretty keen sense of Negro hatred of whites, I am not wholly persuaded by Mr. Baldwin that all Negroes hate whites in spite of the fact that virtually all have good reasons for doing so, as well as—until very recently—good reasons for pretending not to. Let us then speak for ourselves as Mr. Podhoretz has done, and in doing so speak in some tentative measure for others also, but always with awareness of the vastness of the country. Naturally, each of us is apt to think that his problem is the problem by which our society, plainly so threatened by its inner psychic and social strains, will live or die. The Negro problem, or more properly the white problem, is so central that it seems altogether likely that, could the racial nightmare be ended, we would "achieve our country, and change the history of the world." However, although violence is endemic to America and indifferently distributed and directed in different sections and strata, so that there are more suicides per capita in Vermont and fewer homicides than in Mississippi, the danger that these tensions, barely contained within, will be directed outward against the ever available and often provoking Communists is grave. But I am not certain that, to be safe (and safe therefore to experience the terrible and living horrors with which Mr. Baldwin confronts us all) from this, we must first be pure on the race front. The two struggles—for a more orderly and pacific world and for a less fratricidal and more loving society—are linked but not identical. As Mr. Podhoretz says at the end, we can learn to behave better than we feel, better than we in some childish sense "are," and I see both the vanity and the opportunity of all our problems as subordinate to the question of maintaining a reasonably intact world.

DAVID RIESMAN

Harvard University
Cambridge, Massachusetts

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

In the guise of the "good liberal" he purports to be Norman Podhoretz has written nothing short of a racist article. . . .

Mr. Podhoretz is as incapable of mitigating his hate as the most die-hard Southerner: "The hatred I still feel for Negroes . . ." While holding fast to his stereotype of the Negro and regarding them en masse as tough, erotic, truant, graceful animals, his animadversions are on a par with those of the most rabid anti-Semite. This breed regards the Jew as vulgar, offensive, sharp, and bargaining.

Mr. Podhoretz is seemingly concerned about the solution to the Negro problem. But, in these crucial times, when children as innocent and guileless as his very own, are prohibited from attending classes because they are black, he abets the stereotyped image of the Negro. By rationalizing the adult feelings that grew out of his ghetto childhood, Mr. Podhoretz reinforces the white man's negative image of the Negro.

When Mr. Podhoretz was a child, he spoke as a child, he understood as a child, and he thought as a child. Now that he is a man, he should put away childish things.

MARVLOUS ELAINE HARRISON
New York City

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

In "My Negro Problem—And Ours" does Norman Podhoretz offer us anything more than another version of the "waiting-for-a change-in-the-hearts-of-men" ideology refurbished for middle-class liberal consumption? . . .

The middle-class liberal is acutely aware of his "twisted feelings"—especially when Negroes attempt to move into his neighborhood, but he is also aware that trying to slow the pace of desegregation by talking of the necessity of "waiting for a change in the hearts of men" has a decidely illiberal sound. Mr. Podhoretz's analysis of the problem saves the day for him. By advocating miscegenation he retains his liberal status and needn't feel uneasy about his personal resistance to desegregation since it won't solve the "real" problem, anyway. Nor will he have to face Mr. Podhoretz's moment of truth: By concentrating on his own soul he will help to keep the present structure of Negro-white relations intact, and therefore his daughters will have little or no opportunities for even defining a Negro as a possible husband.

One may agree with Mr. Podhoretz that the nub of the "Negro problem" is that "special feeling about color" that all white Americans acquire regardless of personal history. But this "special feeling" is the result of institutionalized segregation, and the current efforts at desegregation aim at subverting this pattern. To the extent that these efforts are successful they will allow the formation of more human patterns of relationships which, hopefully, will lead to higher and higher rates of intermarriage, and this, in turn, will quicken the erosion of the "special feeling about color." The possibility of "blood running in the streets" is an inherent risk of the program of desegregation that must be faced and dealt with; attempting to avoid that problem by visualizing a "huge social transformation" through an individual cure of souls means that in the next generation another James Baldwin will have to preach to us again with even less cause for believing that anyone is listening.

MURRAY HAUSKNECHT
Long Island City, New York

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

"My Negro Problem—And Ours" is, I think, a unique work. . . . In his brave decision to remember honestly, Mr. Podhoretz has given us something of genuine importance, of disturbing originality.

ELIZABETH HARDWICK
New York City

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

It is perhaps too easy to praise another man's courage; on the race question, and in politics generally, such praise has too often been the shortest route to evasion. But Norman Podhoretz's courage in writing and publishing "My Negro Problem—And Ours" must be praised and supported. The moral clarity of this astonishing essay is of that rare kind that really does represent an entirely new beginning for all future discussion of the Negro problem, at least so far as white liberals are concerned. Everyone knows—and has always known—that the problem of racial integration is inseparable from the issue of miscegenation and that all talk of integration that stops short of facing the "brutal" issue in its largest social and biological consequences is dishonest rhetoric designed to save the remnants of the very assumptions it pretends to attack. In this matter the most reactionary Southerners have often been more honest—closer to the truth, anyway—than enlightened liberal opinion that tacitly preserves the separate-but-equal ideal when it comes to the sexual mingling of the races while promoting integration in schools, busses, and other social facilities. Mr. Podhoretz's candid essay tears the mask off this duplicitous thinking in a way nothing else in recent literature has. It places the issue of miscegenation—as a socially desirable solution rather than as what it has been in the past: a despised private option—firmly in the foreground of all future discussion, which is where it belongs. His essay thus provides the white liberal with the one thing he has always lacked in dealing with the Negro problem: a position, anchored in the most difficult reality, from which he can hope to build a believable future. The polite fiddle-faddle has been removed at last, and we can begin now to see where we are and toward what we are moving. The pain that many enlightened people must have felt on reading this essay was the pain of confronting a truth too long ignored.

HILTON KRAMER

New York City

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

It is probably perfectly valid to write about Negro-white tension in America without setting oneself the task of finding causes or solutions, to offer one's own experiences as perhaps at least interesting, even to take the long tragic view and assert that there is no solution, as Norman Podhoretz does. If he had done only that his essay would be sometimes moving, sometimes embarrassing, but mainly unexceptionable. Unfortunately, he does not limit himself to that. He goes on, almost in spite of himself, to look for reasons while holding that reasons no longer matter—the problem of hate just is. He wonders plaintively why the Negroes in his neighborhood should have hated the Italian and Jewish immigrants who had no share in Negro enslavement, as though the Negroes there were in any position to make such nice distinctions and to hate selectively. He sees himself as a liberal and he knows his liberalism has not saved him from hate. Then by the easy and familiar inductive leap he holds all liberals guilty of as compromised an attitude as his, thereby absolving himself of responsibility. He feels in any case that the problem has been forced on him—by Negroes as well as white people—and begs off finally by ascribing an almost occult power to color as the ultimate cause of race hate.

Podhoretz is so infatuated with the word "hate," he so nearly revels in its use, that it becomes finally an excuse for his failure to come to a comprehension, if not resolution, of his Negro problem. He so frightens (and comforts) himself with the word that he abandons the intellect: learned, rational understanding, which he asserts he has, is no good because the hate (for many people more likely "discomfort") persists. In a kind of reverse utopianism he despairs of solution or even progress where there is "hatred" or "envy" or "rejection." Yet James Baldwin, whom Podhoretz quotes for some reason or other in his puzzled and inconclusive paragraph on Black Muslimism, has said (in a recent number of The Progressive) that it is impertinent for white people to think they must learn to accept the Negro. If Podhoretz were less carried away by his "hate" he would be less willing to abandon reason and political process as means toward the solution of our Negro problem.

But Podhoretz cannot refrain from solving it after all: the way for a problem to be solved is for the problem no longer to exist. After raising the spectre of bloodshed because the Negro wants equality now, after sneering at the white "liberal's" gradualism, he bravely asks for eventual total assimilation. He says whimperingly to the Negro, you make me uncomfortable, you make me feel inadequate, you worry me because you are different—so please stop being different. This is the same old story of asking the Negro to do it all. This is asking the Negro, who has been thwarted and denied in every endeavor because he is a Negro, to give over the drive to succeed, to count, while at the same time remaining a Negro. Podhoretz can understand why Jews want to survive: they are tied to a memory of past glory. But not the Negroes. Their past is stigma, their color is a stigma, their "vision of the future is the hope of erasing the stigma by making color irrelevant, by making it disappear as a fact of consciousness." Again Podhoretz has trouble with his words. The Negroes' past and color are stigmas only on white Americans. To make color irrelevant is one thing and is all that most Negroes and most liberals ask; to make it disappear as a fact of consciousness is another and is what Podhoretz seems to need for his own self respect. To put it more precisely than he has been willing to do, his vision of the future is of erasing the stigma on the white man's past by erasing the Negro.

JOAN S. WESTON

Amherst, Massachusetts

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

I write to commend you for publishing "My Negro Problem—And Ours," which seemed to me an act of supreme courage. This is not to say that I agreed with every point Mr. Podhoretz was making, especially the conclusions he drew from his own personal persecution, as a boy, at the hands of Negro boys. Nonetheless, there is in Mr. Podhoretz's essay a self-searching and self-judging honesty which is rare among liberals when it comes to dealing with the color problem. And I may add that I, as a South African Negro, speak as one who knows something of the hypocrisies, of the pain and rage, which surround the discussion of color prejudice in that unhappy country.

Mr. Podhoretz's contribution to an honest discussion of the relationship between white and black people is especially timely because, if one assesses the mood of black people correctly around the world, we may not have too much time in which to continue talking decently to each other across the color-line. Every so often editors bemoan the inroads made by bureaucracies upon the freedom of speech, and yet little of it is used to enlarge, however painfully, the areas of our understanding.

LEWIS NKOSI

London, England

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

The fact that both Negroes and whites are beginning to speak and write candidly about their deepest feelings on matters of race relations—as James Baldwin has in his recent articles in the New Yorker, Harper's and elsewhere, and as Mr. Podhoretz did in the February issue of COMMENTARY—seems to me a most hopeful sign. I hope that readers of both races will recognize that this dialogue is being conducted in a humane and constructive spirit—even though it is bound to touch upon a good many raw nerves. The end result, I hope, will be a much wider realization that the country's racial problem involves emotional issues which cannot be solved by legislation, lawsuits, or police action; that the fault is not all on one side; and that the first step toward resolving such issues is to bring them into the light of honest discussion.

I cannot agree with all of the points Mr. Podhoretz made. For example, I am not convinced that hatred between the races is as common as he suggests. Neither can I believe that inter-marriage is likely to prove a practical solution for the problems he discusses, at least within the foreseeable future. I'm quite sure, however, that it is a healthy thing to have such questions raised, and I hope that Negro writers will continue the discussion with the honesty and good will which are so evident in Mr. Podhoretz's article.

JOHN FISCHER
Editor-in-chief

Harper's Magazine
New York City

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

It takes a monumental capacity for confessional honesty to have written as Norman Podhoretz has written in "My Negro Problem—And Ours." For the first time to my recollection an American Jew (also a precarious phenomenon) has had the courage to acknowledge the corruptibility of consciousness to which he—in spite of all inherited wisdom and sublime influence—is liable. . . .

Yet I cannot agree with him or Mr. Baldwin that color is a political problem. It is rather too easy in my view to make an existential fact into a political issue merely because one passionately seeks to eliminate it. Color is not removable and miscegenation—whatever the daring of Mr. Podhoretz's conclusion—is not (as he admits) a programmatic principle. . . .

ARTHUR A. COHEN

New York City

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

I doubt that any other thing I have ever read so impressed me for intelligence and honesty as "My Negro Problem—And Ours." It must have been an act of great courage also.

CHARLES S. HYNEMAN

Department of Government
Indiana University
Bloomington, Indiana

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

I don't often write fan mail to editors, but I was deeply touched by "My Negro Problem—And Ours," which, I think, sums up a state of mind with regard to the Negro felt by more people than care to admit it. . . .

CHARLES RADDOCK

New York City

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

"In thinking about the Jews I have often wondered whether their survival as a distinct group was worth one hair on the head of a single infant . . ."—"I cannot see how it will ever be realized unless color does in fact disappear."—The solution is so easy I wonder how no one else ever thought of it. If we had no Negroes or Jews we would have no minority problems. If this is a proposed solution, then COMMENTARY should start looking for a new editor. Or, better still, no editor will be necessary since the very reason for the existence of COMMENTARY will have disappeared. It is fairly elementary that in the absence of Jews, Poles, French, Italians, Gypsies, etc., Hitler would have slaughtered all people with long noses, or short foreheads. Having eliminated the black color by intermarriage, when do we start on the brown, the yellow, and the red? This attitude proves that there can be a racial Munich as well as a political one. To elimate persecution, bigotry, prejudice, and the like we just remove the victim. Thus a new school of thought is born. And this from the editor of COMMENTARY! Shame.

MORTON WEITZNER

New York City

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

Norman Podhoretz's interesting and honorable discussion of his Negroes is somewhat unreasonable. He is, of course, right to conclude that where there is a social injustice one must simply remedy it, period. But since, in this area, to do justice arouses such emotional turmoil in himself, he ought, in justice to himself, to consult psychotherapy and find out why it is so hard for him to be rational. Childhood traces at the level that he explores them for us do not explain anything, for why is he still susceptible, though his real situation is so different? They are obviously screen-memories. (The same applies to much of Baldwin.)

I certainly shall not presume to mention the unconscious conflicts which (to me) appear in his childhood narrative, but let me make two general observations: (1) wherever society has imposed a boundary—whether racial, religious, national, or moral—there is bound to be rampant unconscious projection across it, to bolster each one's own shaky identity by lowering anxiety; and (2) for many people, an underlying Oedipus-complex makes forbidden and uncanny those who are "like" one's own family. . . .

Podhoretz's case of miscegenation as a remedy is typical of his avoidance of his own concrete reality. Let us hope that people will not marry to miscegenate but because of personal liking and physical attraction. If Podhoretz would imagine more concretely, he would realize that his daughter's putative Negro boyfriend would be somebody that he would dislike or like and that that would determine whether or not he would tear his hair.

PAUL GOODMAN

New York City

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

Norman Podhoretz's article is a masterpiece of courageous and acute journalism. It is accurate in its perception and tremendously impressive in its conclusions. My deepest congratulations.

LEE R. BOBKER

New York City

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

I have never been beaten by Negroes, only by whites, but my feelings of terror as a boy were exactly of the order of Mr. Podhoretz's and appeared in the same general circumstances. If you were around the school yard toward dusk and later, and you did not belong to a gang, you would most likely be beaten.

I know what Mr. Podhoretz means, too, by the admiration a boy feels for the sheer toughness of the boys who fight all the time, and who live in such a way that the police, teachers, parents, anybody else on the side of authority is an enemy for whom one has only contempt. . . .

The trouble with most educational systems in poor neighborhoods is that the schools are not planned as instruments of the community, but only as buildings where subjects—vocational or academic—are taught, and the authority of the teacher has no basis in the community as a whole.

In Mr. Podhoretz's case he learned not to hate because his family and friends educated him not to. As for his solution, it will be quite a while before everybody is intermarried and nobody is white or black. In the meantime, what we have to do is to pour our intellectual and moral energies into the solution of the true educational problem—teaching children to live in a community. We know how to do that, and whenever the community has really tried, by economic, social, and educational change taken all together, it has been successful. At least it has reduced the hating to a manageable size, shifted it to an individual basis and away from a black-white, Jew-Gentile, Italian-Irish battle.

Although I can agree with Mr. Podhoretz that the blacks have to see whites and cannot expect the whites to do all the looking, the whites do have the power and therefore the responsibility to arrange for everyone to see everyone else.

That is what educators and intellectuals should be dealing with instead of trying to make education a way of stuffing academic material down the throats of a whole population. . . .

HAROLD TAYLOR

New York City

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

I am beset by some of the feelings about Negroes which Mr. Podhoretz's article describes with such admirable honesty, and so no doubt are most other middle-class whites. Nevertheless, I think that his childhood experiences with Negroes may have been more traumatic than those of most of us, thus scarring his feelings today—as well they might—but in the process also affecting his conclusions about the problem of Negro-white relations. . . .

The white fear-and-hatred may involve projective mechanisms against the outgroup, but I think the primary explanation lies not in psychological or psychoanalytic concepts but in the facts of economic and social inequality. Since Negroes are at the bottom of the socio-economic heap, whites who come into contact with them fear the loss of status. This affects most directly the low-income whites—and this is why they have been the instigators of most race riots—but it also touches the middle class liberal, for example in his unwillingness to expose his children to predominantly Negro schools, and therefore to predominantly lower-class education. To be sure, there is also fear of Negro violence and fascination with Negro sexuality, but these feelings differ only in degree from those held, say, a generation ago by middle-class Anglo-Saxon about Southern and Eastern European low-income people. . . .

Color is of course a more lasting mark of lower-class status than ethnicity but it is not an intrinsic one, and it need not be a permanent one. If Negroes could obtain the same occupational and educational opportunities as whites, then Negro life would eventually take on more of the same middle-class characteristics, and this in turn would reduce the association of fear and hatred with color. Color itself would not disappear, of course, but once other differences are reduced, it would be much less noticed.

Equality of opportunity is easier advocated than obtained, especially since the demand for unskilled labor, by which the European immigrant escaped from the lower class, has virtually disappeared today. The drastic changes in the economy and social structure which are necessary to reduce inequality are resisted by whites not only to maintain their racial dominance, but also by the widespread unwillingness to use the government as an agent of social change, and by the inability of Negroes to generate the political power to force such changes. . . .

The proper extension of educational and occupational opportunity may thus take a much longer time than justice demands, but despite all the negative trends, I am still hopeful that someday Negroes will become part of the middle class.

Once economic assimilation is a reality, and class based differences in behavior vanish so that color can no longer mean class difference, intermarriage is likely to take place as well. Even so, it will be the last step in the process of social assimilation, and by then, American society will probably be so different from today's that the twisted sexual and other feelings which the races now hold toward each other will be washed away. Under such conditions, the term miscegenation will of course be as inappropriate as it is now for marriages between whites and orientals, even though these unions were considered unthinkable a generation ago.

But widespread Negro-white intermarriage is so far off in time that to think of it as a solution, rather than as the end-product, is not only irrelevant, but likely to deflect attention from the more immediate need for the reduction of economic and political inequality. Moreover, such proposals could easily play into the hands of those defenders of the status quo who use the white fears aroused by miscegenation as an excuse for resisting the extension of more basic opportunities.

HERBERT J. GANS

New York City

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

Norman Podhoretz has written on a highly-charged subject with extraordinary skill, heart, and perception. I think that this essay will be referred to for years by the people involved in this important matter.

HAROLD U. RIBALOW

New York City

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

. . . As a serious essay pretending to shed light on a crucial question, Norman Podhoretz's article is juvenile, pedestrian, and even dangerous. I cannot help seeing the bewildered faces of thousands of Southern Jews, already carrying a heavy burden of stress and anxiety, when they are confronted with this article by their equally harassed white, gentile neighbors. . . . Mr. Podhoretz should know that no serious student of the Negro problem can accept the glib cliché that "all Negroes hate whites" and that "all whites hate Negroes." As a Jew, he should know that assimilation among Jews has been going on for centuries, especially in Germany, without producing the slightest mitigation of German hatred and intolerance against the Jew. Why then does he think that the Negro counterpart of assimilation, miscegenation, will work here in the United States? . . .

Does Mr. Podhoretz really believe that the average Southerner is concerned with the Negro's skin, or is racism again rather a convenient device with which Southern political demagogues exploit the underprivileged poor whites to their own advantage by offering them the Negro as a scapegoat? In other words, if Mr. Podhoretz had been willing to consult other authorities besides Mr. Baldwin, he would have found political and economic factors more crucial and definitive in Negro-white relations than the racial issue.

Most distressing of the absurdities in Mr. Podhoretz's article is his failure to draw on the only rationale for the improvement of Negro-white relations, and Christian-Jewish, as well. The philosophical and human case for the end of racism is in the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the Golden Rule. It is from these sources that millions of Americans—Negro and white, Christian and Jew—draw the courage, hope and, faith that the injustice toward the Negro will be undone. . . .

Finally, Mr. Podhoretz's essay suffers from the liberal confusion that every human problem has a "solution"—final and ultimate, despite the evidence of human history that no such final solution has ever existed. Only the Nazis and similar individuals ever come up with ultimate solutions. Realistic Americans . . . optimistically look for substantial progress in the Negro's position, not for final solutions. . . .

DAVID ANTMAN

Forest Hills, New York

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

I, too, have become bored and irritated by the pedestrian level on which the Negro problem continues to be discussed, and it was a great joy to read Norman Podhoretz's article for its refreshingly honest comment on the subject.

ROBERT GUTMAN
Director of Research

The Urban Studies Center
Rutgers University
New Brunswick, New Jersey

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

The article by Norman Podhoretz, "My Negro Problem—And Ours," had a good deal of force and honesty to it, and it was a serious attempt to confront the white liberal's dilemma in terms that take into account the injuries to both parties. The ending was another matter, however. I have no quarrel with miscegenation as a matter of individual choice, but I can't see it solving any of the problem which the article so seriously attempts to discuss. In places like South Africa and the Deep South where miscegenation has been widely (albeit covertly) practiced, the problem of color has only intensified; the man of color is always the outsider, even if he only happens to be a hybrid, not a pure strain. . . . If he cared to, the Jew in America could adopt gentile habits and a gentile name. But how can the Negro? His "facelessness" is the facelessness of the black man in a white society which does not recognize the ambiguities of mixed strains. . . .

DICK ELMAN
Public Affairs Director

WBAI-fm
New York City

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

I was greatly moved in reading "My Negro Problem—And Ours." Its frankness is disarming. I shall not pretend that my hair did not rise several times at the thought of some of the things Mr. Podhoretz reports about his treatment by Negro boys: but who started it? I kept thinking—isn't it the white adult who first decided to keep everything to himself and despise the Negro? How else could Negro boys behave? Isn't the huge guilt the white man's entirely? When the temperature was down I thought my emotional states were due to the fact that I am a South African Negro, which says much. We still come back to Mr. Podhoretz's "awkward" question, "How could the Negroes in my neighborhood have regarded the whites across the street and around the corner as jailers? . . . . As for white hatred of the Negro, how could guilt have had anything to do with it?" Is the physical fact of color not the all-potent thing after all in these relationships? . . .

At one point I wondered why Mr. Podhoretz seemed to think that integration necessarily had as its ultimate or inevitable aim the preservation of the Negro race as a protected minority. But he offers an answer to the dilemma—quite relieving—miscegenation. I just cannot see how a nation can continue to cheat itself into thinking that it can go on happily ever after merely because it is a physical mixture of races and put off indefinitely the day when it will be a chemical compound, like the Brazilian phenomenon. I can see this as the only solution for South Africa.

I am rather skeptical of James Baldwin's assertion that all Negroes hate whites. Besides, this is neither here nor there. Isn't it the antithesis of the equally absurd statement, "I like Negroes" or "I like Italians"? . . . I do not know the racial scene in America sufficiently to say Baldwin is wrong. But it does seem that he is ignoring dynamic person-to-person relationships which are all the time forming and breaking up and forming. I can quite appreciate that, as he says, color is a political thing, and therefore generates vicious and overwhelming group attitudes, and such person-to-person relationships become irrelevant, unimportant. And then, as Negroes, we tell ourselves that we ought all to be hating every white man.

Finally, it is brave and wise for COMMENTARY to want to publish articles like "My Negro Problem—And Ours." It is important that we should purge ourselves of the complexes Mr. Podhoretz gestures at; and how else can we do this than by knowing them for what they are?

EZEKIEL MPHAHLELE
Congrès pour la Liberté de la Culture
Paris, France

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

Mr. Podhoretz's examination of the "Negro problem" is brave, and eloquent, and—as he would probably not deny—dreadfully confused.

Children are remarkably intense creatures, strange and revelatory; children grow into adults, and the process of growth necessarily shapes the end product. But a child's understanding of himself and his world, his inability to relate one phenomenon to another with even a reasonable semblance of objectivity, makes for a fantastic distortion in his perspective. To carry such distortions forward, and then to attempt adult-world generalizations on such a wildly askew basis, cannot be more than of limited utility. Mr. Podhoretz was tormented by Negroes as a child, and hated; bravely, he admits that he hates still. . . . But even if he has some reason to maintain his hatred, living "on the upper west side of Manhattan," why does he maintain it so unchanged? He would be in exactly the same danger—no less, no more—walking through a white waterfront neighborhood at night, dressed in his uniform of fairly prosperous respectability. . . . What he felt in childhood, what they felt then, is not crucial, not any more. Not even helpful, indeed—one draws passion and irrationality from such childhood remembrances, and one is relieved of their burden, but understanding must be sought elsewhere. . . .

There are more millions of people in the U.S.—white and black alike—than Mr. Podhoretz or any other adult will ever be called upon to deal with, face-to-face. The situations in which those people live are of course in part personal ones, but not in largest part. . . . We live in an incredibly complex world. Life can be pushed at, and affected, at an incredible multiplicity of points. If an urban, liberal, white Jew sends his children to a private school, rather than to the racially-mixed local public school, that hurts long-run Negro-white relations. But if he also—surely in good measure from guilt!—gives his support, financial and social, to the NAACP or to CORE, it may be that the net effect of his actions is beneficial rather than hurtful. It may be, further, that the two aspects of the one individual are deeply dependent one on the other, and that, for example, progress made by Negro action groups may in turn cause a raising of Negro educational levels and thereby create less pressure for panicked withdrawal to non-public education. Nothing, not even the Negroes and the whites themselves, is all black and white.

BURTON RAFFEL
Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

Mr. Podhoretz's article on the Negro problem is penetrating and knowledgeable, and its candor puts us all in his debt. I hope that it will arouse troubled thought, not just rationalization and piety. Three comments come to my mind.

First, I have the impression that a special intensity of hatred is building up in certain Negro quarters toward the middle-class liberal white. There is an element of felt betrayal. It is the feeling of betrayal that arouses the intensest of hates in all human relationships, and how else can the Negro feel but betrayed when he notes in the white liberal the signs of aversion (residential, educational, and, in a way that he never felt in the old South, physiological) that he had been led to believe were the stigmata of reactionaries only. Expecting nothing anyhow from the reactionary, the Negro is not likely to respond to him with the same knife-like rancor that goes to the liberal—who has wooed the Negro with words and laws, and then left him. It would be hard to imagine a better recipe for lasting hate than the present combination of expectation and rebuff. I am convinced that Black Muslimism is more a reaction to white liberalism than it is to old-line segregationism.

Second, I agree with Mr. Podhoretz that the Negro problem, as he and James Baldwin pose it, is not going to be settled until color disappears. . . . Both the Negro leader and the white liberal have usually protested that talk of intermarriage was a red herring. Opponents of civil rights have always said warningly that economic and social equality once begun must lead to intermarriage. If I understand Mr. Podhoretz he is saying hopefully that intermarriage once begun might lead to social and economic equality. I can think of various social mechanisms of racial intermingling in history —concubinage, marriage by force, by arrangement, romance—but none, unhappily, that apply at the present time, given the tragically contradictory legal and psychological conditions attending the Negro problem.

Third, I would like to propose that we banish the word integration. Apart from its unexceptional mathematical meaning, it is a semantic blob, a non-word. . . . Where else in the history of human relationships has this awful word been used? Women's rights? Jew and Gentile? Catholic and Protestant? Nowhere, to the best of my knowledge, and nowhere is where the word belongs.

What is to replace it? I take my stand on one thing alone: citizenship. Citizenship is not a semantic blob. It is as hard and clear as a diamond. It is the noblest word in the history of Western polity. Perhaps, just perhaps, if we concentrate on citizenship as the end, forgetting about the non-word, integration, we will put ourselves in a few decades at least where Catholic-Protestant and Jew-Gentile relationships have been put. These relationships, the Lord knows, are far from perfect; they add to the human condition. But few need be reminded of how far we have come.

ROBERT A. NISBET
Chancellor
University of California
Riverside, California

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

I have been a reader of and subscriber to COMMENTARY for the past twelve years. During that time I have never read an article of such low intellectual caliber as "My Negro Problem—And Ours."

The article is offensive to any Jew who has had any association with Jewish tradition. Such a Jew is told in effect that because he helped to keep Jewish identity alive, he must bear part of the responsibility for the annihilation of six million Jews. This is as logical as telling a victim of a murder that he must bear some responsibility for his own murder because he was still alive at the time of his murder.

The article is offensive to any Negro. In effect, the Negro is told he has no past worth looking back at and no future, except his escape from his past by intermarriage. I wonder how many eminent Negro personages were consulted before the conclusions on intermarriage were reached. . . .

ISRAEL W. KIRSHENBAUM
Brooklyn, New York

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

May I thank you profoundly for "My Negro Problem—And Ours"—a piece which needed writing and which Mr. Podhoretz wrote beautifully? . . .

I believe, however, that Mr. Podhoretz draws the wrong conclusions to reach the right answer. Differences in skin color are handicaps for the minority groups. . . . We are decades away from erasing these artificial barriers between man and man. But the tide is turning toward the procurement of equal rights—political and economic—in favor of the colored races. . . .

HARRY SCHNEIDERMAN
Chicago, Illinois

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

"My Negro Problem—And Ours" is one of the most honest efforts of real soul-searching in this whole business of prejudice that I have seen in a long time.

CONSTANCE CURRY
Director
Southern Student Human Relations Project
US National Student Association
Atlanta, Georgia

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

Norman Podhoretz's piece is a real landmark and if I had a Pulitzer Prize to give, he'd have it.

GILBERT A. HARRISON
Editor-in-chief
The New Republic
Washington, D.C.

[Correspondence on "My Negro Problem—And Ours" will be continued in forthcoming issues.]

Cavalier April, 1963
R & R Rel.

Some unpleasant truths re the racial inferiority of those somnolent citizens below that famous Line

FOOL'S PARADISE OF THE SOUTHERN WHITE

BY GERALD WALKER

Some of my best friends are White Southerners.

Personally, I feel only the greatest affection and respect for the White Southerner—in his place. The trouble is, however, that lately the White Southerner has shown all too little awareness of what and where his proper place is. I refer, of course, to his precipitous turning away from his traditional agrarian way of life and his rather pushy efforts in recent years to attract new industry below the Mason-Dixon Line.

Now, generally speaking, it is certainly commendable for a backward region to try to raise itself. But I must add in all candor that the impatient, not to say aggressive, manner in which a handful of White Southern agitators has gone about this task has sown the seeds of suspicion and competition between our two regions where previously there had been only harmony and understanding; indeed, inter-regional relations have deteriorated badly.

Moreover, it seems to me the real point is that perhaps it is time for the rest of the country to ask: Is the White Southerner really ready for progress? Is he trying to come too far too fast?

After all, the White Southerner is but one hundred years removed from practicing slavery. And while, admittedly, he has made rapid strides and come a long way since losing the Civil War to an adversary battle-proved to be his superior, has he yet earned the right of full participation in the industrialized mainstream of contemporary American life? Would it not be better for all concerned for the White Northerner to continue his stewardship of the South until such a time as there was not a shred of a doubt of the White Southerner's capacity to fend for himself?

For the plain fact of the matter is that there are vast areas of difference between the White Southerner and the White Northerner. These differences—in morality, in criminality, in temperament, in mentality, in ambition and, generally, in the ability to adapt to the ways of Western civilization—first became apparent to me when I was a carpetbagging freshman at the University of Georgia in 1945.

Since then, as a result of a number of return trips to the South, I have gotten to know the White Southerner well. I have lived close to them for long periods, observed their customs, visited in their homes, broken bread with them and gone to their social functions. Making due allowance for the White Southerner's good qualities —humor, hospitality, charm, chattiness—I soon came to realize that he was, in fact, a totally different and essentially inferior breed when measured against his neighbor, the White Northerner.

These firsthand observations have lately been substantiated by the impartial findings of modern science, as set forth most effectively by Carleton Putnam in his eye-opening work, Race and Reason. Mr. Putnam, whose extensive background as an airlines executive led him directly into becoming a noted amateur authority in the fields of anthropology, biology, psychology and anatomy, is primarily concerned with demonstrating the innate, hereditary factors which account for the observable inferiority of the average Negro to the average White. (Some indication of the brilliance with which he succeeded may be gathered from the wide circulation —over 100,000 copies sold—and enthusiastic reception that his book has enjoyed in Southern States since its publication in 1961. For example, Mississippi Gov. Ross Barnett proclaimed October 26, 1961, as Race And Reason Day, capped by a $25-a-plate dinner in Putnam's honor, and the Louisiana State Legislature passed a resolution that same year ordering high schools throughout the state to assign the book for study to "selected mature students.")

Needless to say, valid scientific principles and procedures are applicable to more than one set of data and circumstances. Thus, a yardstick may be used to measure the length of an eel as well as a snake. And so it is only further proof of the ingeniousness and usefulness of the anthropological and cultural criteria developed by Mr. Putnam and his school if I now employ them in a painstaking, scientific comparison of the average White Southerner and the average White Northerner. As Mr. Putnam and similarly objective researchers might say, let the chips fall where they may, it is only the truth that we are after.

This specialized field is still too new for there to have been much extensive research yet on the comparative skull sizes and brain weights of White Southerners as opposed to White Northerners. However, there has been some very good work done in connection with the well known innate defect in the White Southerners' jawbone and larynx, by which he is prevented from speaking the English language properly.

According to Prof. W. A. Emerson, research director of the nonprofit Curtis Foundation's Center for Higher Learning and himself a White Southerner, the WS jawbone averages 1.6 centimeters longer that that of the typical WN specimen. Other investigators, building upon this discovery, have found that this additional length narrows the throat cavity, signally constricting the larynx and causing the congenital speech abnormality popularly known as a "Southern accent." In addition, particularly in the case of WS females and political figures, it seems to prevent the speaker from cutting off the flow of words until at least the better part of an hour has passed. This is the sad result of several centuries of inbreeding of regional stock that was poor to begin with.

Along these lines, it is of the highest significance that not one of America's first five astronauts was a WS. Naval Comdr. Alan Shepard, Jr. was born in New Hampshire, Maj. Virgil Grissom in Indiana, Marine Lt. Col. John Glenn in Ohio, Comdr. Malcolm Carpenter in Colorado and Comdr. Walter Schirra in New Jersey. In short, when the National Aeronautics and Space Administration was given every resource to comb this country for the cream of American manhood, the WS was bypassed in favor of the WN. Said an Air Force general at the time Project Mercury began, "What we're looking for is a group of ordinary supermen." NASA either did not look in Dixie; or if it did, none was found.

But the WS has never been much of a superman—not even an ordinary one. Frederick Law Olmstead, the distinguished 19th Century WN landscape architect, traveled throughout the entire Old South and in 1861, in The Cotton Kingdom, he reported on his interviews with five hundred WS men in their own homes and across their own tables.

". . . the proportion of the free white men," Olmstead wrote, "who live as well in any respect as our working classes in the North, on an average, is small, and the citizens of the cotton States, as a whole, are poor. They work little, and that little, badly; they earn little, they sell little; they buy little, and they have little—very little—of the common comforts and consolations of civilized life. Their destitution is not material only; it is intellectual and it is moral."

Said Henry Adams of Roony Lee, son of Robert E. Lee, and other Southern Bourbons he knew at Harvard from 1854 to 1858: "The habit of command was not enough, and the Virginian had little else. He was simple beyond analysis; so simple that even the simple New England student could not realize him. No one knew enough to know how ignorant he was, how childlike; how helpless before the relative complexity of a school. . . . Strictly, the Southerner had no mind; he had temperament. He was not a scholar; he had no intellectual training; he could not analyze an idea, and he could not even conceive of admitting two. . . ."

So much for the Old South, what of the New—the industrialized South prematurely announced in 1886 by Atlanta newspaper editor Henry W. Grady? Industrialization never fully "took," but it went far enough for the incisive WS historian, W. J. Cash, to include a memorable word-picture in The Mind of the South.

According to Cash, "By 1900 the cotton-mill worker was a pretty distinct physical type in the South; a type in some respects perhaps inferior to even that of the old poor white, which in general had been his to begin with. A dead-white skin, a sunken chest, and stooping shoulders were the earmarks of the breed. Chinless faces, microcephalic foreheads, rabbit teeth, goggling dead-fish eyes, rickety limbs, and stunted bodies abounded—over and beyond the limit of their prevalence in the countryside. The women were characteristically stringy-haired and limp of breast at twenty, and shrunken hags at thirty or forty. And the incidence of tuberculosis, of insanity and epilepsy, and, above all, of pellagra, the curious vitamin-deficiency disease which is nearly peculiar to the South, was increasing."

This is not the Snopes-haunted fiction of a Faulkner pursued by a vision of rapacious, termite-like subhumans taking over the South. These are the words of a WS historian, a man who deals in facts, not horrific fables.

Thomas Wolfe, another literary WS, has testified to his fellows' "hostile and murderous intrenchment against all new life . . . their cheap mythology, their legend of the charm of their manners, the aristocratic culture of their lives, the quaint sweetness of their drawl." Perhaps most disturbing to Wolfe was "the familiar rationalizing and self-defense of Southern fear and Southern failure . . . its inability to meet or to adjust itself to the conditions, strifes, and ardors of a modern life; its old, sick, Appomattoxlike retreat into the shades of folly and delusion . . . of florid legend and defensive casuistry. . . ." And finally Wolfe remarks of his autobiographical character, George Webber, "He was a Southerner, and he knew that there was something wounded in the South. He knew that there was something twisted, dark, and full of pain which Southerners (continued on page 68) have known all their lives—something rooted in their souls beyond all contradiction."

FOOL'S PARADISE

(continued from page 12)

Of course, it may be objected that what we have just presented are but isolated impressions, albeit perceptive ones based on careful observation and investigation. What is needed, it might be said, is large-scale, objective, up-to-date evidence concerning the physical and mental makeup of the WS. For precisely this sort of data, let us now examine some Selective Service statistics from World Wars I and II.

In 1917, Army psychologists devised what they called the Beta intelligence test for inductees. A leading segregationist intellectual spokesman, Richmond News Leader editor James Jackson Kilpatrick cited a sampling of the Beta test results in his recent book, The Southern Case for School Segregation. Even the figures selected by him show the WS running a poor second to the WN, as can be seen from the following:

WHITE SOUTHERNERS AND WHITE NORTHERNERS
ARMY INTELLIGENCE TESTS, 1918

| WS State | Median Score | WN State | Median Score |
|---|---|---|---|
| Mississippi | 41.25 | Pennsylvania | 64.6 |
| Kentucky | 41.50 | New York | 64.0 |
| Arkansas | 41.55 | Illinois | 63.0 |
| Georgia | 42.12 | Ohio | 66.7 |

Oddly enough, although Mr. Kilpatrick used a similar differential between White Southerners and Negro Southerners as the basis for arguing the latter's inferiority and for justifying segregation, he did not feel logically impelled to draw the same conclusions about the WS in relation to the WN. This is a contemporary example of the WS's inability to conceive of admitting two ideas at once, first pointed out by Henry Adams a century ago.

In the two decades between World Wars I and II, the WS—thanks to prodigious efforts by the federal government and private foundations—experienced notable increases in health and in educational, cultural, economic and social opportunities. Surely, it might be supposed, these gains would have been reflected in his showing when tested for military service. No such improvement can be discerned.

During World War II, the Selective Service System divided the country into four regions: Region I, North; Region II, Midwest; Region III, Far West, and Region IV, South. For present purposes, let us limit our comparisons to Region I (Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York) and Region IV (Arkansas, Oklahoma, Texas, Florida, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Kentucky, Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana).

General service acceptance rates and disqualification rates per 100 white registrants from November 1940 to December 1943 were:

REGION I (North)—59.4 accepted for general service; 25.8 disqualified.

REGION IV (South)— 57.3 accepted for general service; 31.9 disqualified.

(The difference between the sum of acceptances and rejections and the total of 100 per cent is accounted for by men admitted for limited service.)

During the above period, the acceptance rate of WS males was not only lower than that of WN males of Region I, but was lower than that of WN males in the other two regions as well: Region II, Midwest—60.9 accepted, 26.4 disqualified; Region III, Far West—58.6 accepted, 27.1 disqualified.

Nor did the relative discrepancy between acceptance and rejection rates for WNs and WSes change later in the war. From January 1944 to December 1944 the figures were:

REGION I (North)—54.9 accepted; 42.6 disqualified.

REGION IV (South)—48.6 accepted; 49.8 disqualified.

Infant mortality rates are another index of living conditions and a population's hardiness. Expressed as a rate per 1,000 live white births, latest government figures show:

New England, 22.1 (WN); Middle Atlantic, 22.2 (WN).

South Atlantic, 24.6 (WS); East South Central, 25.4 (WS): West South Central, 24.4 (WS).

The WS's poor showing physically and mentally is matched only by his moral deficiencies and criminal inclinations. Reported John Gunther in Inside U. S. A., "The kind of piquant sociological detail known to readers of William Faulkner still crops up in the news from day to day. While I was in Atlanta the papers printed a handsome little story about nine sisters, all of whom were prostitutes in the same room. Lillian Smith, the author of Strange Fruit, told me in Clayton, Georgia, of a recent case in which a baby died. The parents left it on the bed to rot. They were not rendered helpless by grief. They made no effort to bury the body because they simply didn't know any better."

Promiscuity and illegitimacy run 20 per cent higher among WSes than among WNs. The U.S. National Vital Statistics Division report for 1960 says that 27.35 out of every 1,000 live WS births took place out of wedlock; the comparable figure for WNs was 22.00. Another way of putting this is to state the White illegitimacy rate as a percentage of total White births. In 1956, Mississippi Representative John Bell Williams introduced on the House floor figures showing WS illegitimate births averaging 1.95 per cent of total WS births, and 1.45 per cent for WNs.

In the same speech, Representative Williams let slip another set of figures which pointed up the higher rate of crime among WSes compared with WNs. The figures revealed that in the thirteen Northern states he cited the rate of WN felony prisoners then in jail came to 21 per 100,000 WN population, but in the ten Southern states he selected, the WS rate was 29 per 100,000.

In particular, crimes of violence are an old Southern custom. Charlotte, North Carolina, was once known as "The Murder Capital of America." Writing in 1941, WS historian W. J. Cash said, ". . . long before hatred for the black man had begun to play any direct part in the pattern (of more than three hundred persons said to have been hanged or burned by mobs [in the South] between 1840 and 1860, less than ten per cent were Negroes) the South had become peculiarly the home of lynching." Cash then goes on to record that ". . . of the grand total of 3,397 Negroes lynched in the nation from the beginning of 1882 until the close of 1938, only 366 were lynched outside the former Confederate States, and of these 185 were lynched in the border states of Maryland, Kentucky, West Virginia and Missouri, themselves more than half Southern."

Although the WS constitutes 27 per cent of the country's white population, he is responsible for an alarmingly disproportionate share of American crime. Thus, the Justice Department's latest edition of National Prisoner Statistics indicates that of all prisoners executed under civil authority in the United States, 1930-1961, for murder, rape, armed robbery and kidnaping, 36.5 per cent were WSes.

Illiteracy is a longstanding WS tradition going back to Colonial days, but the WS has shown a remarkable ability to transmit this drawback from generation to generation. According to recent figures of the U. S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare, here is a breakdown of the percentage of the white population, 25 years or older, considered to be functionally illiterate:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Conn. | 6.1 | Ala. | 9.4 |
| Del. | 4.2 | Ark | 10.6 |
| Me. | 4.5 | Fla. | 5.3 |
| Md. | 5.5 | Ga. | 10.3 |
| Mass. | 5.9 | Ky. | 13.1 |
| N. H. | 4.4 | La. | 13.6 |
| N. J. | 6.3 | Miss. | 7.1 |
| N. Y. | 7.4 | N. C. | 12.2 |
| Pa. | 6.3 | Okla. | 7.6 |
| R. I. | 7.4 | S. C. | 11.6 |
| Vt. | 3.8 | Tenn. | 12.7 |
| | | Tex. | 12.0 |
| | | Va. | 9.3 |

In an attempt to escape the crime, violence and primitive living standards which pervade their native region, over 4,000,000 Southerners—White and Negro—left Dixie during the 1950s, somewhat more than the number of persons who fled East Germany during a comparable period. Unhappily, the WS—not to mention his new neighbors—found that he carried these conditions right along with him.

Albert N. Votaw, in the February 1958 Harper's, described the prickly integration problem the WS presented to a typical Northern city. At that time there were 70,000 WS recent arrivals in Chicago. Settling in one South Side neighborhood, they presented the authorities with a number of difficulties. A police captain was quoted as saying, "They are vicious and knife-happy. They are involved in 75 per cent of our arrests in this district." Observed a municipal court judge, ". . . you'll never improve the neighborhood until you get rid of them."

Other comments on the transplanted WS during the course of the article: ". . . disorderly, untamed to urban ways . . . anti-social to the point of delinquency in the eyes of their neighbors . . . the [poor] domestic habits they bring from small backwoods communities . . . Their housekeeping is easy to the point of disorder . . . children play freely anywhere, without any supervision . . . when it comes to sex training, their habits—with respect to such matters as incest and statutory rape—are clearly at variance with urban legal requirements, and parents fail to appreciate the interest authorities take in their sex life . . . On the job they are said to lack ambition . . . considered poor tenants . . . [White] Southern [school] children are handicapped . . . They are too old for their grades and too mature physically for their classmates . . . Prone to disease . . . They are a disgrace to their race."

A South Side school principal has said that the average I. Q. of his 1,400 pupils, most of whom are WS, is only 87; moreover, only 16 of them had a rating of above 120.

The Chicago Sunday Tribune summed things up this way: "The Southern hillbilly migrants, who have descended like a plague of locusts in the last few years, have the lowest standard of living and moral code (if any), the biggest capacity for liquor, and the most savage tactics when drunk, which is most of the time."

Obviously, the WS isn't the same kind of person as the WN. He just isn't accustomed to, or perhaps capable of, living the same way the rest of us do, and we should make allowances for that fact. However, at the same time, we should put some sensible limit on the extent of the WS's participation in business, national affairs and inter-regional social contact. After all, as essayist Harry Golden, editor of the Carolina Israelite, has said, would you want your sister to marry a Governor Faubus?

WS and WN should each stick to his own kind, moving forward separately and harmoniously as in the past. The WS should have enough regional and racial pride to want to develop in his own way and at his own natural pace, not force himself in when and where he isn't wanted. Besides, geographical separation is a basic law of nature. If the good Lord had intended WSes and WNs to work and live in the same way and locale, He would not have created a North and a South in the first place.

Most important of all, we cannot risk jeopardizing the American way of life for the sake of the impulsive, impatient leaders of a minority; that would be a perversion of the true meaning of democracy. For although it would undoubtedly raise the WS if the standards of inter-regional intercourse were relaxed to permit him a larger role in the nation's affairs, it would at the same time inevitably lower the WN.

What, after all, has the WS contributed to American civilization? It is an extraordinary catalogue: hookworm, slavery, the filibuster, hominy grits, the Ku Klux Klan, pellagra, mint julips, lynching, the University of Mississippi and high treason in seceding from the Union. Sic transit gloria moonshine.

It would be patently unfair to leave the impression that all WSes are naturally primitive, violent, criminal, shiftless, promiscuous, uncultured and undistinguished. There have been a number, perhaps a hundred over the past three and a half centuries, who do not fall into those categories—but many of these had Northern blood.

Among more recent WS notables, Senator Harry Flood Byrd of Virginia and his brother, Admiral Richard Byrd, have a WN great-great-great-grandmother. The father of the late Josephus Daniels, North Carolina newspaper editor and statesman, was a Rhode Island ship's carpenter.

Zachary Taylor, twelfth president of the United States, had WN ancestry. Jefferson Davis, the president of the Confederate States, was the son of a WN. And WN blood flowed through the veins of such other stalwarts of the Confederacy as Maj. Gen. "Jeb" Stuart, Gen. James Longstreet, Gen. John Clifford Pemberton and John Slidell, appointed commissioner to France by Jefferson Davis. Even Daniel Boone was born in Bucks County, Pennsylvania.

Pure-bred WSes such as Robert E. Lee and John C. Calhoun are among the exceptions that prove the rule. However, a son of Richard Lee, the famous founder of the Lee family in America, married a WN and the socially prominent Ditchley branch of Lees is descended from a WN.

It should also be noted that the figure of the Yankee peddler was a familiar one throughout the South during the 18th Century. As he wended his way across the countryside selling his wares, it is not inconceivable that, in addition to calicoes, scissors and clocks, he may also have left behind here and there some WN genes. These might well have made their presence felt without ever showing up on an official genealogy.

It only needs to be said that the average rank-and-file WS today is well satisfied with things as they are, but is being goaded on by a handful of agitators and fomentors into making more demands than the country can safely meet, or than WSes as a whole could handle in their present stage of development. Who are these clandestine pressure groups and what are they really after?

A hint was provided in a New York Times dispatch of January 28, 1962, about the lures offered by the WS in his drive to attract new industry. "This stepped-up economic warfare," wrote Atlanta correspondent Claude Sitton, ". . . . poses a threat to areas in the North and Midwest in which rising costs and industrial strife have caused management to grow restless. It also has aroused concern in financial circles. Some securities experts contend that industrial subsidies being offered in both the South and the North are endangering the tax structure and municipal credit and carrying the nation toward state capitalism. A South Carolina legislative committee has termed these lures 'somewhat socialistic.'" [emphasis added]

Has the Kremlin taken over the WS equality movement? How sincere is the WS when it can be shown that he is playing directly into the hands of a foreign ideology? Are we being lulled by a pack of fine-sounding words into forgetting the WS's natural tendencies toward violence and lust? These are pressing questions for every WN American to keep in mind during the trying days ahead. □

---

from him."

Kaufman and Roland Kibbee (who had created the show) maintained that Newhart had never actually written a single line on the series. They admitted that a Newhart monolog from one of his records had been used, as well as a few ideas which the comedian had thrown out for the others to write. But, Kaufman insisted, "He can't write. He can't even spell."

The headlines in the trade papers continued the Kaufman affair right up to the night of the awards. "Newhart destroyed the show," Kaufman

News Week R & R Rel.
May 6, 63

'I Like the Word Black'

In Greenwood, Miss., an NAACP executive from New York brought the message to a cheering voter-registration rally in red-brick Turner's Chapel: "Any time one of these white men tries to insinuate that he's superior to you, stand up on your hind legs and spit in his face."

In Detroit, a Negro newspaperman worried aloud: "That 'look-how-much-we've-gained-in-the-last-50-years' stuff—that sours on the young Negro's stomach ... We're going to see violence."

In New York, a young Negro student leader, on furlough from the civil-rights battlegrounds of the South, smiled fleetingly at a white acquaintance. "Sure I love my white brother," he said. "But I watch him."

On a sprawling Mississippi cotton plantation, a hollow-eyed Negro fieldhand sat under a naked lightbulb in his four-room shack and catalogued his assets: $1 in his jeans, no more than $10 coming on payday, only three beds for his eleven children, a diet so spare that the youngsters get milk only at school. Given one wish, what would he ask? His quick reply: "Freedom."

Williams-Erker

King: Was love's labor lost?

Across the nation, such voices were abroad—the voices of the increasingly restless and militant mood of the American Negro. To many white Americans, the face was unfamiliar—disquietingly so. But the shift in temper had been long in the making, bound up historically with World War II, the Supreme Court desegregation ruling of 1954, and the emergence of Black Africa. Negro leaders, who tuned in long ago, smile at the discovery of yet another "New Negro." One said: "You never asked us." Now, the Negro no longer waits to be asked. Increasingly, he says out loud what he has been whispering in the family for years.

The Negro's message:

▶He is impatient—"fed up with Jim Crow," says James Farmer, executive secretary of the Congress of Racial Equality, "and fed up with waiting." Ironically, every inch of progress has intensified his hunger for a yard more. "There has been more progress since 1954 than in the previous 50 years," Howard Zinn, a white professor at Atlanta's Negro Spelman College, says. "But, while progress doubled, expectation increased 50 times."

▶He is more aggressive in his fight for equality. He will march against police dogs and cops and the certainty of jail in Greenwood, Miss., or Birmingham, Ala. For such abstractions as the ballot, he is willing in increasing numbers to gamble his livelihood and even his life. One leader said: "He simply doesn't give a damn what happens any more."

▶He has shown new stirring of racial pride, spurred partly by his own achievements at home, partly by the rise of the new African nations. The chauvinist Black Muslims have encouraged him, but so have militant integrationists. "For too long, we have been ashamed of our flat lips and broad nose," says James Forman, executive secretary of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (and himself a pecan-hued man with almost Caucasian features). "I like [the word] 'black.' I like to use it. It's an attempt to have some identity. It . . . [tells] the white man, 'what you used to call me is no longer a symbol of inferiority.' To do this is to have an inner security."

▶He is ambivalent about whites, sometimes hopeful, sometimes doubtful, sometimes resentful, sometimes openly hostile. The view that white men are devils is neither a Muslim creation nor a Muslim monopoly. James Baldwin, the Negro essayist and novelist who is the intellectual voice of his generation, found the war years a turning point among Negroes. "To put it briefly, and somewhat too simply," he writes, "a certain hope died, a certain respect for white Americans faded. One began to pity them, or to hate them."

▶His mood is freighted with dynamite. His leaders worry about the durability of his commitment to non-violent action. "The danger is," a white Atlanta civil-rights worker says, "that Negroes may conclude that there is nothing so persuasive as a mouthful of knuckles."

"There go my people," Gandhi said in a remark much cherished by his American disciple Martin Luther King Jr. "I must catch them, for I am their leader." Negro leaders have indeed been forced to keep up with this shift in mood. But they have also found the increasing militancy a useful talking point. On fund-raising missions to corporate boards, Whitney Young Jr., executive director of the National Urban League,

Bob Mitchell

Facedown in Birmingham: The danger was a mouthful of knuckles poses these alternatives: invest in positive assistance—or risk hostility and growing strength for the Muslims, along with rising crime rates and higher welfare costs. "We were able to increase our budget," said Young, "from $270,000 in 1961 to $722,000 last year."

'Where Art Thou?' The shift also has injected a tougher and sometimes more nationalistic tone into the civil-rights debate, stiffening the Negro leader's posture—and, sadly, constricting his lines of communication with whites as well. Rep. Adam Clayton Powell, the longtime political lightning rod of Harlem, spoke in just such tones for a purge of whites from top executive positions in the NAACP. Negroes, he argued, must wage their own fight: "We are prisoners. How can we expect our jailkeeper to give us freedom?" The NAACP has, in fact, been venturing more and more out of its accustomed arena—the courts—into direct-action campaigns in the South. Nonetheless, it felt constrained to answer Powell in a pamphlet defending its own credentials and questioning Powell's in a title borrowed from Genesis 3:9: "And the Lord God called unto Adam, and said unto him, Where art thou?"

In the new atmosphere of militance, orthodox civil-rights leaders no longer dismiss the Muslims, whom they regarded little more than a year ago as not quite respectable. They are hardly friends, but they have found some points of contact. Few Negro leaders will quarrel with the Muslim assessment of the Negro's lot in the U.S. Walking away from a debate with Muslim leader Malcolm X in Durham, N.C., Negro civil-rights lawyer Floyd McKissick said: "It didn't make much sense for me to stand up there and defend the white man when I know he's wrong." Some value the Muslims as a gadfly. "They are disabusing whites of the paternalistic notion that Negroes are basically happy and want a little civil rights on the side," says Negro writer Louis Lomax. "Whites should know that when Negroes are kicked, they react."

X Marks the Spot: Criticism centers instead on Muslim theology, Muslim chauvinism, and the Muslim program to acquire part of the U.S. for a separate black nation. "You cannot integrate the Negroes and the whites without bloodshed," the lean, coffee-colored Malcolm X said last week. "The only peaceful way is for the Negroes and whites to separate." But the Negro remains committed to equality within white America; the Muslims are still outside the mainstream with only 5,500 to 6,000 hard-core members. Even so, the currents that produced them remain. "They're Islamic, while most Negroes are Baptists or Methodists," says one Negro leader. "If they changed to Black Nazarenes, they might sweep the country."

Most of all, the restive mood has added new problems to old for Martin Luther King himself. His current campaign of demonstrations in Birmingham has become a crucial testing ground for him and his program of Christian non-violence. Though his name is still magic with the Southern Negro masses, his house is divided. Most Negro leaders still defend him from white criticism ("He may be an s.o.b.," says one, "but he's our s.o.b."). Yet some criticize him themselves for moving too precipitously in Birmingham instead of first trying to negotiate with a new city administration. For others, Albany, Ga., where 1,500 King followers marched off to jail with little visible gain, was a bitter memory. "When King says, 'Go to jail today and you'll be free tomorrow'," one remarked, "people say, 'To hell with that—if I go to jail today, I'll be in jail tomorrow'." More than 370 demonstrators have in fact gone to jail in Birmingham, including King himself. Charged with defying a state court order against demonstrations, he and ten other ministers drew five-day sentences and $50 fines last week.

Pictorial Parade

Malcolm X: 'You cannot integrate'

Yet King feels he must go on. He is troubled by the portents about him. "I'm running into more and more bitterness because things haven't moved fast enough," he told NEWSWEEK's Karl Fleming. "The Negro in the South can now be non-violent as a stratagem, but he can't include loving the white man . . . Non-violence has become a military tactical approach."

Like others in his leadership generation, King banks less on the b[illegible] of white moderates who will trade [illegible]ken integration for peace. "We are moving toward a sort of tokenism that is now becoming institutionalized . . . a tranquilizer that removes the stress just for the moment." He worries, as well, that the Albany-Greenwood-Birmingham police tactic of breaking up demonstrations is depriving Negroes of a channel for "letting a lot of bitterness out in a creative way." He adds: "The Negro is shedding himself of fear, and my real worry is how we will keep this fearlessness from rising to violent proportions."

Beyond King, a new wave of leaders has sprung up—the young, tough, and highly pragmatic apostles of the "student movement." Starting with some spontaneous sit-ins in North Carolina three years ago, the student activists have flourished and earned their combat stripes in Albany, Greenwood, and other battlegrounds. They have borrowed King's non-violent technique, but not his texts (they read Camus and Sartre more than the Bible and Gandhi) or his faith in the power of love. They find the church useful, if nothing else as a place to hold meetings and brace up their followers with prayer and song.

Means and Ends: They find the Muslims useful, too. "We invited them to speak at a mass meeting we held in Albany," says SNCC chairman Charles McDew, a square-built Brandeis University senior. "Did the people like it? Man, you better believe it." Some have even questioned whether integration is a Good Thing if it means accepting the values of white society. "We are working for desegregation, not integration," McDew says. "We want an open society without restriction based on color."

If at last non-violence fails, Negro leaders see peril ahead. Professionally, at least, they are optimistic about change. But they are fatalistic, too, about the cost of change. Many feel the battle will be tougher and more dangerous in the North than in the South, where both apartheid and the steps of progress against it are more visible. In the Northern ghetto, Whitney Young says, "the old signs and symbols are gone. The want ads don't say 'white only' any more. That the Negro could fight. But it's frustrating when the gap in housing, education, employment gets wider instead of narrower . . . Unless we do something, the Negro in the future will no longer react with resignation but with bitterness and hostility."

And those are the ingredients of trouble. "We're liable to get some real violence—in Chicago, in Detroit, in New York," Young predicts gloomily. "And it will be tragic. But historically this is the only time America tries to do something. When the bridge breaks, they'll try to repair it."

INTEGRATION:

Collision Course

Alabama's Gov. George C. Wallace and Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy are men bent on a collision course. Kennedy is coldly determined to enforce court orders to enroll qualified Negroes in the University of Alabama next fall. Wallace has hotly proclaimed he will "stand in the schoolhouse door."

They met and sized each other up one chill, overcast morning last week in the governor's office in Montgomery. As might be expected, they were as stiff-legged as stranger dogs and the conversation, while polite, was anything but friendly. The tape recorder that Wallace had unspooling on the floor behind his desk didn't help much. As Kennedy ruefully acknowledged after the hour and 22 minutes of talk, "We agreed at the end of it to disagree."

If the Attorney General anticipated anything else in his effort to head off a collision, disenchantment began soon after his plane touched down in Montgomery. Pickets carrying signs awaited him outside a television station where he was to be interviewed ("Koon Kissing Kennedy Go Home") and again in front of the Capitol ("Alabama Will Resist With Vigah"). Two defiant women put a floral wreath on the Capitol steps where Confederate President Jefferson Davis was sworn in.

"To keep the enemy off sacred ground," one explained. "Tomorrow is Confederate Memorial Day," said the other, "I just jumped the gun one day."

'Pugnacious Sapling?' "You say you are paying a courtesy visit," a reporter said, and then, referring to Wallace's campaign oratory, asked: "What do you think of a courtesy visit to a man who called you a pugnacious sapling?"

"I think he's entitled to his opinion," Kennedy replied.

At the end of a two-day Southern swing, whatever else he had accomplished, Kennedy had no illusions about Wallace's mood—or Alabama's political climate for the 1964 Presidential campaign. "Have you and your brother written Alabama off?" he was asked at one point. "No," he said, "I would say, however, I have seen some evidence of vice versa."

UPI

Alabama's State House: A new pickets' charge

JOURNEYS:

Broken Lance

William L. Moore, a husky, 35-year-old ex-Marine, had been obsessed for years by a utopian dream. He wanted to save the world. Armed with cardboard placards and picket signs, he tilted with equal fervor against the threats to peace from abroad and to liberty at home. Just last week Moore mounted his most quixotic crusade. He set out alone to persuade Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett that segregation is wrong.

To dramatize his mission, Moore—after taking leave from his job as a substitute letter carrier in Baltimore—walked to Washington, dropped off a letter informing President Kennedy of his plans, then took a bus to Chattanooga, Tenn. From there, he said, he would walk to Jackson, Miss., and personally deliver his plea for tolerance to Barnett.

It would be a long (350-mile) walk and, as friends reminded Moore, it could be a dangerous one. Along the way he would wear a two-sided sandwich sign bearing anti-segregation messages: "Equal rights for all (Mississippi or Bust)," and "Eat at Joe's—Both Black and White." Even before he left Chattanooga, a Negro ripped a fragment—the part bearing the word "black"—from his placard. "[He] said the word should be 'colored'," Moore wrote of the incident in the 15-cent memo pad in which he kept a diary of the trip. Moore also noted that a white woman working in a milkshake stand wished him luck. "She said, 'I hope you make it'," Moore wrote. "I said, 'I hope so too if the niggers don't get me.' She said, 'No, I think the whites will get you'."

Associated Press

Moore: Death of a dreamer

A Warm Place: In the early days, the hike brought nothing more serious than blistered heels. And for Moore, indeed, it had a curious sentimental overlay. Though born in Binghamton, N.Y., he spent his early boyhood in Mississippi. "I have always had a warm place in my heart for Mississippi," Moore wrote in the letter he hoped to deliver to Barnett. "I dislike the reputation this state has . . . as . . . the most backward and most bigoted in the land. Those who truly love Mississippi must work to change this image."

Occasionally Moore ran up against overt demonstrations of hostility. Some Georgians yelled "nigger lover" at him from a passing car. Some Alabamians threw rocks from a distance. But he also met friendliness. At Rising Fawn, Ga., an elderly lady—noticing the two-wheel wire grocery cart in which he hauled his belongings—asked, "What's that you're selling?" "Integration," Moore replied.

When he approached Gadsden, Ala., there were ominous warnings. Once Moore chatted with a few men who had heard news of his walk on television. "They didn't think I'd finish my walk alive," he recorded in his diary. Later, a sheriff, stopping to ask how long he had been on the road, voiced a similar fear. Still later, Moore wrote: "A couple of men who had talked to me before drove up and questioned my religious and political beliefs. And one was sure I'd be killed for them." Even so, Moore's diary expressed concern only about his sore feet. "Shoes too painful," said the 5 p.m. entry that day. "Walking without them."

Increasingly, the hike was becoming the act of a saint or a madman—and Moore had some credentials for both roles. He had spent two years in Binghamton State Hospital for a mental disorder shortly after his 1952 graduation in economics from Harpur College near Binghamton. The stay produced his book, "The Mind in Chains—The Autobiography of a Schizophrenic," in which Moore asserted his compelling wish to "save the world." It closed with his appeal to be heeded: "Whether I go forward as Don Quixote chasing his windmill or as the pilgrim progressing, must be left for you to decide . . . I can only give my life."

So Kind: William Moore had barely walked out of the hamlet of Keener, Ala.—after a supper of corn and pecan pie—when he did just that. At 9 p.m., a mile south, a southbound motorist spotted his body sprawled on the shoulder of the two-lane blacktop highway. Blood still flowed from .22-caliber bullet wounds, one in the head, another in the neck. Police found $50.15 in his pockets, and, in his two-wheel cart, his shoes, and the diary with its last entry: "Adopted by hungry, thirsty, roadfoolish dog[illegible]y kids adopt dogs." "I don't know why [illegible]y-one would want to hurt him," said his wife in Binghamton, mother of his three stepchildren. "He was so kind."

Within hours, the man nobody would listen to was getting priority attention from the White House down. President Kennedy denounced the "outrageous crime." Alabama arch-segregationist Gov. George Wallace offered a $1,000 reward for a solution to the "dastardly" act. And local authorities moved with remarkable swiftness, collaring two suspects and calling in FBI help.

William Moore, his life done with the world still unsaved, had at least started something in death. As the week ended, two organizations—the Student Non-

The U.S. Gets an Inside View of Soviet Strategy

Like the generals in the U.S. Pentagon, Soviet strategists have been split by argument over whether to downgrade conventional armament in favor of nuclear weapons; the slogan "more rubble for the ruble" parallels the case for "more bang for the buck." And in high Soviet strategy, just as in the current U.S. doctrine, there has recently been a shift back to more reliance on traditional hardware to fight non-nuclear wars.

These are among the major insights drawn by U.S. strategic thinkers from a remarkable book, "Soviet Military Strategy," written by a committee of fourteen top Russian military writers and edited by Marshal V.D. Sokolovsky, the tall, dapper ex-Chief of the General Staff of the Soviet Army and Navy. Newly available in the United States, the volume discusses Soviet conceptions of a future war, the role of nuclear weapons and missile forces, the importance of the first strike, targeting concepts, the organization of the Soviet armed forces, and the Kremlin's realistic assessment of Western strength.

Sovfoto

Sokolovsky

The book is so unusual it has inspired three U.S. versions: a Georgetown University analysis, to be published by Duell, Sloan and Pearce; a translation by the Air Force's Foreign Technology Division with an introduction by Soviet affairs expert Raymond L. Garthoff (Praeger. 396 pages. $6.50); and a Rand Corp. translation liberally annotated by three top Rand thinkers, Herbert S. Dinerstein, Leon Gouré, and Thomas W. Wolfe (Prentice-Hall. 544 pages. $7.50).

The work does not speak with one voice. Many of its statements seem unclear, ambiguous, or contradictory. Perhaps the most significant omission, according to the Rand experts, is the failure, either by design or otherwise, "to lay out a promising formula for winning a war against the United States, if such a war should have to be fought." Still, "Soviet Military Strategy" inevitably claims a place on the reading list of U.S. planners.

These key points emerge, as read between the lines by top U.S. Sovietologists:

▶Despite standard Soviet doctrine that small wars will spread into a general war "if the nuclear powers are drawn into it," some of the Soviet strategists suggest that "small-scale local wars" need not necessarily escalate. In any event, they view nuclear warfare somberly, in terms far removed from usual military talk, e.g., "this kind of war entails a tremendous risk of mutual annihilation."

▶The Russian authors believe that bombers will eventually be replaced by missiles, although "aircraft still have not completely exhausted their combat potential." Surprisingly, they argue that destruction of American aircraft carriers is more important than wiping out Polaris submarines.

▶They admit that "one must recognize that the present instrumentalities of nuclear attack are undoubtedly superior to the instruments of defense against them," but they urge an active and increased air-defense system and civil defense.

In a sidelight, the authors touch on a widely felt fear: accidental nuclear war. "In a frenzied arms race, there is serious danger that even a small miscalculation by the statesmen of one country or another can lead to . . . a new war . . . Malfunction in the operation of a radar system can cause an incorrect interpretation of instrument readings and lead to the beginning of military activities. A misunderstood command, or the mental derangement of an American pilot on a routine flight in a bomber loaded with nuclear bombs . . . a defect in the electronic equipment of armed missile combat systems can . . . lead to the beginning of a war. All of this requires the greatest vigilance of our armed forces and enormous wisdom and sagacity of national, political, and military leadership so that a war is not allowed to start for any such accidental reasons."

'Realistic Presentation': One of the more arresting features of the book, say the Rand experts, "is the realistic presentation it gives of U.S. military power, mainly by bringing together in one place a considerable body of cold figures on U.S. forces" (162 ICBM's, 105 IRBM's, 96 Polaris missiles in 1962; 1,040 ICBM's, 560 IRBM's, 656 Polaris missiles, plus hundreds of bombers, in 1966). The authors draw heavily on the Pentagon's statistics, and on such U.S. military thinkers as Prof. Henry A. Kissinger ("Nuclear Weapons and Foreign Policy"), Bernard Brodie ("Strategy in the Missile Age"), and Gen. Maxwell Taylor ("The Uncertain Trumpet"). "Never before has American military might been so fully revealed to the Soviet public," says Garthoff.

"Although U.S. intentions are distorted in characteristic Communist fashion," say the Rand analysts, "the image of the U.S. that emerges from the work suggests a considerable degree of Soviet responsiveness to changes in Western strategic thinking and military posture."

Which is to say that hardheaded Red generals seem well aware of the true military power of the United States—and equally aware of what nuclear war would do to Russia.

R+R Rel.

May 9, 1963 SA/MA

For further information call:

Friendship House
4233 South Indiana Avenue
Chicago 53, Illinois
(OAkland 4-7700)

Miss Betty Plank

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

INTERRACIAL HOME VISITS
ENDORSED BY PRESIDENT KENNEDY;
NATIONAL HOME VISITS DAY TO FOLLOW.

CHICAGO --- "It IS being done in Washington, D.C., Mr. President," Betty Plank, field director of Friendship House's interracial visiting program, announced today.

"It" was interracial home visits. President Kennedy, at his news conference yesterday, was queried on the value of a national program of white and Negro families visiting in each others' homes. "It would be very helpful and I think it should start right here in Washington, D.C."

"Operation Friendship" in Knoxville, Tennessee, was the program which elicited the presidential comment. It was sponsored May 5 by a group of Knoxville ministers.

The president's recommendation prompted Friendship House to advance the release of an announcement of its newest project, a national Home Visit Day, scheduled for Sunday, October 27. Besides the existing local committees presently cooperating with Friendship House on its Home Visit program, Friendship House will also encourage cooperation in other cities by interested groups.

Interracial home visits began in the Washington, D.C. area last October. The city is one of over 40 in the country where Friendship House, Catholic interracial organization with national headquarters here, has helped to start this program it developed back in 1955 and pioneered, locally and nationwide.

In its interracial Home Visiting program, Friendship House encourages free and open discussion of racial issues between the white and Negro participants of comparable background. Because the visits are aimed at challenging racial stereotypes about Negroes and illustrating from Negroe's personal experiences the extent of discrimination, most of the visits have been held in Negro homes.

Friendship House's national center here acts as a clearing house of information on the Home Visit program, including putting interested people in other areas in contact with each other. It provides a service of

( more )

FRIENDSHIP HOUSE
4233 South Indiana Avenue
Chicago 53, Illinois

NON-PROFIT ORG.
U.S.Postage PAID
Chicago, Ill.
Permit No.4493

DATED
ANNOUNCEMENT

SHOULD START HERE - SAYS - J.F.K.

Leslie W. Dunbar
5 Forsyth St.N.W.
Atlanta 3, Ga.

consultation in person or by mail, "how to do it" literature and tape recordings of discussions at conferences on the program, summer study weekends featuring actual participation in a Visit, frequent articles in Friendship House's monthly magazine COMMUNITY on growth and development of the national effort as well as analyses of various aspects of the technique.

Friendship House has assisted religious and secular groups, interfaith committees, private and civic human relations agencies, and ordinary citizens wanting to help eliminate racial discrimination at the grass roots level.

In January Friendship House provided this service, and its local Chicago committee was co-sponsor with Protestant and Jewish groups for a metropolitan-wide mass Interracial Home Visit Day that brought 2,500 white visitors to the homes of 500 middle-class Negro hosts. In March, the same interfaith committee arranged a second mass Visit Day, with a similar number of hosts — this time, white — inviting in white neighbors and leading a discussion with Negro guests on equal housing opportunities.

Recently a service-by-mail was provided by Friendship House to the sponsors of a city-wide visiting Sunday May 5 in Des Moines, Iowa, for 500 white visitors to 65 Negro homes. The Human Relations Commission and the National Conference of Christians and Jews of Des Moines cooperated in conducting the visit.

At the National Conference on Religion and Race held in Chicago in January, the Interracial Home Visit program was among the official recommendations.

###

NOTE TO EDITORS: Cities where Interracial Home Visits have been held in cooperation with Friendship House —

Akron, O.
Aurora, Ill.
Boston, Mass.
Buffalo, N.Y.
Cedar Rapids, Ia.
Champaign, Ill.
Chicago, Ill.
Cleveland, O.
College Park, Md.
Columbus, O.
Covington, Ky.
Davenport, Ia.
Dayton, O.
Des Moines, Ia.
Downers Grove, Ill.
Fort Wayne, Ind.
Franklin, Pa.
Gary, Ind.
Glencoe, Ill.
Harvey, Ill.
Joliet, Ill.
Kansas City, Mo.
Kokomo, Ind.
Leavenworth, Kans.
Los Angeles, Cal.
Louisville, Ky.
Milwaukee, Wisc.
Minneapolis - St. Paul, Minn.
Napa, Cal.
New York, N.Y.
Omaha, Neb.
Peoria, Ill.
Providence, R.I.
Rockford, Ill.
San Diego, Cal.
South Bend, Ind.
Terre Haute, Ind.
Topeka, Kans.
Warren, O.
Washington, D.C.
Waukegan, Ill.

and in several Southern cities where those conducting the visits are not making them public at present.

R+R Rel

I think these phrases real insight into the events of today and tomorrow.

Era Of The Negro Passion

MIAMI NEWS May 11, '63 By ERIC SEVAREID

By its dominant voices, its most unforgettable faces and its chief acts of bravery does a generation recognize itself and history mark it.

SEVAREID

For America, this post - war period is surely the era of the Negro Passion. The most moving voices are now those of Negroes; the most searing, lasting words are put on paper by Negro writers; their music is the American music most penetrating and persuasive to other parts of the world; no cause is now so fundamental to the health and integrity of this society as the Negro cause; of no other leaders are so much stamina and courage demanded as are now required of Negro leaders.

★ ★ ★

They are bound to win, somehow, not only because their present aims are so limited and unarguable, but because they have succeeded in involving us all, whoever we are, wherever we live within the national frontiers. They have caught the attention of the whole American people and, more than that, they have caught up the conscience of the whole people, however many of us may try to deny this to ourselves.

This generation is not likely to find surcease from the Negro Passion; its source springs and the resistance to it are too deeply grounded for easy resolution, and its present outburst too long delayed. Its more violent manifestations are not going to be confined to the deep South. The head of black steam building up in places like New York, Washington and Chicago are finding outlets too few and too small, at the present rate, for the permanent avoidance of combustion.

It is not when the oppression is most complete that revolutions begin to revolve, but when concessions are given, hopes are born, light is glimpsed at the end of the dark tunnel.

★ ★ ★

The time is coming, soon, when the Negro Passion will truly dominate American politics. It is going to change the prism through which we consider the problems of far-off nations; romanticism will have to give way to realism. Liberalism of the academic or cafe society brand — the motivations of those who rhapsodize over the Peace Corpsmen in Ethiopia or journey 6,000 miles to sit at the feet of Dr. Schweitzer, but who would never dream of visiting the night police court in their own city and observing the tragedy of the American Negro — such impulses are going to lose their present status in the hierarchy of the virtues. There will be a noticeable dearth of hiding places for those professing belief either in their religion or the American Constitution.

★ ★ ★

An education in the facts of life and history is in store for those pained by the messy contradictions built in to the Negro Passion. Those bewildered at the Negro uprising ("after all, they had made a lot of progress") may learn that this is one of the eternal lessons from past rebellions against oppression. It is not when the oppression is most complete that these revolutions begin to revolve, but when concessions are given, hopes are born, light is glimpsed at the end of the dark tunnel. It is when an oppressed people feels close to its goal, not far off from it, that their action becomes frenetic.

Those who are cynical or upset by the moral duality in the Negro phenomenon, by the spectacle of lofty courage and self-sacrifice among the Negro leaders, side by side with the spectacle of spreading crime and moral squalor in the slum-bound masses of the Negro poor, may learn that the first is a direct reflection of the second, its natural, not its unnatural partner. Desperation, like war, ennobles some among its victims and debases others. No true people's revolution was ever neat, clean or devoid of sad anomalies.

5/20/63 MD, LWD, PA, JT

of justice, which is and always has been the spirit of American Nation.

Please accept enclosed copies of the letters, which we send to Congressman SMITH and four Colorado Congressmen. Thank you.

Respectfully yours,

ROSS KUZMYCH,
President, Denver Branch of U.C.C.A.

---

CHICAGO, April 1963.

Hon. Congressman DANIEL J. FLOOD,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Please forgive me for calling upon you and asking you to do something for my unfortunate country.

The American Government, according to my knowledge, has consented to have the case of Hungary taken off the calendar of the United Nations and have same entrusted to the Secretary of same organization. I am acknowledging this fact with sorrow; the matter is not in the proper hands. After past performance, I have my doubt about this person. My fears are not only concerning the fate of Hungary, but I feel that all the enslaved peoples behind the Iron Curtain will loose their hope to a legal and just settlement of their future.

I would like to ask you to use your influence at the White House and all over to have a House and Senate committee set up at the earliest possible date to keep a continuous vigil over the fate of the captive nations.

Please accept my sincere thanks for your kind help, I, remain.

Cordially yours,

HALMAY JANOS,
Former Member of the Hungarian Parliament.

---

Integrity, Devotion to Duty Mark the Honored Career of Senator Spessard Holland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. PAUL G. ROGERS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 20, 1963

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, every Member of the House and Senate who has worked with Senator SPESSARD HOLLAND on legislative matters, or who has come to know him on a more personal basis, holds him in the highest regard.

The members of the Florida congressional delegation have just reason to be proud of the distinguished service of Florida's Senior U.S. Senator.

Senator HOLLAND has served the citizens of Florida as a county judge, State legisaltor, and Governor of Florida prior to coming to Washington. He devotes his full time and energy to his duties and has earned the respect of all who know him.

Editor Jack Gore of the Fort Lauderdale News took editorial note of some of the qualities exemplified by Senator HOLLAND, on the occasion of a dinner given in honor of the Senator by the Fort Lauderdale Historical Society.

Because Mr. Gore puts into words the feelings of so many of us who know and greatly admire Senator HOLLAND, I, under unanimous consent, include his editorial in the RECORD:

INTEGRETY, DEVOTION TO DUTY MARK THE HONORED CAREER OF SENATOR SPESSARD HOLLAND

In this day and age when so many of our political leaders and public servants are under a steady drumfire of criticism for words and actions which are hardly in the public interest, it is truly refreshing to see an outstanding person in public life given the credit he deserves.

Such was the case here Monday night when Florida's senior Senator, SPESSARD L. HOLLAND, was guest of honor at the Fort Lauderdale Historical Society's annual dinner, and was paid the high tribute he has so well earned from more than a dozen different organizations.

Senator HOLLAND's career in public life is long and varied. He has been a judge, a prosecutor, a State Senator, Governor of this State and now senior Senator. He is a native-born Floridian and all during his years of active service in behalf of the people we cannot recall a single incidence where the hot breath of scandal ever touched him.

If Senator HOLLAND has a mission in life we sincerely believe it can be summed up in his desire to be truly informed on the issues he is called upon to decide so that when he finally makes up his mind as to the course of action he will follow, that decision is based upon facts, upon sound reasoning and upon the conviction that what he does is in the best interest of those he represents.

It takes but one visit to Senator HOLLAND's office in Washington to realize that here is one of the hardest working men in the U.S. Senate today. As a member of several of the most important Senate committees he has a job that goes far beyond merely appearing on the floor and taking part in the sometimes long and acrid debates that mark the deliberations of this body.

Much of a Congressman's work these days is involved in committee hearings where vital legislation is first considered; where public testimony for and against the legislation is taken, and where a limited number of legislators act as the eyes, the ears and sometimes the conscience of the entire House or the entire Senate.

That Senator HOLLAND performs this work well can easily be ascertained by the stellar reputation he enjoys among his fellow Senators. He is not a publicity seeker as so many are in Washington these days. He is quite spoken and seldom aroused to anger but when his temper is aroused over what he considers to be a particularly bad piece of legislation he can be a most articulate and most effective objector to it.

What Senator HOLLAND was honored for here Monday, however, was not particularly his fine work in the Senate but for the major role he played in the acquisition and development of Hugh Taylor Birch State Park and Everglades National Park.

It was during Senator HOLLAND's term as Governor of Florida that Hugh Taylor Birch, then drawing near to the end of a most productive life, conceived the idea of deeding some of the extensive property holdings he had acquired here to the State for park purposes. It was on Pearl Harbor Day in 1941 that Governor Holland first came to Fort Lauderdale to talk to Mr. Birch about this idea. Because of Mr. Birch's advanced age, there were many difficulties that had to be worked out and many legal technicalities to overcome but after months of negotiations the gift was finally consummated, thus bringing into being what has since become one of the most heavily used State parks in our entire system.

Senator HOLLAND played an even more vigorous role in the creation of Everglades National Park as his desire to donate State-owned lands to the Federal Government for development as a national recreational area was bitterly opposed by his own attorney general. Despite legislative approval of the transfer, the attorney general refused to sign the required deeds and even filed a court suit to block the transfer. He failed to do so, however, and then Governor Holland and other devoted supporters of the national park idea took on the task of convincing Federal park officials they had an admirable site for a great national park and should lose no time in starting its development.

Today Senator HOLLAND's foresight in this respect has been well justified. Everglades National Park, despite its relatively short existence, is already bringing many sportsmen and visitors to this State to take advantage of its facilities and its popularity and reputation is growing with each passing year.

With these accomplishments under his belt it is no wonder his fellow Floridians gathered here Monday night to pay Senator HOLLAND the honor and the tribute he so richly deserves. It is men of his caliber, his integrity and devotion to duty and principles that keep our political system from falling into complete disrepute, and we only wish there were more men like him in the Congress and in other high places of Government.

JACK W. GORE.

---

R & R Rel.

The Era of the Negro Movement

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ADAM C. POWELL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 20, 1963

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

[From the Evening Star, WASHINGTON, D.C., May 14, 1963]

THE ERA OF THE NEGRO MOVEMENT—RACIAL ISSUE BELIEVED GIVING THE TIMES THEIR IDENTIFYING MARK IN HISTORY

(By Eric Sevareid)

By its dominant voices, its most unforgettable faces and its chief acts of bravery does [illegible] generation recognize itself and history mark it.

For America this postwar period is [illegible] the era of the Negro passion. The most moving voices are now those of Negroes; the most searing, lasting words are put on paper by Negro writers; their music is the American music most penetrating and persuasive to other parts of the world; no cause is now so fundamental to the health and integrity of this society as the Negro cause; of no other leaders are so much stamina and courage demanded as are now required of Negro leaders.

They are bound to win, somehow, not only because their present aims are so limited and unarguable, but because they have succeeded in involving us all, whoever we are, wherever we live within the Nation's frontiers. They have caught the attention of the whole American people and more than that, they have caught up the conscience of the whole people, however many of us may try to deny this to ourselves. A newspaper or television picture of a snarling police dog set upon a human being is recorded in the permanent photo-electric file of every human brain.

This generation is not likely to find surcease from the Negro passion; its source springs and the resistance to it are too deeply grounded for easy resolution, and its present outburst too long delayed. Its more violent manifestations are not going to be confined to the Deep South. The head of black steam building up in places like New York, Washington, and Chicago are finding outlets too few and too small, at the present rate, for the permanent avoidance of combustion.

Because this unfolding drama involves the automatic reflexes of the instinctive sense of justice, because it involves namable, hearable, countable individual persons of flesh and blood, it is going to dwarf the general and social pageants of this domestic era, whether they be the struggles to nationalize the inchoate megalopolis, to preserve the open spaces, to eradicate a disease, to "conquer" space, or whatever.

This time is coming soon when the Negro passion will truly dominate American politics. It is going to change the prism through which we consider the problems of far-off nations; romanticism will have to give way to realism. Liberalism of the academic or cafe society brand—the motivations of those who rhapsodize over the Peace Corpsmen in Ethiopia or journey 6,000 miles to sit at the feet of Dr. Schweitzer, but who would never dream of visiting the night police court in their own city and observing the impulses are going to lose their present status in the hierarchy of the virtues. There will be a noticeable dearth of hiding places for those professing belief either in their religion or the American Constitution.

An education in the facts of life and history is in store for those pained by the messy contradictions built into the Negro passion. Those bewildered at the Negro uprising ("after all, they had made a lot of progress") may learn that this is one of the eternal lessons from past rebellions against oppression. It is not when the oppression is most complete that these revolutions begin to revolve, but when concessions are given, hopes are born, light is glimpsed at the end of the dark tunnel. It is when an oppressed people feels close to its goal, not far off from it, that their action becomes frenetic.

Those who are cynical or upset by the moral duality in the Negro phenomen, by the spectacle of lofty courage and self-sacrifice among the Negro leaders, side by side with the spectacle of spreading crime and moral squalor in the slum-bound masses of the Negro poor, may learn that the first is a direct reflection of the second, its natural, not its unnatural partner. Desperation, like war, ennobles some among its victims and debases others. No true people's revolution was ever neat, clean or devoid of sad anomalies.

If the Negro passion of today is not a true peoples revolution, it is as close to one as we have ever known in our land.

Results of the First Arkansas District Poll on Various Issues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. C. GATHINGS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 20, 1963

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, people have an eye on Washinton. This is indicated by the increased participation in the survey taken in the 10-county eastern Arkansas district on significant issues confronting Congress.

There was a 17 percent questionnaire return as against 14 percent in the district in 1962.

Many comments were added by penned views or separate letter dealing with the subjects covered. The newspapers and radio stations aided the effort.

The questions asked and replies received in percentages follow:

| | Percent | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| | Yes | No | No opinion |
| DOMESTIC PROGRAMS | | | |
| Do you favor or oppose— | | | |
| (1) Domestic Peace Corps? | 24 | 58 | 18 |
| (2) Armed services pay increase? | 41 | 44 | 15 |
| (3) Federal aid to assist cities to establish and operate mass transit systems? | 15 | 76 | 9 |
| (4) Tax reduction if coupled with equal reduction in Federal spending? | 90 | 8 | 2 |
| (5) An increase in the national debt limit above the present $308,000,000,000 to finance the proposed tax reduction and additional costs of the Federal Government? | 10 | 86 | 4 |
| (6) Compulsory medical care for aged citizens tied to social security? | 11 | 85 | 5 |
| (7) Federal aid for public schools? | 24 | 71 | 5 |
| (8) Tax credits to parents for college tuition costs? | 68 | 29 | 3 |
| (9) Spending vast sums of money to be the first to put a man on the moon? | 10 | 82 | 8 |
| (10) President Kennedy's handling of the Office of Chief Executive? | 20 | 66 | 14 |
| FOREIGN PROGRAMS | | | |
| Do you favor or oppose— | | | |
| (1) Expansion of foreign Peace Corps? | 24 | 63 | 13 |
| (2) Full support of United Nations? | 39 | 50 | 11 |
| (3) Maintaining of foreign aid program at about present level? | 21 | 69 | 10 |
| (4) Substantial or sizable reduction in foreign aid? | 80 | 12 | 7 |

Agriculture at the Washington Level

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT T. SECREST

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 20, 1963

Mr. SECREST. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Robert M. Koch, president, National Limestone Institute, Inc., before the Cleveland Farmers' Club, Affiliate, Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, May 10, 1963:

AGRICULTURE AT THE WASHINGTON LEVEL

I am very pleased to have the opportunity to visit with you this afternoon about the topic which has been assigned to me—"Agriculture at the Washington Level."

May I begin by supplementing the material already sent you about me. Not so much that you are necessarily interested in me, but rather to help you evaluate some of my comments. After my initial training and experience in several agricultural fields, I became affiliated with what we commonly call a "trade association." I currently represent over 550 limestone producers and, as I am sure you know, it is a very able member of our executive committee, Bob Bemis, of your city, who is responsible for my being here today.

While our members are very much interested in the Nation's highway program, and while we service them in this area as well as in the field of taxation and other areas of interest to American businessmen, I am, of course, not going to discuss these subjects this afternoon.

During the course of my work, it is my privilege to travel all over this Nation of ours and come in contact with people from all walks of life in all of our States. Practically everyone realizes that agriculture is in trouble. It seems to me that the overwhelming majority of people in this Nation today feel that it because of the "meddling of Washington" in the farmers' business that we are having these difficulties. And, I venture to say that the majority of people in this Nation feel that the quicker the Washington officials turn the agricultural business over to the farmers of the Nation—and, as they say "leave them alone"—some sense can be made out of a chaotic condition. Furthermore, many feel this would save the taxpayer literally billions of dollars.

Of course, nothing could be further from the truth. If Washington should abdicate its responsibility to the American farmer tomorrow, I am sure everyone in this room realizes that the depression of the early thirties would seem like a mild dip, compared to what would happen if the farmers were turned into the marketplace for the answer to the present problem.

So much has been said and reported about the very few number of farmers needed today to produce the food and fiber we need that the majority of the people, with whom I come in contact, have the impression that agriculture is a very small part of our economy. Do you realize that the agricultural materials produced in this country last year grossed $20 billion? Mineral materials grossed another $20 billion. And all other materials added up to $5 billion. If the value of pasture were added in and if the finished value of livestock, rather than the feed value, were used, agriculture would clearly be in the lead.

Our Nation's farmers are the largest consumers of steel, the largest consumers of rubber and I could go on with a great many other items.

Today the average American farmer produces enough food and fiber to feed and clothe 27 other persons. Seven years ago 1 farmer could provide for 20 persons. Twenty years ago the ratio was 1 farmer to 11 persons. As Secretary Freeman has so aptly put it, this is the outstanding success story of the American economy. One farmer today in 1 hour can produce what four farmers could produce in the same time shortly after World War I. The same farmer increased his productivity three times as fast as the worker in industry between 1947 and 1958.

Here we have a group of people who are only 8 percent of our work force, providing for 92 percent who engage in other activities. In Europe 25 to 30 percent of the working people are farmers. In Russia 45 percent of the people work on the farms to provide the necessary food and fiber.

What does this mean to the American consumer? The average American consumer will use only 19 percent of his earnings to buy food. This is the lowest figure at any time in our history and lower than any other Nation. Just 10 years ago food accounted for over 23 percent of the average family income. Putting it another way, the average factory worker can today purchase his monthly food needs with just 37 hours of work. Ten years ago it took 51 hours of work to purchase the same amount of food. Shortly after World War II, the worker had to put in 61 hours for the same monthly food basket. In most other nations in the world food costs take 40 to 50 percent of the average worker's wage. And in some nations, as you know, food costs are so great that they leave very little income for the family to spend. In fact two-thirds of the

Life - May 24 '63

EDITORIAL

SB

Beyond Rights the Issue of Human Dignity

The Negro himself no longer believes in the good faith of white Americans—if, indeed, he ever could have.
JAMES BALDWIN, The Fire Next Time, 1963

The race problem has taken on a new dimension which directly concerns every American, and the disturbing observations of the eloquent Negro essayist James Baldwin (see pp. 81–90) sum it up as well as anything yet said. The Birmingham riots did not add the new dimension; they merely supplied proof that it existed. Very recently the Negro's fight for equality has achieved powerful new thrust. The word "now" has, for him, a more immediate meaning than it had six months ago, let alone nine years ago when the Supreme Court desegregated the schools in law at least. There is a new impatience in the land, a new cynicism among Negroes toward established legal procedures in the light of past disappointments. This is true both in the South and in the North, where discrimination works more subtly than it does in Birmingham but still frustrates the Negro.

As for Birmingham, it's a tough city. It did not even exist at the time of the Civil War, but it has long had the reputation of being the worst big city in the South in the area of race relations. Possibly because of its industrial character, it has a lot of hard-nosed types, both black and white. It has also had head-in-the-sand political leadership. Considering what is going on in this country, not to mention the rest of the world, the segregationist pronouncements of Alabama's Governor Wallace and Birmingham's Public Safety Commissioner "Bull" Connor sound positively ichthyosaurian.

But Wallace and Connor are not all of Alabama, any more than young toughs are the whole of the Birmingham Negro community. The fact that moderate white businessmen moved with resolution to reach an accommodation with Dr. Martin Luther King underscores this point. Until segregation bombs blasted the home of Dr. King's brother and a Negro motel there was—in spite of Bull Connor's police dogs—an element of restraint on both sides. And even after the bombings a great many whites and Negroes worked, at much personal risk, all one desperate night to get the riots under control. Birmingham city police acquitted themselves with considerable credit in coping with outright hooliganism. And a day later Dr. King was visiting poolrooms to repeat his warning to the Negroes: "Violence is not only immoral but impractical."

Even if the agreements hammered out by Negroes and whites in Birmingham can be made to stick in the face of widespread white hostility and open Negro skepticism, impatience will make itself felt elsewhere, and not just in the Deep South either. The fallout effects of Birmingham quickly showed as flash Negro violence took place in Nashville, Chicago and New York. Therefore there is a terrible urgency for all citizens to understand how the problem has changed.

The drive to achieve equality has united Negroes, but the argument about ways and means also set some of their leaders against one another. The Negro's feeling that the white man's law has failed him is polarized by extreme black nationalists who deny they advocate violence but preach a doctrine which may bring it about. They express contempt for the efforts of men like King and the N.A.A.C.P.'s Roy Wilkins to achieve a solution within the constitutional framework. The distinguished Atlanta publisher Ralph McGill, writing in the New York Herald Tribune, warns, "One of these days the South, even Birmingham, will be grateful to Dr. King. If a real hater—a Black Muslim—had come along with Dr. King's power of speech and personality, the South long ago would have been bloodstained."

Many people, including the U.S. Attorney General, have criticized Dr. King's timing and tactics in organizing the Birmingham demonstrations over the past few weeks—that is, maybe he should have waited. McGill flatly disagrees. "There has been enough waiting," he says. Actually the Negro goals in Birmingham are so minimal that the argument for "waiting" seems pointless. The right to lunch at a counter in the same store which will sell a black man a suit of clothes but (until now) not a hot dog; the right to compete for a better job on the basis of individual talent; the right to participate in the democratic process by casting a ballot; the right simply to move around in society—these are rights so basic, so axiomatic, that they just ought not to be questioned by decent men.

Dr. King's demonstrations did take place in violation of Birmingham's parade ordinance. But the technical legal infraction was far outweighed by the broader right of citizens in a free society to assemble peaceably to seek redress of grievances. Gandhi, influenced by the writings of Tolstoy and Thoreau, forged passive resistance into a weapon which forced the confrontation of an issue in India. Dr. King did much the same in Birmingham. "Nonviolent direct action" made the whole community—and nation—hear him, and ugly Negro violence exploded only after the whites started throwing bombs.

Through some alchemy which the headlines both illuminate and obfuscate, the problem of how white and Negro Americans are to live with one another in nationhood has moved beyond the law into the area of human relations as such. It may be that the lawmakers, as distinct from the law enforcers, have done for the Negro about all they can. There is a limit to what anybody's law can do. It can safeguard the elementary rights of citizens and enforce the decisions of the courts. But the law cannot make white and black Americans get to know one another. That is still the American dilemma which Gunnar Myrdal explored in his classic treatise 19 years ago—how we get to know one another as individuals.

No white American can really claim to know the Negro as an individual. Whatever his business dealings and personal associations, he cannot possibly know what it is to be a Negro in America. In the South the barrier of caste intervenes. In the North the urbanized Negro, probably to a greater extent than is true in the South, is a faceless man swallowed up in the black community. His white neighbor's conscience is tranquilized by words like "tolerance" and "integration"—words which are no longer meaningful enough.

If, by some miracle, complete integration were achieved in the U.S. overnight, we would still have ethnic and cultural minorities. The glory of the American system is that it has been able to accommodate minorities in a climate which permitted individuals to profit from knowing one another. In that climate the Negro has profited least and suffered most. Beyond "integration" the individual Negro needs to have his essential human dignity confirmed. After he has gained the basic rights of citizenship already stated in law for all Americans it will be confirmed. It is the clear obligation of white Americans not to impede this process but to hasten its fulfillment.

AT A CRUCIAL TIME A NEGRO TALKS TOUGH

'There's a bill due that has to be paid'

I've been here 350 years but you've never seen me," said the frail, gnomelike Negro of 38. James Baldwin spoke from a New Orleans church pulpit (right) but he was talking to a lay audience, mostly white, and he was giving them hell. He spoke both as one Negro and as his race's voice against the rigid attitudes of white men's fears and judgments: "I represent sin, love, death, sex, hell, terror and other things too frightening for you to recognize."

This was a new role for Baldwin, whose main occupation has been writing probing novels (Go Tell It on the Mountain, Giovanni's Room, Another Country) and articulate, somewhat specialized essays on the Negro in America. For 10 years his novels sold well, his essays were accorded respectful criticism, and Baldwin swam around fairly anonymously in the intellectual fishbowls of New York and Paris.

Then early this year a searing essay he wrote for The New Yorker was combined with a gentle letter to one of his nephews, and became a bestselling book called The Fire Next Time. So intuitively does it dissect the nation's explosive race problem that Baldwin found himself a celebrity overnight. He also, reluctantly but doggedly, found himself on a whistle-stop speaking tour. Part of what he saw, and much of what he pungently remarked en route, appear here with an appraisal of the Baldwin appeal by a LIFE reporter who went along (p. 86B).

"There's a bill that's been due in this country for a long time. Now, with Birmingham, it's come in and it's got to be paid.

The spinelessness of the Administration has had a terrible effect. It's incumbent on Washington now to take a moral position and stop playing politics.

As soon as we are discontent with what you've told us is our "place," we destroy your myth of the happy nigger, the noble savage, the shiftless, watermelon-eating darkie."

CONTINUED

The morning after a talk he gave in Durham, N.C., Baldwin went around paying impromptu visits in Negro homes. This boy, abandoned by his parents, was being looked after by neighbors.

'If you say God is white

'I'm not better because I'm black, but if you say God is white why shouldn't I say he's black? The question isn't whether you're as good as white people but whether you're a man.

White people have no particular belief in God or interest in love but they do have a fantastic desire to be safe.

Why I should want to marry your daughter, knowing the family as I do, is a curious question —but if she and I wanted to, we'd have every right in the world to do so. Actually I don't want to marry your daughter. I just want to get you off my back.

White people seem to ask us, if they ask us anything, "Come into my nightmare with me; be like me; have abortions like me instead of illegitimate children." But we don't want to be like you. There is no reason whatever for Negroes to want to enter white society.

At Xavier University in New Orleans, Baldwin, who prefers young audiences because "they ask real questions," makes one of dozens of addresses he has given since January.

At a Manhattan party (below) he waggles a finger at Actress Geraldine Page, sitting with Actor Rip Torn. At bottom, he is told by Negro girl: "You're not my spokesman, James Baldwin!"

I can say he's black'

Nobody should have voted in the last election: both the candidates should have gone to Hollywood.

I know you didn't own a plantation or rape my grandmother, but I wasn't bought at auction either and you still treat me as if I had been.

The Black Muslims serve one extremely useful function: they scare white people. Otherwise they are just another racist organization and the only place they can go is to disaster.❦

Photographed for LIFE by STEVE SCHAPIRO

CONTINUED

'Today our children are drifting toward disaster'

In New Orleans, Baldwin pauses to talk with children on Dumaine Street. Below, he visits Emile Armstrong, 7, one of his school's first two integrated children, who shows his workbook and tells Baldwin he wants to be an engineer.

"White and black, most of us have arrived at a point where we don't know what to tell our children. The framework in which we operate weighs almost too heavily to be borne, and it is about to kill us.

We're taught from grammar school up to accept segregation as a way of life. You lied to me, because you never intended that I should be free, and I lied to you because I pretended that was all right. Small wonder our children are emotionally bankrupt and drifting toward disaster.

Yes, we've progressed. When I was a boy in Harlem, Negroes got drunk and cursed each other out. Now they become junkies and don't say anything."

CONTINUED

"James Meredith is very gentle. He's also one of the noblest people I have met. It's no picnic he's gone through, but he takes it well. He has no rancor. He can laugh at these people and that can't be easy. I wasn't surprised he decided to stick it out at Mississippi."

In Jackson, Miss., Baldwin and James Meredith, whom he had flown down to see, wait for a taxi.

CONTINUED 86A

Don't let stomach upset

...upset your day

Get liquid-quick relief

TAKE...

MILES PRODUCTS

In New Orleans, Baldwin dances the "Hitchhike" with CORE member after lecture.

'Doom and glory of knowing who you are'

by JANE HOWARD

In today's literary circles it is a sign of considerable chic to know James Baldwin well enough to refer to him as Jimmy. Baldwin's telephone number, unlisted in the Manhattan directory, is such a badly kept secret that it has to be changed every few months. His phone rings relentlessly even at 3 a.m. when, often as not, five or six people are gathered in his 2½-room walk-up drinking his Scotch and listening to records. "You always go back to Jimmy's after an evening," one of his friends says, "never anybody else's. He's got to hear that music." That music consists largely of Ray Charles, Mahalia Jackson and the Abyssinian Baptist Gospel Choir.

Of the people who surround him and keep his phone busy not many are Baldwin's real friends. Those he really cares for, a group that includes his prolific family, Martin Luther King, Actors Sidney Poitier and Rip Torn, are either too busy or too compassionate to take much of his time. Many of the ones who are around offer him little but confusion. "They don't know," he says, "that to get you have to give, and giving, baby, isn't a day at a bargain counter but a total risk of who you are and what you think you want to be." Baldwin, who calls nearly everyone but old people and clergymen "baby," reflects that "Fame can lead to just as many disasters as poverty. Since I got to my grits—I mean, since I've had enough to eat—around two years ago, I've been as lonely as I ever was in my life. Now that I'm technically and legally a celebrity, I find that people don't look at me any more than when I was an anonymous cat in Harlem."

Maybe as a consequence, Baldwin scrutinizes other people with a shattering intensity. His huge, protruding eyes, usually a little bloodshot, gaze unwaveringly and for record lengths of time into the eyes of whomever he is talking to.

CONTINUED

When you're rushing for a plane, walking down the aisle, stepping into a new job, stepping out for the evening, doing the town, or doing the cha-cha, go about your business in the Governor.

THE GOVERNOR® BY ESQUIRE SOCKS®
ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF KAYSER-ROTH

THE GOVERNOR (ANKLE LENGTH) $1.00 THE HI-GOVERNOR (OVER-THE-CALF LENGTH) $1.25 ALL-NYLON, ONE SIZE FITS ALL

"Eyes," he claims, "are the only way to tell who you can trust." For those who know him it is a point of honor never to avert their eyes from his. It is also a little like being on the losing end of a children's game of who-can-outstare-whom. Rarely does anybody outstare James Baldwin.

On all his small gestures, Baldwin lavishes twice the ordinary amount of nervous energy. He thinks "the question isn't whether you're happy or unhappy but alive or dead." Although he can be despondent or two hours late to an appointment, there's never the slightest doubt that he's alive. When friends leave his apartment, he hugs and kisses them before he calls "Ciao, baby." When he goes into a restaurant or bar, he delays ordering until he has fed a coin to the jukebox. While he talks on the phone he carries it in his hand as far as the cord will allow, into the kitchenette and then halfway across the living room, stopping now and then to pencil a face in his appointment calendar. When he boards a plane, he grabs a handful of plastic-bound magazines as soon as he has shrugged off his fleece-lined Scottish suede coat. He riffles through half of them by the time the "No Smoking" sign dims.

He can't drive a car, but when one he's in gets a flat tire he is quickly outside and squatting to peer at the calamity as though his forte were not words but hubcaps and jacks. And when he comes across a child anytime, anywhere, he bends over to lift it to his lap. "You can't fool kids," he observes. "A three-year-old boy can tell perfectly well whether he's wanted around the house or not."

Baldwin was the eldest of nine children who grew up on 131st Street in Harlem. He was a skinny child with a big gap between his two front teeth. His father told him, "You're the ugliest boy I ever saw." His father worked in a Queens ginger ale factory weekdays and preached on Sundays. Young James was a junior minister in another church for three years, but one Sunday when he was 17 a friend dared him to cut service and go to a matinee of H.M.S. Pinafore. He took the dare and has never been a practicing Baptist since.

"I was learning then that the terrible thing about being a writer is that you don't decide to be one, you discover that you are one," he says. He turned down two college scholarships to help support the family by working in restaurant kitchens, writing continually on the side, and getting little sympathy for it. "In this country artists aren't recognized until they've earned $2,000 or won a prize. Until then, if you tell someone you're a writer he says, 'Yeah, well I mean, what do you do?' If you're an artist, you're guilty of a crime: not that you're aware, which is bad enough, but that you see things other people don't admit are there.

In Durham, N.C. he pauses to take notes before local headquarters of Black Muslims.

"You think your pain and your heartbreak are unprecedented in the history of the world, but then you read. It was Dostoevsky and Dickens who taught me that the things that tormented me most were the very things that connected me with all the people who were alive, or who ever had been alive. Only if we face these open wounds in ourselves can we understand them in other people. An artist is a sort of emotional or spiritual historian. His role is to make you realize the doom and glory of knowing who you are and what you are. He has to tell, because nobody else in the world can tell, what it is like to be alive. All I've ever wanted to do is to tell that. I'm not trying to solve anybody's problems, not even my own. I'm just trying to outline what the problems are.

"I want to be stretched, shook up, to overreach myself, and to make you feel that way too. I want to be a great artist, not just a very good one."

But as Baldwin's reputation grows, so does the distance between him and his typewriter. He can't write at all in New York City. ("I wish I didn't have to live there. It's the most hostile city I've ever been in, but there's no place else I could possibly be based.") His life has become so chaotic that in order to concentrate he has to flee to Istanbul, Paris, London, Switzerland, or an almost as remote Connecticut retreat. Between writing periods, when he's more or less in residence in Manhattan, Baldwin the Artist becomes Baldwin the Spokesman. In auditoriums he speaks to overflow crowds, the microphone cord draped about his neck, plane tickets in his pocket and telegrams in hand asking if he's free the 17th of next month to talk about The Essayist as Novelist, or The Novelist as Playwright, or How Whites Regard Negroes, or How Negroes Regard Whites.

On all these topics Baldwin has outspoken convictions which he can deliver on almost no notice in a dazzling, fluent rhetoric drawn from the stately cadences of the Old Testament, the glib breathlessness of postgraduate cocktail parties and the funky argot of Harlem. To hear one James Baldwin talk is by no means to have heard them all. On a hectic two-day speaking tour to New Orleans for the Congress of Racial Equality, he gave five planned and three spontaneous talks. They all ended up dealing with the racial question, but each was in its own language, aimed at its own audience. He spoke one way to anxious white liberals, another way to earnest Negro students who had been hurt in the McComb riots, and in still another vein to English majors at segregated colleges—but he made the same points each time.

He made some people mad but never failed in his expressed aim to "shake them up, disturb the peace, get them to ask real questions." They disturbed him, too, as all his audiences do.

"I was the first Negro to address a senior class at Yale—make of that what you will—and of those 1,000 men very few could phrase a sentence. Americans are the most inarticulate, illiterate people I've ever met, totally unlettered in the language of the heart, totally distrustful of whatever cannot be touched.

"Most Americans lead lives they deny, and they find it almost impossible to be coherent on any level. You have to listen very hard to a college president or an elevator operator to find out what it is he's really saying. They are both trapped between the language imposed on them, which is not theirs, and what they really want to say, which they don't trust."

To unwind from the strain of speaking publicly, Baldwin drinks and dances and subjects himself to painful motel-room bouts of introspection. "I know I shouldn't be doing all this speech-making," he says. "I never planned on it. It's much too easy for me. I should be saying what I have to say at a typewriter."

Yet when he accepts an invitation to speak, nothing stops him. In New Orleans recently he overslept on the day he was supposed to fly to Greensboro, N.C. to give a long-promised CORE talk. Eventually he emerged from his room, holding a poetry manuscript a student had asked him to criticize before he left. He was rushed into a rented car that raced to the airport, but it was too late: the plane was gone. There were no more flights that day to Greensboro. Everyone was silent.

"Well, Jimmy," a CORE girl finally sighed, "it's too bad, and they'll be pretty disappointed in

CONTINUED

When you're watching a ball game, walking to the green, reeling in a big one, taking the kids to a movie, standing on the corner, driving to the beach, going on a picnic, relax in the Playmate.

THE PLAYMATE™ BY ESQUIRE SOCKS®

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF KAYSER-ROTH

THE PLAYMATE 65% ORLON* ACRYLIC, 35% NYLON ONE SIZE FITS ALL.

SWIRLS GENTLE "RAINFALL" UP TO 40 FT. New "Golf Ball" Sprinkler spreads droplets new way—closest thing to natural rainfall. No. LS40, $4.95*

ADJUSTS WITH A TOUCH from low-angle circle for reaching under shrubs—up to 50-ft. diameter. Adjustable Rotary. No. LS50, $8.95*

DIRECT YOUR "RAIN". Wave-Type Sprinkler adjusts to narrow or wide areas . . . left, right, or center. No. LS60, $12.95*

Manufacturer's suggested retail price—not necessarily price charged at retail stores. Look for our name on garden tools, hammers and fishing tackle throughout the United States and Canada.*

WORLD'S RAINIEST LAWN SPRINKLERS SPONSOR WORLD'S RAINIEST CONTEST

Win a trip for two—to the rainiest spot there is. You'll love it! It's in Hawaii, U.S.A., but you'll fly first-class jet to sunny Honolulu and spend most of your two carefree, expense-free weeks at the SurfRider Hotel. Get your free entry blank (nothing to buy) at any hardware or garden-supply store that has new True Temper Lawn Sprinklers.† (They really are the rainiest!)

†Not open to entrants in states or localities where participation is prohibited.

TRUE TEMPER®

Carolina, but what can you do? The only way you could get there now would be charter a plane."

"How much?" asked Baldwin. "Go on, find out." He went into the unsegregated part of the airport bar to order a Scotch and criticize the poetry manuscript. The others fanned out all over the airport, buttonholing anybody who knew anything about planes that might be chartered to fly to Greensboro. After a time one reported to Baldwin.

"You're not going to want to do it," she said. "That flight would cost $680. You could get to Europe and back twice for $680."

"Charter the plane," said Baldwin. "I said I'd be in Greensboro tonight, and I will be." A few minutes later his two-engine plane was aloft. "My lawyers aren't going to be too delighted with this little extravagance," he admitted, "but what else is there to do? What's money for?

"I didn't become a writer to earn a Cadillac or a split-level ranch house, and I wouldn't quit writing if you gave them to me. And I didn't become a writer to join the Cosmos Club—somebody wanted to put me up for that, but I wasn't interested. You know, one of the things I object to most about liberals is the way they take me home to meet their mothers and buy me drinks and say, 'Now really, Jimmy, just between us, what have you got to cry about? You've made it, haven't you?' I want to ask them: 'I've made what?'

"Evidence would indicate I come from a long line of what we call field niggers," he said with a smile. "For myself, I'd never have been content with obscurity, but I wasn't aiming at Leonard Lyons' column either, and I'm not going to settle for it. I write because—I don't know why I'm telling you this—because every writer has only one story to tell, really, and I haven't told mine yet.

"I want to do something new, to go places I've never been, and I don't mean just geographically. I'm pushing a whole lot of different buttons to find out which ones. Right now I'm writing a play.

"Most contemporary fiction, like most contemporary theater, is designed to corroborate your fantasies and make you walk out whistling. I don't want you to whistle at my stuff, baby. I want you to be sitting on the edge of your chair waiting for nurses to carry you out."

In kitchen of his New York apartment Baldwin has 3 a.m. phone conversation.

SB Newsweek 5/27/63

WALTER LIPPMANN R&R Rel.

on

The Racial Crisis

SINCE Lincoln emancipated the slaves, the Negro people have been making substantial progress. But they are a long way from equality of status in American society. Segregation, disfranchisement, and discrimination are now generating a movement of resistance and defiance.

In states like Mississippi and Alabama, there is posed the same great question which threatens Rhodesia and South Africa. Can substantial numbers of people of European and African descent find a way to live harmoniously together in the same national community?

There are two possible answers to this question. On the one hand, some kind of partition with Europeans and Africans living apart. This is utterly impossible in the United States, and therefore, the American solution of the racial problem must inexorably rest on the principle that wherever they live, the Negroes and whites must form one community.

The Negro movement is now led by moderate men who believe in a gradualist approach to equality. The crucial question is whether these moderate men will continue to be followed, or whether the movement will become explosive in a mood of desperation. The answer to this question is uncertain. The gradualists are pressed from behind, and if gradualism were slowed down into gradual gradualism, they would probably lose their leadership. Much therefore depends on how hard and irreconcilable is the white resistance. For, as always, extremism will breed extremists.

Visibility Needed. The paramount national interest is that the process of Negro emancipation should go forward peaceably. It must go forward. It must go forward fast enough to make its forward movement visible. If it does not do this, there will have been an abandonment of fundamental American principles which will disgrace us at home and abroad. The movement to equality must go forward peaceably, which means that there must not be another struggle to preserve the Union.

These are not idle words. There are increasingly desperate men at the extremes on both sides. Among the Negroes there is a very ugly racist agitation against the whites, of which we are likely to hear more rather than less in the days to come. Among the irreconcilable whites there are not only manifestations of reckless fury, as at Oxford and Birmingham, but there is also a movement, which has made some headway, to dismantle the Federal union by a series of Constitutional amendments and to replace it with a confederacy of states.

Except among the extremists, there is still general agreement that equal status is the goal and gradualism should be the method. But although in recent years there has been in most of the country, including much of the South, a notable progress toward the goal, the outlook for gradualism is increasingly ominous. For the tempo of violence is rising. The movement toward equal status has arrived at the hard core of the resistance just as a younger generation of Negroes is appearing. They refuse to accept inferiority as patiently as did their fathers and their grandfathers.

How? When? By Whom? My own view has long been that in the mounting crisis of race relationships the Federal government has been dangerously in default. When the Supreme Court outlawed segregation in public schools and in public facilities, there was left unanswered the question of how, when, and by whom the new law, which differed so radically from existing custom and practice, was to be enforced.

The school case was decided in 1954. What happened then? Nothing happened. The President did nothing. The Congress did nothing. The enforcement of the Constitution was left to individual private lawsuits initiated by Negro organizations and their white sympathizers. There was no national policy, much less a national plan and a national program, for carrying forward legally, gradually, and effectively what was to be in fact a revolutionary change in the social structure of large portions of the nation.

The net result is that the President and the Congress are not leading and guiding the movement for equality of status. For the most part, they are the spectators, some of them in the cheering section and others in the booing section. The movement toward the equality of status for the emancipated slaves is not, alas, a national movement. It is a Negro movement in which the choice of the road and the decisions about how to deal with the obstacles are in the hands of the Negro leaders, themselves still gradualists but pressed more and more by their own extremists.

The Federal government, therefore, is committed to the achievement of the goal but is an outsider in the process of reaching it. It is, as the saying goes, not present at the take-off. But invariably, it is drawn in at the crashes.

Newsweek
THE MAGAZINE OF NEWS SIGNIFICANCE

The Sky Above—The Mud Below

"Hello, Africa, this is Astronaut Gordon Cooper speaking from Faith 7. I am right now 100 miles over Africa . . ."

Streaking past Ethiopia toward Zanzibar on his superbly executed 22-orbit mission around the globe (page 61), Maj. L. Gordon Cooper thus introduced himself to delegates to the 30-nation African summit conference in Addis Ababa. "I want to wish success to your leaders there," he radioed. "Good luck to all of you in Africa."

But technical difficulties botched the broadcast, and the African leaders were in a mood to turn a deaf ear anyway. Some had never heard of Cooper or his mission. The news that concerned them from the U.S. lay not in the stars but in the mud: it was news of police dogs, fire hoses, and Negro rioting in a place called Birmingham, Ala. Even as Cooper shot by, some delegates were rewriting resolutions on apartheid to denounce "racial discrimination in and out of Africa."

Arithmetic: For Africans, it was a predictable and understandable reaction to the two faces America presented to the world last week—the ugly face of racial conflict in Birmingham and the smiling face of Gordon Cooper emerging from his capsule after 34 hours in space. The world's response to both stories was mixed, the resentment over Birmingham tempered by a surprising degree of understanding, the excitement over Cooper's ride cooled a bit by a blasé regard for the miracles of science. But the balance sheet was clear enough: Birmingham was a minus. Cooper was a plus.

The U.S. image abroad had taken some bad whacks with the first wave of stories and pictures of the battles between Negro demonstrators and Birmingham police. In Paris, the left-wing Libération ran a photo of police dogs attacking Negroes under the black-bordered head: "Savages." In India, the independent Indian Express called the story "Barbarism in Alabama" and editorialized: "To turn high pressure hoses on peaceful demonstrators is another act of calculated barbarity which besmirches Alabama, if that state has any reputation left to be besmirched at all." Ghana's government-run Spark called American democracy "a limited-liability democracy which only white men enjoy." Russia naturally splashed the story at home and abroad.

Yet with it all, world opinion was remarkably gentle. There was temperate talk, East and West, of the complexities of America's race troubles and of her national commitment to progress. "Diehard whites in Alabama are fighting a losing battle," Bombay's Free Press Journal said. In France, the Little Rock crisis six years ago had precipitated a flood of letters to the U.S. Embassy; Birmingham brought barely half a dozen. In London, a Whitehall official clucked at the violence but added: "Most of us realize that you are not just sitting back and letting it happen." In Kenya, U.S. Consul General Laurence G. Vass headed off critics with some plain talk at a meeting with 300 Kikuyu high-school youngsters. The events in Alabama were "barbaric and intolerable," he said. But America's aim was still a "multiracial society with freedom and equality for all."

Sanders—Greensboro Daily News

'Man's Height and Depth'

And then came Cooper, lifting the eyes of the world from Birmingham to the skies, to what John F. Kennedy hailed as "one of the victories for the human spirit." Phone calls jammed the U.S. Embassy switchboard in Rio de Janeiro, some only to say: "Tell Mr. Kennedy I'm praying." "Yesterday's marvel is humdrum today," yawned Johannesburg's Rand Daily Mail, but 6,000 children—black, brown, and white—gathered at Nairobi's city hall for Cooper's radio greeting.

'Bravo': Tokyo newspaper readers gobbled up columms of detail. "Bravo Cooper," France's Le Parisien whooped at the splashdown, and even Rome's Communist L'Unità was rhapsodic: "The American image has been repaired . . . It was not in their character to brutally knee other men. That . . . [belonged] on the evil side like a dark hat worn by the villain in cowboy films." And Italian novelist Alberto Moravia said wisely: "A country is not all one side or one thing. It is made up of Birminghams —and of Coopers. Everyone knows . . . Negroes in America are not all treated as equals. But their fight . . . is part of the nation's vitality."

Actually, it was a problem for the American conscience—a question not of what the world might think but of what the nation ought to do by its own lights. And, if "world opinion" was often invoked against discrimination, it was hardly persuasive to segregationists like Alabama's Gov. George C. Wallace. "Other parts of the world ought to be concerned about their own image . . ." he snorted. ". . . Besides, most Africans and Asians don't know where they are, much less where Alabama is."

But even so elusive a quantity as a nation's image counted in a world where two great powers were vying for the allegiance of men. After the bad news from Birmingham, Cooper had ridden to the rescue aboard Faith 7. But the next manned space shot may be more than a year away. In the country of the Coopers and the Birminghams, the Birminghams would remain to goad the American conscience and to help shape the face America turns to the world.

INTEGRATION:

Birmingham's Choice

Invincibly jolly as ever, the Shriners had come to town for a convention, and battle-scarred Birmingham was bent on showing them a good time. "Welcome" banners and Confederate battle flags fluttered overhead, and, on a flatbed truck outside the Dinkler-Tutwiler Hotel, a Dixieland band blared "Stars Fell on Alabama." But history would remember other sounds: the clump-clump of state police patrols, the rasp of angry words, and—to ears keen enough to hear it—the ticking of the clock toward a time of decision.

The choice was war or peace.

Birmingham still had the instrument of peace last week—a fragile truce halting massive Negro demonstrations in exchange for some steps toward token desegregation. And the city had tasted war when, as the week began, two racist bombings set a Negro mob running riot in the streets. Waiting within striking distance were 3,000 U.S. troops, airlifted into Alabama on Presidential orders to prevent another blowup.

Yet Birmingham seemed tragically ill-prepared to make her fateful choice. Her political leaders openly denounced the truce. The businessmen who negotiated it kept their names secret at first, then came into the open with a statement that minimized—and virtually apologized for—the settlement. Whites and Negroes fell to bickering over the very terms of the truce and just how much integration they promised. And all the while, the Negro leaders watched, waited, promised to keep the bargain—and threatened more demonstrations if white Birmingham backed down.

City Hall was still locked in a legal battle over when a new mayor-and-council government headed by walk-soft segregationist Albert Boutwell will succeed the old commission government dominated by big-stick segregationist Eugene (Bull) Connor—now or not until 1965. Meanwhile, Public Safety Commissioner Connor and Mayor Arthur Hanes urged a white boycott of stores that agreed to the détente. Boutwell, his future uncertain, disowned the pact.

'Appeasers': And from Montgomery, feisty segregationist Gov. George C. Wallace jabbed away at both the white peacemakers ("appeasers ... [who] have played right into the hands of Martin Luther King") and President Kennedy for moving troops into the state. Wallace kept his own troops in town—some 700 state troopers and irregulars who patrolled the streets in Negro neighborhoods and walked in pairs through downtown stores. From the time they arrived during the riot Sunday, billies and gun butts flailing, Negroes regarded them as a provocation. The Justice Department, too, plainly wished they would go away. But Wallace kept them in town.

In such a climate, the businessmen who sponsored the peace effort were understandably skittish. Name-calling aside, segregationists were already circulating lists of downtown stores they thought were involved. One department store lost 100 charge accounts, and retail business was off 40 to 60 per cent.

But there was little hope for keeping the peace unless the economic leaders of Birmingham threw their weight behind it. A campaign to get civic clubs to endorse the truce bogged down because—so the stock argument ran—"we don't know who we're standing up for." Only the chief white negotiator, Sidney Smyer Sr., 66, an old-family, independently wealthy realtor, was publicly associated with the pact. "We'd better get some more foxes out there with that one fox," a white lawyer told NEWSWEEK's Joseph Cumming Jr., "or there'll be too many hounds for him."

Finally, the Senior Citizens Committee—parent body of the white negotiating team—simply released, in alphabetical order, the names of all 77 community leaders who had been connected with it since its formation last August. The list included business executives, industrialists, a former governor (Frank Dixon)—but no downtown merchants. Some had opposed the peace pact and some had quit, but the list did not say who was for or against. The committee "is opposed to desegregation," said the accompanying statement. The agreement was simply an "emergency action ... to re-establish racial peace."

Big Mules: Faltering though it was, the statement was of some help—if only because it attached the names of Birmingham's "Big Mule" civic and business elite, however halfheartedly, to the truce. As one gaunt elevator operator put it: "You can't do nothing to those men on that list. How can you boycott the Alabama Power Company?"

Even so, the atmosphere remained tindery. The stakes seemed clear to President Kennedy. That was why he had ordered troops (some of them riot-tested at Ole Miss last fall) to stand-by bases in Alabama and taken steps to call the 15,000-man Alabama National Guard into Federal service. The truce, he said, "recognized the fundamental right of all citizens to ... equal treatment ... The Federal government will not permit it to be sabotaged ..."

By a quirk of scheduling, the Presi-

Oeufs mollets* and plain talk: JFK (midway down left side) lunches with Alabama editors

Newsweek—Corwin Hansen

San Francisco: Odd tension on a quiet campus

UPI

Nashville: A powerful protest ended with open knives

Bill Sauro—N.Y. Herald Tribune

New York: A Harlem rally favored Malcolm X

dent was able to discuss his decision over lunch (oeufs mollets à la reine, rack of lamb, three wines) with 26 Alabama newspaper editors whom he had invited to the White House two weeks earlier.

He had sent the troops reluctantly, he said, and only because he feared that Birmingham, after the rioting, faced a "disaster." If they have to be used, he added, it would be a "defeat"—a defeat for him and moderates on both sides. And—driving home the warning—the President emphasized that if moderates do not solve the race problem in the South, the Negro advocates of non-violence will give way to extremists who preach violence.

At the weekend, the President carried the message South on a nine-hour flying visit for the Tennessee Valley Authority's 30th birthday. At Nashville's Vanderbilt University, he spoke softly but pointedly: "In these moments of tragic disorder . . . educated men and women . . . [must] reject the temptations of prejudice and violence and . . . reaffirm the values of freedom and law on which our society depends." The speech got a solid round of applause.

Next, he ventured into tense Alabama —and a face-to-face meeting with Wallace, who had just filed a U.S. Supreme Court suit challenging the President's power to use troops. The facedown at Muscle Shoals was anticlimactic. The two stood under the blades of Mr. Kennedy's helicopter, swapping smiles, handshakes, and pleasantries. Speech-making over, they flew to Huntsville, 35 minutes away, talking a bit about Birmingham but mostly admiring the view of the Tennessee Valley. The talk, Presidential press secretary Pierre Salinger said, was "not unfriendly."

It was all cordial and without incident. But between the two was the shadow of Birmingham—a shadow that was lengthening across the land.

The Jitters

Everywhere plain signs arose that Birmingham had thrust the whole U.S. racial problem into a new phase—more intense, more flammable, more urgent. New demonstrations marked by occasional violence sprang up in moderate Southern cities that thought they had long since balmed racial tensions with token concessions to the Negro. And in the black ghettos of the North, shock waves from Birmingham stirred up fresh demands for an end to Yankee-style de facto segregation. Among whites, North and South, the crisis not only spurred conscience but touched a nerve of fear.

Wherever the problem of race festered, the name of Birmingham was invoked as a warning, a symbol, and an epithet. When an NAACP lawyer sought a description for the city of Kennewick, Wash., which has no Negroes among its 16,000 residents, he called it—perhaps not too aptly—"the Birmingham of Washington." Even in fully integrated San Francisco State College, 30 Negro students without a specific complaint paraded grimly with picket signs reading: "Birmingham is everywhere." When gangs of Chicago Negro youths began stoning policemen after a cop had shot a fleeing 14-year-old boy in a slum neighborhood of Chicago's West Side, director Edward A. Marciniak of the Chicago Commission on Human Relations said the outburst was caused by "the Birmingham jitters."

Other cases of the Birmingham jitters were rampant last week on both sides of the Mason-Dixon line. Among them:

▶Nashville: In the "Athens of the South," where public schools and some lunch counters, theaters, and motels have been desegregated for several years, Fisk University students led fellow Negroes in a drive for complete desegregation. A protest march downtown degenerated into a half-hour conflict between the 250 marchers and white hoodlums, who hurled rocks, glass, and boards at them. Some Negroes responded by brandishing knives. When police calmed the situation, arresting two whites and four Negroes, two persons had to be hospitalized.

▶New York: An impassioned throng of some 6,000 at a Harlem rally cheered wildly as Black Muslim leader Malcolm X, flanked by two huge pictures of Negroes being felled by white cops, harangued: "Birmingham is not in the South alone, it is in the North, too." When the Rev. A.D. King, a leader in the Birmingham movement, spoke up for non-violence because "it is a little more difficult to do harm to a man who exchanges hatred with love," someone in the crowd heckled: "Yes, but it is a little less difficult to die when you don't fight back." After the rally, one group of youths broke eleven store windows. Another group—of Muslims—beat up Ben Holman of CBS News, himself a Negro, who had written a critical series on the movement while a newsman in Chicago.

▶Cambridge, Md.: Negroes intensified their demonstrations against segregated restaurants and theaters, and police in this rigidly segregated Eastern Shore cannery town responded by methodically locking them in jail, Birmingham-style. A Negro leader warned: "We will fill all the jails in the countryside." But at the weekend, a committee of white citizens acceded to Negro demands, and Cambridge began freeing prisoners.

▶Raleigh: In North Carolina's capital, where race relations have been harmonious ever since lunch counters were desegregated three years ago, a crowd of 500 students from two Negro colleges, Shaw and St. Augustine's, climaxed a demonstration in behalf of total desegregation by laying siege to the Governor's Mansion and booing

U.S. Navy

Ahead Full: The Navy's PT (for "patrol torpedo") boats, mothballed for eighteen years, have a successor. Undergoing extensive tests last week off Virginia were the Norwegian-built PTF-3 (F for "fast") and PTF-4, swifter (about 50 mph) and more dangerous (two 40-mm. and two 20-mm. cannon) than any of World War II's "expendables." Designed to speed guerrilla teams to enemy beaches, the highly maneuverable, twin-diesel craft can pack torpedoes if need be.

him when he came out to placate them. ▶Greensboro, N.C.: In this Piedmont city—birthplace of the sit-in movement in 1960—some 1,000 Negro students from North Carolina's Agricultural and Technical College tried to enter two segregated movie houses and a downtown cafeteria. Police arrested 241 of them, while whites set up counter-picket lines carrying signs saying, "Go Back to Africa" and "Blacks, Go Home." In later demonstrations 600 more were jailed.

Birmingham sparked protest where it had never flared before—as in Selma (population: 28,385), in Alabama's Black Belt, which saw its first mass Negro voter-registry meeting despite a menacing swarm of sheriff's deputies. And it gave fresh impetus to stalled hopes, as in Albany, Ga., where Negro demonstrations for eighteen months had led to thousands of arrests and no tangible gains—and where new demonstrations were now in the making. "People are prepared to go to jail in large numbers," said a Negro leader in Albany. "Birmingham has given them new life."

And the fresh wave of activity was starting to get some striking results. New Negro demonstrations in Nashville, Raleigh, and Greensboro were promptly followed by the establishment of biracial committees to plan desegregation. The Raleigh Merchants Bureau endorsed a statement, precedent-shattering by Dixie standards, calling for the "removal of all policies in both government and business which deny rights and services because of race." Most Greensboro merchants subscribed to a similar statement.

Though it was not related to Birmingham, there was also a significant Northern move against the kind of school segregation that results from housing segregation. In Trenton, New Jersey's Commissioner of Education, Dr. Frederick M. Raubinger, ordered the Orange city school board to present a desegregation plan for Oakwood elementary school, which—in Gov. Richard J. Hughes' phrase—has wound up with an "unintentional" enrollment 99 per cent Negro. Negro leaders in Englewood, N.J., meanwhile, protested that the community's schools are—"unintentionally," officials say—nearly all white.

No Choice: There were signs, too, that the often somnolent daily press of the South (the Birmingham papers, for instance, maintained an ostrich-like stance until violence was upon the city) was awakening to the fact that the chips were down in the Negro's drive for equality. "The lessons of Birmingham and Raleigh are plainly on the doorsteps of every Southern city," said The Greensboro News. "The revolution will not go away." In Knoxville, Tenn., partly desegregated but troubled with recent sporadic demonstrations for more progress, the News-Sentinel agreed emphatically. In an editorial it said: "The time has come when Knoxville [should] admit everybody to every place that caters to the general public . . . We are weary and ashamed of the violence which occurred in Little Rock, New Orleans, Albany, Greenwood, Birmingham, and Nashville." An integration committee, set up after the News-Sentinel editorial, included ranking businessmen who saw the problem in cold, practical terms. "If we don't do something, we are going to have the same situation as in Birmingham," said Hugh W. Sanford Jr., a committee member. "We have no choice."

In truth, it was clearer than ever last week that there was no choice anywhere in the U.S. except between equality for the Negro or incessant tension, disorder, and potential violence. The U.S. Negro, counseled for so long to be patient, felt that time had run out. Just as he led a new wave of sit-in demonstrations in Atlanta at the weekend, Ralph Moore, Atlanta University senior, stated the case for his fellows:

"We want our freedom now. We are tired of waiting. This is tomorrow."

THE PRESIDENT:

Appointment in Rome

When President Kennedy's forthcoming trip to Italy was planned, his advisers scheduled the proposed talks with the premier in the city of Milan rather than in the Italian capital. Their thinking: "You just can't go to Rome without seeing the Pope."

As a politician keenly attuned to such matters, Mr. Kennedy felt that a meeting between the first Roman Catholic President and Pope John XXIII might offend some U.S. Protestants. But last week the President changed his mind. The White House announced that Mr. Kennedy would meet with the Pope in what the Vatican called a "very important" private audience about June 20. The reasoning behind the new decision made more sense. Pope John has taken an active role in the search for world peace, and an unprecedented initiative in the ecumenical movement. The 81-year-old Pontiff is seriously ill; his days are numbered. And even to non-Catholics, it would appear downright ludicrous for the President of the U.S. to visit Italy—and purposely shy away from seeing the Holy Father.

TAXES:

What Price Peace?

During its 47 years of campaigning for world peace from its Nyack, N.Y., headquarters, the highly respectable Fellowship of Reconciliation has been tax exempt as a religious organization. But last January, the U.S. Internal Rev-

Birds of a Feather (?) Get Together

Sharok Hatami

Algeria's Ben Bella: 'One shouldn't judge politicians by their past, but by their present behavior'

Paris-Match

Guinea's Touré: 'I am more at home with Frenchmen than with my elder brother, who hasn't been to school'

Camera Press-Pix

Liberia's Tubman: 'We lack the advantage of colonization . . . We must destroy ideologies that divide us'

The air of Ethiopia's capital of Addis Ababa, 8,000 feet above sea level, is heady and exhilarating. Lions pace the garden cages of Emperor Haile Selassie's imperial palace, and lithe, Hamitic tribesmen in toga-like garments called "shamas" and solar topees walk proudly through the streets. Eucalyptus trees offer shade to street vendors selling leopard skins, and people bow low when the Emperor drives past in his Rolls-Royce. It is a place where history, dating back to King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, and rhetoric seem to go naturally hand in hand. As such, it was also the natural venue for 30 African nations to gather this week for Africa's largest summit conference yet.

Everyone who's anyone in African politics was there—Kwame Nkrumah of Ghana, Gamal Abdel Nasser of Egypt, Sekou Touré of Guinea, Ahmed Ben Bella of Algeria, William V.S. Tubman of Liberia, and Sir Abubakar Tafawa Balewa of Nigeria. Their portraits hung in front of the gleaming glass-and-marble Africa Hall, home of the U.N.'s Economic Commission for Africa, where a host of Foreign Ministers met last week to hammer out an agenda. While they worked, gallons of paint were splashed on public buildings, and beggars were ordered to keep out of sight. As the oldest independent African nation, Ethiopia was determined that the cause of Pan-Africanism should be debated in a fitting setting.

Turning Back to Europe: The conference came, however, at a time when African unity, economic or political, seemed to many visionary and unreal. Across the continent, divisive influences were at work. The Casablanca group of Ghana, Guinea, Mali, Morocco, Egypt, and Algeria, formed in 1961 with a brave program of political unity and anti-colonialism, was already moribund. Nkrumah's neighbors feared his grandiose schemes and his talent for subversion (NEWSWEEK, May 20). Relations between Egypt and Algeria were cool since Ben Bella brushed aside Nasser's tentative hints that Algeria might like to join his United Arab Republic, and Morocco's King Hassan II decided not to attend at all because of his claim to neighboring Mauritania (which had been invited). A similar border dispute was causing bad blood between the host nation, Ethiopia, and Somalia. And to Nkrumah's disgust, more and more African states were arriving at the conclusion that they were better served by their old colonial masters than by either Russia or the U.S. Only last week a high-powered delegation from Guinea, which had almost become a Soviet satellite after breaking with France, turned up in Paris to negotiate a new deal with the former colonial power. The delegation included Sekou Touré's half brother, Ismael, who had been one of the biggest boosters of the Soviets until it was apparent that their aid was running Guinea's economy into the ground.

A prime example of the feuds dividing the African nations was the row that developed in the Foreign Ministers' sessions over whether to admit the new government of President Nicolas Grunitzky of Togo which came to power last January after the assassination of President Sylvanus Olympio, one of Africa's more moderate leaders. Both Sekou Touré and Nigeria's Balewa (who suspected Ghana of a hand in Olympio's killing) opposed Togo's admission to the conference, and Togo's Foreign Minister Apedo Amah threatened to fly home if Grunitzky was barred. At the urging of the Ethiopians, a decision was deferred until the main heads-of-state conference.

"The time before us is short," Ethiopia's Foreign Minister Ketema Yifru warned the opening session, "and it should not be wasted in idle discussion of matters which will not

Camera Press-Pix

Ghana's Nkrumah: 'I'm like the man who walked into Jerusalem 2,000 years ago—and people followed'

Dalmas—Pix

Egypt's Nasser: 'Sometimes we attack and sometimes we explain. You forget what you do against us'

London Daily Express

Nigeria's Balewa: 'All the world is anxious to see what we produce . . . Unity must not mean regimentation' make a real contribution to . . . unity of Africa and the solution of our problems . . . if we permit ourselves to become embroiled in arguments and questions not related directly and significantly to the central issues of African unity, the time at our disposal will slip by."

Up for discussion were:

▶A Ghanaian proposal for a Pan-African Parliament in which each state would have two seats in the Upper House, while seats in the lower chamber would be allotted according to population. In "Africa Must Unite," a book published on the eve of the conference, Nkrumah also suggested that Africans integrate their economic plans, seek a unified military and defense strategy, and coordinate their foreign policy and diplomacy.

▶A total boycott of South Africa, the only independent African state not invited to the conference, including denial of airspace and territorial waters. (Ghana, however, continues to trade with South Africa through third parties.)

▶Military aid and training to accelerate the independence of Angola, Mozambique, and Portuguese Guinea.

▶An African Development Bank.

The first concrete achievement was the agreement in principle by the Foreign Ministers to merge the almost defunct Casablanca group with the 21-nation Monrovia bloc, mainly composed of French-speaking African states with a moderate, pro-Western flavor in their approach to the problems of development and unity. The Ethiopians were ready with a proposal for a permanent organization of African states (similar to the OAS in Latin America) with its own charter and secretariat.

At the same time, the Foreign Ministers turned thumbs down on Communist attempts to send "observers" to the conference. "This is to be an all-African meeting," a spokesman declared. Among those who had applied: the Soviet Union, Communist China, and Cuba.

'Amazing': No one expected that the Addis Ababa conference would do more than make a start at solving Africa's vast problems. There would almost certainly be fiery speeches signifying little, big plans which would never reach fruition, and a host of petty feuds. But as one senior U.S. official commented: "It is little short of amazing that 30 countries, separated by incredible differences in history, language, religion, ethnic structure, and colonial tradition, are even attempting something on the scale of the Addis conference. Heavens, Africa involves 244 million people in an area four times that of the U.S.—with all, except a handful of the countries, less than five years independent."

America's own growing interest in Africa was shown by the increase in experts and officials spreading across the continent. In 1956 there were six U.S. embassies and seven consulates in Africa; now there are 32 embassies, a legation, and 24 consulates. The State Department had 97 officers in Africa in 1957; now it has 906. Out of a total of 4,096 Peace Corps volunteers serving abroad, 1,380 are working in Africa.

'Don't Worry': There is also a growing sophistication in handling problems arising from the days when the U.S. believed that unless vast aid schemes were launched the Communists would take over Africa. A prime example is the case of Ethiopia which sent tremors through the State Department in 1959 when it accepted a Soviet offer of $100 million in aid. So far, only $18 million has even been allocated and when the Soviets agreed to build a technical school at Bahadar on Lake Tana, the Ethiopians announced that they intended to staff it with American-trained Ethiopian teachers. The Ethiopians have even converted some Soviet funds into short-term U.S. Treasury notes. Last week, when it was reported that some conference delegates might demand the removal of a powerful U.S. radio station near Asmara, which plays a key role in U.S. worldwide communications, the 71-year-old Emperor Haile Selassie told U.S. Ambassador Edward M. Korry not to worry. "I'll handle the matter," he declared firmly.

Indeed, the Ethiopians, looking back on their 3,000 years of independence with pride, seemed determined to keep a tight leash on propaganda, and to force the conference to face Africa's real and pressing problems.

Crawford—NEA

'First, the Secretary-General will pass the hat'

UNITED NATIONS:

Poverty, It's Awful

Annual income twenty pounds, annual expenditure nineteen six, result happiness. Annual income twenty pounds, annual expenditure twenty pounds nought and six, result misery.

Mr. Micawber—Charles Dickens

Micawber's simple arithmetic has been bedeviling the United Nations ever since it embarked on expensive peace-keeping operations in the Congo and the Middle East. By last week, the debts had piled up so high—almost $100 million—that the 111-nation General Assembly had to be called into special session to deal with them.

No one disagreed with U.N. Secretary-General U Thant when he described the debt as "perhaps the most vital issue before the United Nations," but few of the debtors seemed inclined to do much about it. Both the Soviet bloc ($63 million in arrears) and France ($14.1 million) listened stonily in the U.N.'s Fifth Committee as financial experts outlined what one British official called "a pretty astounding state of affairs." Briefly stated, the facts were:

▶Since June 30, 1962, no assessments had been made to cover the costs of the Congo and Middle East operations despite a ruling by the World Court that such levies were legal and binding.

▶The U.N. has limped along on the sale of $137,285,762 worth of U.N. bonds in which the U.S. was pledged to match

R+R Rel.

LWD
PA
ML
WB
BP

The Absence of Justice

By Louis E. Lomax

BIRMINGHAM

THIS IS WAR, another battle in what I have called "The Negro Revolt." Yet what this troubled town needs is not the absence of trouble but the presence of justice.

Few people, including the President and the Attorney General, realize that the American Negro is now making his maximum effort for freedom and justice. The use of little children, the purest of our troops, in Birmingham, among the meanest of places, was the tip-off that a major and pivotal civil rights battle was underway. And the use of children will spread, for now is nonviolence's most perilous hour.

Nonviolence turns on the notion that such a moral battle of attrition will bring us the victory. It should be clearly stated that Negroes have resorted to nonviolence not because we are all that moral, but because the other cheek is the only practical weapon in our arsenal. We aim, of course, at the conscience of men, at the souls of our adversaries. But in all candor, few, if any, of us really believed Eugene "Bull" Connor would respond in terms of the soul and the spirit. He did precisely what was expected: He unleashed dogs on children and felled women with fire hoses. Then his underlings rushed to the fallen women and pinned them to the ground, the knees of the police on their breasts.

GOVERNOR GEORGE WALLACE

In a very real sense, this played into our hands. The scene was transmitted to all the world, and men of all cultures and languages discovered anew the savagery of the land we black Americans call home.

To our dismay, the Kennedy Administration continues to climb the back side of the civil rights mountain. It will be recalled that the Attorney General urged the Freedom Riders to call a halt to their journeys down South while his brother, the President, was on an overseas trip. Now, in Birmingham, the younger Kennedy questions the morality of the Negro effort, and underscores the risk of using children in the front lines. "A maimed child," he has said, "is something we can hardly afford."

Only because he does not realize the seriousness of our revolt, the Attorney General fails to understand that every American Negro is maimed at birth. He may overcome this somewhat, but never fully so: To be black in this land is to be an outcast in the house of one's fathers, a leper in the land of the white and the cancerous.

If the Attorney General needs evidence of just how maimed Negroes in Birmingham already are, let him examine the mass of material gathered by Thelton Henderson, a Justice Department field man who has been gathering evidence for a voter registration suit in Birmingham for the past several weeks. The voter registration cards show such things as:

Name: John Jones.
Age: 35.
Education: College degree.
Occupation: Bell hop.

Name: Mary Jones.
Age: 33.
Education: Three years college.
Occupation: Maid.

John and Mary Jones, and there are hundreds like them, are in the tradition of Birmingham. They meet the man—the white man—every morning; they get paid every Friday afternoon. They shop in stores where they cannot sit down and have a hot dog, or use the bathroom. John and Mary Jones cannot try on the suits and dresses they are thinking of buying. "They might get nigger smell on them clothes," one merchant said. But there is one liberal store in town; they will let Mary try on a garment but she cannot, of course, use the dressing room with white women. So she must go out into the alley behind the store and slip into the garment while nobody is looking. If she doesn't like it, or it doesn't fit, she can bring it back. The manager is a liberal and doesn't mind.

John and Mary Jones have children—John Jr., 13, and Susan, 11, named after her maternal grandmother. They were doing well in school. Now, like about a fourth of the school children in Birmingham, John Jr. and Susan are in jail. And late into the night you can stand with John and Mary Jones in front of the county jail and hear the children sing:

If in our hearts,
We do not stray,
We will overcome
Some day.

Then, still from the jail, there rises a young squeaky voice in prayer, and his fellow holy inmates urge him on:

"O Lord have mercy!"
Yes, Lord.
"Stand by us as we suffer for the right."
Please Lord, Please Lord.
"Help our fellow students who will demonstrate tomorrow."
Lord, Lord, Lord.
"Dry up the fire hoses, Lord."
Yes, Yes, Yes!
"And lock the jaws of them vicious dogs."
Yes Jesus! Do, Lord, do.

"Goddammit, you boys and girls move on. If you cared about your children they wouldn't be here."

And so the vigil outside the jail is over. The white policeman, his night stick at the ready, says move on. This is Birmingham. When a white man—particularly a white policeman—says "move on," black folks move on or get beaten and then jailed for disorderly conduct.

This is Birmingham in peace; this is Alabama in tranquility. For the Birmingham policemen are the best of the lot. Indeed, Birmingham police spent much of their time restraining State Troopers—rednecks from the bush—who wanted to wade in and club Negroes whether they were involved in the demonstrations or not.

Little wonder, then, that the frenetic efforts of the Kennedy Administration to restore peace, law, and order, fell flat with Negroes all over America. Peace, law, and order to the Negro mean little more than enforcement of the status quo.

TROOPER ALBERT LINGO

Even so, the Negroes did not disturb the peace, upset order, or break the law. They sought to demonstrate peacefully against what they felt was injustice. The city said they needed a permit to demonstrate; the Negroes applied for the permit and were denied. So they marched, two by two, singing and praying, confident that the Constitution of the United States would save them from the hell of an Alabama jail; certain that one day they would be able to sit down and have a hot dog, use the bathroom and try on a dress before they buy it. The order was broken, the peace disturbed, by those who would deny Negroes even the right to protest.

And so Assistant Attorney General Burke Marshall, head of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division, came to town, took up headquarters in a segregated motel and proceeded to mediate the dispute. The Administration's overriding concern was with the restoration of order, the maintainence of peace. In the process, justice was trampled. To be sure, the Negroes got a crumb. There was some progress made. But justice was not done; the aggrieved, rather than the criminals, were advised to slow down, be moderate, not make waves. It should have been the other way around. Justice, at the expense of martial law and Federal occupation, should have been imposed on this tormented town. The men who threw the bombs, put dogs on children, and manhandled defenseless Negro women, should have been told to slow down, not move too fast, be moderate.

President Kennedy has done more for civil rights than any President in history. But the nature of the times demands that more be done for civil rights than at any other period in history. Kennedy, then, cannot be measured by the past; he must stand muster before the now and the tomorrow. The John Fitzgerald Kennedy of 1963 would have been a great President in 1950. That, however, was over a decade ago. If he would have his own profile be one of courage, the President must, and soon, meet the demands of the future, not grapple with the needs of the past.

This is war. For the Negro it is a holy war, and we are of the holy war nonwhite men all over the world are now waging. We are not concerned with the absence of trouble; our committment is to the presence of justice. For then, and only then, will we have overcome.

Neither Life Enough Nor Time

By John A. Williams

FOR THE American Negro the hurt of Birmingham, of the South, of the nation, is so deep, so twisting, so all-encompassing that the only relief from it may be, as authorities close to the scene have warned time and again, raw, quivering violence. The wartime riots of Detroit and New York would pale beside it; the rioting on the University of Mississippi campus would look like child's play. Negroes, of course, would suffer most, being most deprived of the tools of the law and the weapons with which to defend themselves: It would be rocks, bottles and cans, largely against dogs, carbines and automatic shotguns. We have had the preview.

The immediate hurts of the Negro might be momentarily alleviated through a fearsome show of righteous vengeance. The violence would be of so awful a nature that leaders and politicians would then make sure that such a force could not build and explode again, and perhaps its purpose might then be considered well meant.

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King may be the only man in America able to see this specter clearly. He has warned again and again that it is the white man who holds all the weapons, the courts, the power. He does not continually advocate nonviolence merely as a platform; he insists on it because violence is ever present and, like a gusher, must always be capped with a reminder. King has had startling good fortune; his opponents have not always heeded the Homerian adage:

Do thou resist that man with all thy might
Who, unprovoked, provokes thee to a fight.

But King's time may be running out. The first signs of this were in his use of the children in the Birmingham marches. He might have had better luck had he not been dealing with politicians and savages. These, as we have seen, disavowed the uncertain truce signed in Birmingham by King and moderate whites.

The truce came because of the children. Why not use them? Let them get their scars early and, if plans work out, they will heal. The kids went in their small trusting ways, believing in King and his God, to endure the problems that we as adults, with life enough and time, have been unwilling to solve in the 100 years since Emancipation. It was the sight of the children being mauled and tossed about, however, that brought to the attack those "sheep" outside King's fold; people whom he, Ralph Abernathy and Fred Shuttlesworth denied were theirs.

The weak agreement was beaten out, regardless, "behind the scenes." The return of peace was hailed and the Kennedy Brothers were revealed as "The Hidden Persuaders." And many who had angrily and indignantly wired the White House, screaming at the Brothers to "Do Something!" in Birmingham, were relieved to discover Jack and Bobby had been on the job all along.

But, just as it did at the University of Mississippi, the whole damned package blew up in everyone's face. The President called in the troops from the sidelines to the usual ante-bellum yowls of indignation and pronouncements of state's rights; the city police were at odds with the state police even as full-scale rioting broke out. Governor George Wallace and Mayor Albert Boutwell screamed at each other and Wallace fired off wires to Washington. The White House, without laying the blame for the riot on anyone (a mistake, as the President should have discovered at Mississippi), took steps to federalize the Alabama National Guard, while the Alabama Governor howled, "It's mine! It's mine!"

How many more times will we have to witness this stupid, disgusting charade? We know how it goes by now. Is there no room for inventiveness at least? Will there at no time be observance of the laws of man and nation? Won't the Kennedys stop persuading (which has meant, in the case of Governor Ross Barnett of Mississippi, saving a politician's face, a face which cost two lives) and get the jump on the action?

People cry out to the Executive Branch of the Government because Congress cannot make that quick decision and because, ruled practically by the South, to the shame of the voters of this land, Congress has lacked any vital and sustained interest in civil rights. The Supreme Court has had its say, but has been defied at nearly every turn, even by Federal Court judges. It is now using up valuable time hearing or refusing to hear or review cases which have already been set in precedent. Who else to act with speed, then, but the Executive Branch? Yet the Kennedy Administration has not made one single move on behalf of civil rights as quickly as it did before it was given a slender mandate. That was in the case involving Dr. King's jailing in Atlanta. While Nixon dawdled, the Kennedys dialed and won for themselves the Negro vote that determined the election.

THE PROBLEM with the President, as it has been with others before him, is that the fear of enforcing the Constitution to the hilt is greater than the fear of suffering a Little Rock, a University of Mississippi or a Birmingham. To give the illusion of doing something, Presidents since Harry Truman have convened Civil Rights Commissions whose reports, many of them coming from Southern white members, have been dutifully filed away without being acted upon. Repeatedly these reports have cited the failure of local police to preserve law and order, pointing out that the likes of law officials like Bull Connor and Albert Lingo of Alabama and Willis McCall of Florida are as much a barrier to desegregation as the schools' refusal to admit Negroes.

The FBI, moreover, has distinguished itself by seldom finding and arresting those who bomb Negroes' homes or Jewish synagogues, or who shoot visiting French newsmen in the back. This is because the men assigned to these cases are themselves Southerners. Various Civil Rights Commissions have proposed that special police be engaged to handle civil rights enforcement. Like other recommendations, this all-important one has been tabled indefinitely. If, under Truman, Eisenhower and Kennedy the CRC's recommendations have been put into action, few people know about it.

In the face of the Government's refusal to act—after declaring that Washington could not intervene in Birmingham, Kennedy had to eat his words only a few days later—men such as King and the white moderates coaxed or threatened or boycotted to the discussion table may be the next to the last players on the gridiron. Had the Government acted with "all deliberate speed" after 1954, a wedge might have already been in existence not only in Alabama, but throughout the nation. This failure has had, and will continue to have, its just desserts, mostly at the expense of the Negro who is not as concerned with America's prestige abroad as he is in his own individual, long overdue constitutional rights.

The last players in this continuing game of charades very likely will be the people Dr. King does not have in his fold. The rioting was kicked off by Negroes terribly unwilling, as King suggested, to let their blood flow instead of their white brother's. These are the people the South most fears. Sullen, deprived, outside the community of religion and economic influences, they are prepared to meet violence with violence; they are the people fabled in Southern story as "bad niggers." They belong only to themselves.

These are not people for the Black Muslims, as everyone seems to think; the discipline the Muslims offer has no appeal. The Muslims stress defense if attacked. These "sheep" have demonstrated their willingness to attack even without weapons. Raised on a heritage of violence without the soothing ministrations of the church, they are willing to dispense violence themselves.

Perhaps another Robert Williams, who was framed and hounded into Cuba, will get them guns, teach them to build and man foxholes. They would do it with startling relish. Williams is the ex-Marine who had his people throw up breastworks in Monroe County, North Carolina, and fought white attackers with rifles. He was dropped as president of the local NAACP because of this and was later charged with kidnapping a white couple whom, in fact, he had protected. He fled northward to Canada and from there went to Cuba. Another Robert Williams to lead them and Birmingham would be as bloody a battlefield as Bunker Hill.

One further significant revelation came with the furor in Birmingham: The Negro business community of the South may now be inclined to get off the fence. It has been as moderate about desegregation as the white business groups. Integration would lose it the wealth that was traditionally its own. Negro businesses within the segregated community, insurance particularly, have created black millionaires. A. G. Gaston, who sat with King and helped draw up the agreement, is just such a man. It was his motel that was bombed. If Gaston's cooperation and help and money has come to the aid of the desegregation efforts, a new phase in Negro staying power may be at hand, for millions of dollars are available. And if there are funds for marches and bail fees, there are also funds for weapons.

The failure of the Government to act, or its acting belatedly (thus giving license to the lawless), points us in the direction of Hitler's Germany. No, we are not at the point where millions of Negroes will be herded into physical concentration camps and eliminated. We are not there yet. But the inability (due to the complex difficulties in each of us making a living) of the masses of people to be directly and actively concerned, puts us well along the road. No single question that effects this nation is without roots imbedded deeply in the problem so recently blown up in Birmingham. Education, religion, economics, health, employment opportunities, unemployment, defense, the Armed Forces—none of these escapes the whiplash and sting of discrimination. The constitutional privileges of all are in danger because the Government refuses to meet the needs of a minority.

They have been saying in South Africa that the time is "five minutes to 12." It is something like that here. One man summed it all up this way: "They'd better enforce that mother------- Constitution or the God damn thing won't be worth a s--t to nobody."

Revolution in an Open Society

By Reinhold Niebuhr

THE NEGRO revolution, which is daily gathering force and undoubtedly will gather more force before it reaches its objectives and finally spends itself in fulfillment, is an interesting historical phenomenon. It is a revolution within the framework of a democratic society.

If historical phenomena were as neat and orderly as our categories of history, revolutions would occur only in moribund traditional societies where there is no free and mutual adjustment of interests and where the most defrauded segment of the community cannot move to attain its rights without shattering the whole rigid structure of a hierarchial community. We know of the revolutions in 17th century England, 18th century France and 20th century Russia. Yet even in those revolutions the peasants and the rising craftsmen arose as a revolutionary force only when internal strains and external exertions weakened the old order and gave them an opportunity to do so.

The motive power of their revolutionary actions was resentment against age-old grievances and injustices, borne "patiently" until deliverance seemed near; and the hopes generated by cracks in the old order. Revolutionary ardor is never, as Marx thought, pure resentment. It is a combination of resentment and hope. That is why revolutionary movements become more revolutionary in the process of their success. We should know about this double motive of revolutions as we watch the Negro revolution in its ups and downs, and begin to wonder why, as it meets with comparative success, it is developing more and more force.

Nor should we have too much difficulty in accounting for the strange phenomenon of a Negro revolution taking place in an open society, rather than in a traditional one. An open society prevents revolutions by allowing all economic, racial and cultural groups freedom to state their claims and defend their interests. The claims may not always be granted, or the interests acknowledged. But in a truly democratic society there is always some hope that genuine interests will gradually be recognized, and that in a spirit of mutual accommodation failure to grant them will be justified by their clearly interfering with other legitimate interests.

Thus, democratic communities are subject to an evolutionary process of adjustment, and not revolutions of the dispossessed. The current Negro revolution can be understood only if it is realized that the Negroes comprise a disinherited enclave in a free society. They bear the same unsatisfied longings of the ages, the same accumulated resentments against unredressed injustices, which the peasants of the ossified traditional communities bore in past centuries and which, according to Marx, the "proletariat" bore. But, happily, democratic society redressed these conditions, making the Marxist apocalypse of doom and utopia otiose throughout the whole of Western Europe. Of course, Western culture required a whole century to come to terms with the realities of modern industry. The mills of both God and democracy grind exceedingly slowly.

The Negroes, however, were left out of all, or at any rate most, of the beneficent consequences of this fluid evolutionary process. Despite the promises of a nation "conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal," they lived in slavery in the self-conscious and self-righteous young nation "brought forth" on a new continent. Despite the fact that the slavery issue caused the Civil War, the victory of the North did more to "save the union," acknowledged by Lincoln to be his "primary purpose," than to emancipate the Negroes. Despite the assurances of the Fourteenth Amendment, Negroes remained both rightless and powerless in the sense that they were voteless.

After the Civil War, even the free states did not hasten to enfranchise Negroes under the Fourteenth Amendment. And today, a century later, most of the riots in the South are due to efforts to give Negroes the vote. These facts are almost too obvious to be recorded. Yet such is the obtuseness of human nature that even sympathetic whites must be reminded, as we recently have been by the gifted Negro novelist James Baldwin, of the historical reasons for the depth and breadth and virulence of Negro resentments.

The enclave of hopeless injustice in our generally open society obviously has its core in the "deep South"—in Mississippi and Alabama and, in varying degrees, other states of the old Confederacy. But it also encompasses the entire nation, particularly the Northern urban centers to which the Southern Negroes fled. Here they are "emancipated," in the sense that they can vote, while being newly enslaved, in the sense that they must live in ghettos such as Harlem.

Still, these enclaves of injustice are in a community that is otherwise "open." Indeed, some of the effects of the present integration controversy stem from the contradictory influences of an open society containing a closed enclave. Birmingham illustrates the situation most poignantly. Under Martin Luther King's leadership, the Negroes conducted mass demonstrations against all forms of segregation. A joint interracial committee finally resolved the "tension" by promising desegregation of the large downtown department store facilities, promotion of Negroes to sales positions, and the formation of a permanent commission on race relations. These were the consequences of an open society allowing competition and accommodation of conflicting interests.

But on the night the accord was reached, a group of recalcitrant whites, opposed to opening the closed enclave, bombed the house of a Negro leader and the motel where the committee had met. Earlier, the same sort of men murdered a pure-hearted mail carrier who was carrying a message about the necessity for integration to the Governor of Alabama. A group of Birmingham Negroes, enraged by the bombing, went beserk, rioted and ruthlessly laid waste to several homes and businesses. Curiously—or perhaps not so curiously—these Negroes were not part of the group which had won accommodation from the whites. They were a group of hopeless men for whom the promise of Negro job opportunities seemed worthless, because they would be unemployed in any case. They spoke from the depths of the enclave of hopelessness.

BOTH the open society and the enclave of hopeless injustice will continue to have their contradictory effects. Whites, along with Negroes who retain hope of getting justice, will rejoice that this is not South Africa and that the only conceivable conclusion of the struggle is not a blood bath of violent revolution. An open society will in time encroach upon the boundaries of the enclave. Negroes with votes will use their power in favor of Negroes without votes. True, some of them may be demagogic Congressmen with unsavorary records of racism in reverse. But, it should be remembered, we are dealing with outraged human beings, not with angels of virtue.

Some Negroes have already escaped from the enclave of prejudice by dint of extraordinary talent—in sports, in the theater, in the concert hall. These is, to be sure, a bitter irony in this form of injustice. But even now only the most talented women are able to establish "equal rights" with men in politics and business. What is significant is that Negroes with high talent are breaking out of the enclave in increasing numbers, thus revealing the virtue of an open society, enlarging its openness, and refuting the libel about the "innate inferiority" of their race.

Another result of an open society is that, despite the educational handicaps from which the present drive for educational integration may ultimately rescue them, an ever greater number of Negroes are getting a university education either in Negro or integrated colleges. And these college students, especially in their sit-in protests against segregated eating places but also in the general agitation for justice, are performing the same service for their race which the articulate craftsmen performed for the less articulate peasants in the late middle ages and in the revolutions which established free governments.

These are the obvious consequences of the openness of our society. But the forces of tradition and custom, which uphold special privileges for a dominant race, are still powerful enough to preserve the enclaves of injustice for a century or more to come. We will have the tension of the integration struggle with us as long as we live in the precarious peace of the nuclear dilemma. The Negroes will naturally be impatient, and their impatience will hasten the process of justice and embarrass the "moderates."

Strangely enough, the only true proponents of a neat "class struggle" between the races are the Black Muslims, who believe Allah will perform the service which Marx expected from the "historical dialectic"; that is, guarantee them a black paradise in the nation. Since there is no "increasing misery" among Negroes in this country, however, there is no increasing revolutionary ardor, only constant pressure. We shall live for a long time with this pressure and with the contradictory consequences of a revolution in an open society.

Attorney General Robert Kennedy was probably too optimistic in his recent analogy between the history of the Irish and the Negroes in America. After pointing out that an Irish Catholic was elected President less than a century after the anti-Irish riots of the "know nothing" movement, he predicted that a Negro could be elected President in another half century. But the analogy is not exact. The Irish merely affronted us by having a different religion and a different place of origin than the "true" Americans. The Negroes affront us by diverging from the dominant type all too obviously. Their skin is black. And our celebrated reason is too errant to digest the difference.

The Christian Century 5/29/63
Pg & Pa Rel.

planning," for "fostering study and research related to Christian broadcasting," and for publication of a quarterly to be called the Christian Broadcaster. Membership in W.A.C.B. is open to churches and other agencies and to individuals concerned with religious broadcasting who accept its purposes and functions. Associate membership is available for people who have only "professional interest" in the association.

While the assembly, which is to meet every five years, will lay down general directives for the association, actual control is entrusted to a 59-member central committee elected on a regional basis. Practical management of affairs is in the hands of a 15-member executive committee consisting of the officers, a representative of each of the general regions (Africa, Asia, Europe, Latin America, the Near East and North America) and five other persons from the central committee.

The sole unpleasant episode in the proceedings came when central committee members from Africa were being chosen. Europeans stationed in Africa allotted themselves seven of the nine places assigned to that continent—and three of the seven are from Southern Rhodesia. Those who did the "stacking" were rebuked on the assembly floor by Theodore Tucker, Africa secretary for the (U.S.) National Council of Churches, and Philippe Maury, director of information for the World Council.

Personnel

Lutheran Bishop Fridtjov S. Birkeli of Stavanger, Norway, was elected chairman of the new body. Vice-chairman is K. D. Bhasker of India's Christian Association for Radio and Audio Visual Service; secretary, William N. Haddad of the Near East Christian Council's radio project; treasurer, Frederick Wilson, secretary of mass communication overseas for the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A.

Harry Spencer was elected regional representative for North America. Two North Americans were elected at large to the executive committee: Mrs. Nancy Montizambert of Toronto, supervisor of broadcasting for the Anglican Church in Canada; and this correspondent, director of communication for the United Church of Christ. Other North Americans elected to the central committee were Prof. John Bachman of Union Theological Seminary in New York city, William Fore of the Methodist Board of Missions, Paul Friedrich of the Lutheran Laymen's League, Bernard M. Lubin and S. Franklin Mack of the National Council of Churches, Lawrence McMaster of the United Presbyterian Church, and Keith Woollard of the United Church of Canada.

289 Park Ave. S.,
New York 10.

District of Columbia

CHARLES D. KEAN

A Call for Leadership

At a rally at Mt. Shiloh Baptist Church on Sunday May 5 two Negro clergymen-politicians appealed to some 1,300 of Washington's Negro leaders to take positive steps toward solving serious community problems. Rep. Adam Clayton Powell (D., N.Y.) and Rep. Charles C. Diggs, Jr. (D., Mich.) struck a two-pointed theme. On the one hand, if more is not done to provide equal opportunity for metropolitan Washington's burgeoning Negro population, trouble in this area may exceed the difficulty in Birmingham. On the other, unless Negro intellectuals and professionals really identify themselves with aspirations of their own people, they will forfeit whatever constructive influence they might be able to exert in the days to come.

Although the District of Columbia has its share of Negroes just in from the hill farms of the deep south, it has probably the highest percentage of advantaged Negroes of any area in America. Those who choose to enter civil service and work at it find promotion difficult but achievable, and many qualified Washington Negroes, both men and women, are in upper-level pay grades of the civil service. There is, however, a gulf—or at least a lack of effective communication—between Negroes of substance who "have it made" and less-advantaged Negroes. The problem created by social class stratification in the Negro community is not essentially different from that in the white community, but Negro leadership resources are so limited that the effect is more tragic.

A Search for Help

Following the addresses the congregation marched to the White House where a picket line was set up for 15 minutes. The demonstrators carried signs asking for federal intervention in Birmingham. But the picketing is not to be understood simply in terms of the Negro community's reaction to what is going on in another city; those terms apply—but there is a lot more. The episode stands against a background of serious problems.

One has to do with the tragedy of neglected children. The struggle for dominance of local affairs between Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D., W. Va.) and the district commissioners leaves welfare agencies in the lurch, thus penalizing the most underprivileged Negroes in the area. This struggle, as has been reported in The Christian Century (see "Man in

At home or away, summer is a time for worship, too

Whether at home or away, daily devotions from The Upper Room will give you and your family a spiritual uplift and bring you into a closer communion with God.

If vacation, recreation, or the hot weather changes your day's routine, these summer activities still need not interrupt your daily worship. A new time for devotions — first thing in the morning, or at breakfast, or last thing at night — would avoid most distractions.

The Upper Room for July-August brings new daily meditations, fitting Scripture and timely prayers. Every family will find it spiritually refreshing. Order today.

10 or more copies to one address, 7¢ per copy, postpaid. Individual subscriptions (by mail) $1.00 a year, 3 years for $2.00. Order from

The Upper Room

The world's most widely used daily devotional guide

41 Editions — 35 Languages

1908 Grand Ave. Nashville 5, Tenn.

the House," Oct. 17, 1962, and "Tragedy in the Nation's Capital," Jan. 30), is making it very difficult to find a competent person willing to become director of public welfare—if acceptance means following the philosophy of Sen. Byrd.

Another problem stems from interracial tension. Last Thanksgiving Day the annual football classic between the public and the Catholic high school champions brought together teams from predominantly Negro Eastern High School and nearly all-white St. John's College Prep School. By the end of the first half it became evident that the dominant mood was not football fever but bitter racial strife, and that it was infecting not so much the teams—although they too were affected—as the spectators, many of whom seemed to have come looking for a fight. When the game ended with St. John's winning 20-7, all hell broke loose. The police detail was unable to control the riot that ensued, and many people—most of them white—were injured.

The next day public indignation waxed strong. Who had erred? Carl Hanson, superintendent of schools, and John S. Spence, director of education for the Washington Catholic archdiocese, issued a joint statement suspending the play-off game indefinitely. A broad-based citizens committee headed by Shane MacCarthy was appointed to hold hearings and issue a report. The general feeling was that this incident must not be allowed simply to blow over, that its causes must be effectively dealt with. When the MacCarthy committee reported, it whitewashed no one but raised a number of searching questions about the whole problem of public education and law enforcement among all teenagers in the district. This committee was one of the first groups to focus attention on the school drop-out problem.

The Drop-out Dilemma

Following the MacCarthy report, Dr. Hanson released his own studies of discipline difficulties in high schools where older drop-outs freely roam the corridors, occasionally scuffling, sometimes even having sexual intercourse in corners. Dr. Hanson asked: Could there not be disciplinary classes in the late afternoon and evening to which those who find it difficult to adjust could be transferred for special attention before their morale is ruined and they interfere too greatly with other people? He then aroused a swarm of criticism by suggesting that principals or supervisory teachers be given the authority to inflict —as a last resort—corporal punishment.

Behind the superintendent's suggestion was an awareness that many drop-outs are illegitimate youths with little if any family encouragement to take advantage of what the schools have to offer. The suburban practice of sending for parents of a student in disciplinary difficulty makes little sense at Cardoza or Dunbar high schools, where in many instances the child is supported solely by a working mother. The normal built-in structures of the American middle class society do not work in this social order. At this writing no final action has been taken on Dr. Hanson's request to use corporal punishment when necessary. It has had one adverse preliminary vote by the school board but has found considerable support both in the board and in the community. One difficulty seems to be that many people would prefer to dump the whole problem in Dr. Hanson's lap, and extension of his disciplinary power seems to provide a means for doing just that. At the same time, perhaps no place else can be found to lodge responsibility—and something has to be done.

Crossing Lines of Separation

In the meantime, by official action taken at its 68th annual convention the Washington Protestant Episcopal diocese decreed that any agency or institution claiming to be related to that diocese must remove all color bars within six months. The Episcopal Home for Children, a treatment center for the emotionally retarded, took this step without fanfare some three years ago. It now has Negroes among both patients and staff, and it expects to elect its first Negro board member soon. The Episcopal Church Home, which provides care for the elderly, had resisted any suggestion that it provide integration of services, but it took that step a week before the convention. The only institution open to the full brunt of the convention's action is the House of Mercy, a home for unwed mothers; that institution has issued no statement as yet.

More than 3,000 persons thronged to Georgetown University April 28 to hear an address by Hans Küng of the University of Tübingen. When Catholic University authorities canceled the invitation to Fr. Küng to lecture there, Georgetown immediately asked him to deliver the annual Gaston lecture, a lectureship administered by an undergraduate committee supervised by the dean of students. Bishop William F. Creighton of the Washington Episcopal diocese and Episcopal Bishop Angus Dun, retired, were seated on the platform with Fr. Küng. Other non-Roman leaders were also invited to attend.

On the same evening when the theologically oriented were listening to Fr. Küng, the musically inclined attended an interfaith festival of choral and organ music at St. Margaret's Episcopal Church. Choirs from St. Thomas the Apostle (Roman Catholic) Church, the Washington Hebrew Congregation and the host parish participated. Each choir's presentation was germane to its own tradition, the St. Thomas group presenting the first American performance of Swiss composer Heinrich Sutermeister's Mass in E-flat.

1317 G. St.,
Washington 5.

Fellowships Awarded

The National Lutheran Educational Conference has awarded 37 Martin Luther graduate fellowships granting recipients a total of $53,000 for the 1963-64 academic year.

Everything for the CHURCH

- ☐ Altars ☐ Pews ☐ Organs
- ☐ Flags ☐ Lighting Fixtures
- ☐ Visual Aids ☐ Bibles
- ☐ Folding Chairs and Tables
- ☐ Sterling and Brass Ware
- ☐ Stained Glass Windows
- ☐ Books of Remembrance
- ☐ Bells, Van Bergen bells from Holland

Check above items in which you are interested and write for FREE catalog.

WHITTEMORE ASSOCIATES, INC.
ECCLESIOLOGISTS
16 ASHBURTON PLACE, BOSTON 8, MASS.
Tel. CApitol 7-2150

HARPSICHORD

Same as owned by Philadelphia Orchestra and RCA Victor. In kit form for easy home workshop assembly $150. Clavichord kit $100. Free brochure. Write: Zuckermann Harpsichords, Dept. CC, 115 Christopher St., New York 14, N. Y.

POSITION WANTED

Organist-Director, 18 years fulltime ministry of music experience. 10 years in present position. Desires change. Male, married, family. Excellent references. Address The Christian Century, 407 So. Dearborn St., Chicago 5, Ill. Box 25.

WANTED: Ordained minister of education to be responsible for educational program of 1,000-member church school. Unlimited opportunity to develop creative educational program in largest Protestant church in community of 50,000; sixty miles from Chicago. Write Christian Century, 407 S. Dearborn St., Chicago 5, Ill. Box 26.

CO-PASTOR available for new challenge as senior minister. Strong preaching and pastoral concern. Will serve Baptist or United Church of Christ congregation. Basic salary requirement $8,000 excluding allowances. Write Christian Century, 407 S. Dearborn, Chicago 5, Illinois, Box 27.

R+R Rel.

ML

New South

filler material

ANNUAL ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL DAY
ADDRESS
DELIVERED BY SARGENT SHRIVER
DIRECTOR, PEACE CORPS
MAY 30, 1963

"In all the years of my husband's public life," said Eleanor Roosevelt, "I never once heard him make a remark which indicated that any crisis could not be solved."

This Memorial Day you have done me the honor of asking me to speak at the life-long home and final resting place of two people whose lives were a testament to faith in the creative power of man to solve his own problems.

They were the finest products of the nation which they loved and led. Through their work the United States passed successfully through the most troubled and dangerous period of its history into an era, not less troubled, but with a shape and challenge which is a product of their triumph.

We have before us difficulties as fresh and as grave as those that challenged Roosevelt. But the nature of those difficulties and our capacity to deal with them has been profoundly influenced by his life and his work.

I come here today not as a participant in the Age of Roosevelt--not as a colleague or as a friend--many of whom have spoken in this place--but as an inheritor of that age and, even more, as the leader of an organization to whose members the name of Roosevelt can be only a memory produced by school textbooks or the stories of parents. Yet the life of the more than 5,000 Peace Corps Volunteers has taken a direction marked out for us by his vision and skill. He was the principal architect of our America.

It is said that Roosevelt's task was easier because he took office at a time of great national crisis. The normal processes of political debate were suspended, opposition had been submerged by the flood of national misery, and everyone turned to him expectantly for leadership. In large measure this was true. This created a great opportunity, but it also vastly magnified the potential danger of failure. He was given an almost empty canvas to work upon, but it was also demanded that he produce a masterpiece.

The preamble to the Constitution lists among the objectives of the American people "to establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." In our entire history no leader was truer to that mandate than Franklin Roosevelt.

Under his guidance the United States emerged into a period of unparalleled domestic prosperity and tranquility. He laid the foundations of today's affluent society and, in so doing, established the principle that the nation was responsible for the general welfare of all its citizens. And although there are many pockets of poverty and injustice still left, we have today, for the first time, the legal and material resources to wipe out these pockets and deal effectively with our social problems.

In our dealings with the world, he thrust America, almost against its will, into the center of the world arena. He strengthened us to defeat freedom's most brutal and powerful enemies and destroyed the isolationism and parochial outlook which had kept the United States from assuming its rightful place in the world.

These achievements eliminated the historic shackles of scarce resources, inadequate material wealth, social unjustices which perpetuated the privileges of a few at the expense of imprisoning the talents of the many, and the unwillingness of the United States to admit that it was part of a greater world community.

Thus, because of him, for the first time in our history, the issue is not whether we will have the strength to deal with our problems, but whether we have the moral courage to use that strength; not whether we will have resources, but whether we choose to use those resources for the world's welfare; not whether we can, but whether we will.

Thus today's central issue is a moral issue--the issue of commitment. Largely because of Roosevelt we are the first nation in history with the strength to solve its own problems. If we fail, it will be a failure of will, or moral courage--a failure of commitment.

--We can wipe out the remaining pockets of unemployment and poverty in this country.

--We can ensure some measure of security against the ravages of disease or old age.

--We can take the Negro and other minority peoples into full membership in American society.

--We can harness and use science for the welfare of our people.

--We can work for a world in which almost three billion underprivileged will be our colleagues in the task of progress, rather than a constant threat to what we have achieved for ourselves.

I do not say this lightly. I don't think these are easy problems with easy solutions. I have seen the grinding face of poverty and idleness in the mines of West Virginia. I have come face to face with racial hatred on the South Side of Chicago where I witnessed Catholics stoning fellow Catholics on the steps of a church because they were black. And, in the last few years, I have travelled 500,000 miles around the world seeing, at first hand, the deep barriers of culture, belief, prejudice and superstition which divide us from our fellow man.

But I also know something of the power of commitment.

In up-country Sierra Leone a young Peace Corps Volunteer had helped build a road which connected a small village for the first time to the outside world. When I arrived there the village chief said to me: "Mr. Shriver, we had never even seen a car before. You have shown us a world we never dreamed existed. We had always heard about America, but now we know what it means."

The Chief Secretary of East Pakistan wrote to me: "The Peace Corps has come to work for us, but more importantly to live with us. When someone comes to share your life as well as your work, it has deeper meaning. I have an entirely new concept of Americans."

And throughout the world thousands of our people are creating a new concept of America. They have given two years to work with no pay, under arduous conditions, in order to help others realize their own aspirations. The individual commitment of these men and women is doing more than any of us can realize to refashion our relationships to the rest of the world. "Here is a movement," wrote Arnold Toynbee of the Peace Corps, "whose express purpose is to overcome the disastrous barriers that have hitherto segregated the affluent Western minority of the human race from the majority of their fellow men and women...I believe that, in the Peace Corps, the non-Western majority of mankind is going to meet a sample of Western man at his best."

I speak of the Peace Corps not because it is an organization which can solve all of the problems of American life, but because it is proof that deeply committed individuals, prepared to work and sacrifice, can have a profound impact on the most difficult and intransigent of problems.

It was not so many years ago that "Yankee Go Home" was one of the most popular slogans of the underdeveloped world, or that our former Vice President was being stoned by the same people in Latin America who cheered and venerated the name of Roosevelt. Yet today almost every nation in the world is asking for more of these same "Yankees" in the form of Peace Corps Volunteers, and the requests we have far exceed our capacity to deliver.

Recently, in the Dominican Republic, a group of young Dominicans were painting the slogan "Yankee Go Home" on a stone wall, while a Volunteer watched quietly. When they had finished he said, "I guess that means I'll have to go home." The leader of the group turned to him in dismay and said: "No we mean Yankees, not the Peace Corps."

The Peace Corps represents the real Yankees. These young men and women have proved that we have not yet become so submerged and blinded by the pursuit of material wealth--the suburban houses, the chrome-covered cars, the opiates of television and Hollywood--that we have lost our capacity to deal with the harsh realities of our society. Individual Americans still have it in them to make, and carry out, deep personal commitments to building a better society. If we did not believe this then we would have nothing to do but wait quietly for the decay and destruction of our civilization.

When I speak of the need for commitment, I do not mean commitment by the President or the Cabinet or the Congress. We already have that. We have a government of deeply committed men. But we wrong the heritage of Roosevelt if we draw from his administration the lesson that our problems are going to be solved by a few men in Washington, while the rest of us indulge in the luxury of personal satisfactions.

For it cannot happen that way. Presidents, courts and legislatures alike are helpless in a democracy without the commitment of all the citizens. They are conductors without an orchestra. Many Volunteers realize that. They take upon themselves the burden of the world's problems. They are willing to labor without recognition because they feel responsible for this country. They do not believe America is someone else's problem. It is their problem and they are committed to its solution.

Take civil rights, for example. This is, without doubt, the central issue of our society. Yet for a decade we have left the problem to the sadly inadequate machinery of the courts. We have sat in our living rooms sipping beer, and watched violence in the streets--in our streets--turned off the television sets and criticized The President for not acting quickly enough, or acting too precipitously.

After spending the day making money, and shopping at the supermarket and ordering the new car, we have given a few precious moments to bewailing the lack of action of the leaders whose only support from the mass of American people has been the half-hour it took them to walk to the voting booth.

Civil rights is not only a legal problem or a Presidential problem. It will not be solved by new bills in Congress or ordering troops to the scene of struggle. It is a pervasive illness which tears at the fabric of our society. And it will not be cured until that society wakes to its responsibilities.

What can we do about it,you ask? There is much you can do.

Citizens can organize groups to finance and support those who are in the front lines of the struggle.

Businessmen and financial interests can make their colleagues realize that investments and commerce will not be safe in areas of racial strife--and lend their weight to peaceful solutions as did the negotiators of Birmingham.

Homeowners can band together in societies for the integration of housing--seeking out Negro homeowners for their neighborhoods, helping to break down the awful housing ghettos which disgrace the North.

Volunteer groups can be formed to do social welfare work, job training and the many tasks which are necessary to give the Negro the social and economic tools to achieve equal opportunity.

Congregations and individual ministers and priests can actively recruit Negro members for their congregation, admitting them to their fellowship of God and the society of their members.

These are only examples of what can be done. The need is not merely for laws or edicts, but for the self-organization of society on a large scale to solve the problem which, more than any other, threatens the integrity of America. The proof of this is in the North--in Chicago and New York and Washington--where our books are full of high-sounding laws and regulations, but where hypocrisy and racial hatred and the apathy of decent citizens has made a mockery of social justice and equal opportunity.

If we, as citizens, and as a nation, can commit ourselves to the solution of this problem, then it can be solved. If we don't, government can never solve it.

The Peace Corps and civil rights are only examples of the challenge and opportunity which Roosevelt's accomplishments have given us. He provided us with the foundation of a stable society at home and strength in world affairs. We must now show that we have the moral courage--the personal commitment--to use that stability and wealth and strength in the cause of justice and the construction of a good society at home and throughout the world.

Are we up to the task? Well, I believe that the answer is to be found in a letter written to his parents by a young Peace Corps Volunteer shortly before he was killed in an airplane accident in Colombia. "Should it come to it," wrote young David Crozier, "I would rather give my life trying to help someone than to have to give my life looking down a gun barrel at them."

After his death, when his parents sent me this letter, they added a postscript. They said: "Mr. Shriver, we are not sorry David joined the Peace Corps."

This ray of light illuminates the America Franklin Roosevelt believed in and which I believe in--an America whose latent dedication and commitment is equal to the challenges and the opportunities which have grown out of the Age of Roosevelt.

Namee for the fire department's accomplishments "in reducing fires and fire losses" in 1962.

COUNCIL LAUDS CHAMBER

The councilmanic resolution citing the chamber for "stimulating and supporting fire activities in our city" was presented to Chamber President Richard V. Bond by council's majority leader, Councilman George X. Schwartz.

The chamber's award to the city was accepted by Mayor James H. J. Tate and Council President Paul D'Ortona. It praised council and the administration for "their diligent applications to the city's fire safety program."

R & R Rel.

Lyndon Johnson Delivers 20th Century Sequel to Gettysburg Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROMAN C. PUCINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, May 21, 1963

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, Memorial Day, May 30, 1963, Vice President LYNDON JOHNSON, delivered an oration in Gettysburg, Pa., which in my judgment shall stand for time immemorial as the 20th Century sequel to Abraham Lincoln's immortal Gettysburg Address.

In order for all Americans to see Mr. JOHNSON'S profound announcement in its entirety, I am talking the privilege today to include it in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, Vice President JOHNSON'S Memorial Day address follows:

REMARKS OF VICE PRESIDENT LYNDON B. JOHNSON, MEMORIAL DAY, GETTYSBURG, PA.

On this hallowed ground, heroic deeds were performed and eloquent words were spoken a century ago.

We, the living, have not forgotten—and the world will never forget—the deeds or the words of Gettysburg. We honor them now as we join on this Memorial Day of 1963 in a prayer for permanent peace of the world and fulfillment of our hopes for universal freedom and justice.

We are called to honor our own words of reverent prayer with resolution in the deeds we must perform to preserve peace and the hope of freedom.

We keep a vigil of peace around the world.

Until the world knows no aggressors, until the arms of tyranny have been laid down, until freedom has risen up in every land, we shall maintain our vigil to make sure our sons who died on foreign fields shall not have died in vain.

As we maintain the vigil of peace, we must remember that justice is a vigil, too—a vigil we must keep in our own streets and schools and among the lives of all our people—so that those who died here on their native soil shall not have died in vain.

One hundred years ago, the slave was freed.

One hundred years later, the Negro remains in bondage to the color of his skin.

The Negro today asks justice.

We do not answer him—we do not answer those who lie beneath this soil—when we reply to the Negro by asking, "Patience."

It is empty to plead that the solution to the dilemmas of the present rests on the hands of the clock. The solution is in our hands. Unless we are willing to yield up our destiny of greatness among the civilizations of history, Americans—white and Negro together—must be about the business of resolving the challenge which confronts us now.

Our Nation found its soul in honor on these fields of Gettysburg 100 years ago. We must not lose that soul in dishonor now on the fields of hate.

To ask for patience from the Negro is to ask him to give more of what he has already given enough. But to fail to ask of him—and of all Americans—perseverance within the processes of a free and responsible society would be to fail to ask what the national interest requires of all its citizens.

The law cannot save those who deny it but neither can the law serve any who do not use it. The history of injustice and inequality is a history of disuse of the law. Law has not failed—and is not failing. We as a Nation have failed ourselves by not trusting the law and by not using the law to gain sooner the ends of justice which law alone serves.

If the white overestimates what he has done for the Negro without the law, the Negro may underestimate what he is doing and can do for himself with the law.

If it is empty to ask Negro or white for patience, it is not empty—it is merely honest—to ask perseverance. Men may build barricades—and others may hurl themselves against those barricades—but what would happen at the barricades would yield no answers. The answers will only be wrought by our perseverance together. It is deceit to promise more as it would be cowardice to demand less.

In this hour, it is not our respective races which are at stake—it is our Nation. Let those who care for their country come forward, North and South, white and Negro, to lead the way through this moment of challenge and decision.

The Negro says, "Now." Others say, "Never." The voice of responsible Americans—the voice of those who died here and the great man who spoke here—their voices say, "Together." There is no other way.

Until justice is blind to color, until education is unaware of race, until opportunity is unconcerned with the color of men's skins, emancipation will be a proclamation but not a fact. To the extent that the Proclamation of Emancipation is not fulfilled in fact, to that extent we shall have fallen short of assuring freedom to the free.

Communist Poland Blames United States for Increased Tension in Laos

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 6, 1963

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, the commonsense action taken by Congress last year to deny favored-nation treatment to Communist-occupied Poland and Yugoslavia has been more than vindicated by subsequent events.

The basic argument presented by the special pleaders for these two Communist dictatorships was that treating them as friends and favored recipients of our largess would cause them to loosen the chains of Moscow. Members of Congress have heard that fable repeated so often that it sounds like a broken record. But relief is in sight. The fable has been put to rest by the Warsaw regime.

The Washington Post, in a story from Warsaw dated May 28, 1963, reports that the Communist regime in Poland blames the United States for increased tension in Laos. The International Control Commission charged with maintaining peace in Laos was made inoperative by the refusal of the Polish member on it to recognize Communist aggression against that country as an act of war. He was recalled to Warsaw for consultations and the Polish regime then charged the United States with subversion and aggression in all the countries of old Indochina. In the upside-down language of Moscow this means resistance against Communist efforts to liberate Laos and Vietnam into communism. But it also means removal of any doubts about the real character of the Warsaw regime—it is a loyal stooge of Moscow. This calumny laid upon the United States puts to rest the overworked fables about the character of the Warsaw regime.

I insert at this point the Warsaw report carried in the Washington Post on May 29, 1963:

COMMUNIST POLAND BLAMES UNITED STATES FOR INCREASED TENSION IN LAOS

WARSAW, Poland, May 28.—Poland charged tonight that Laotian rightwing elements and the United States are to blame for increased tension in Laos.

A government statement denied Western charges that Poland was obstructing efforts of the International Control Commission (ICC) to maintain the peace in Laos.

The statement, circulated by the official Polish Press Agency, in effect defended the actions of Marek Thee, Polish armistice commissioner recalled from Laos to Warsaw last weekend for consultations.

Representatives of Poland, Canada, and India make up the ICC. It was set up by the 14-nation Geneva conference on Laos, which nominally guarantee Laos' independence and neutrality, to police the truce among the warring right-wing, neutralist and pro-Communist factions.

However, the West has blamed Poland for ICC's inability to take effective action in the recent fighting between neutralists and the pro-Communist Pathet Lao.

The Polish representatives were accused of blocking efforts to place an ICC team in the Pathet Lao-controlled areas, and have refused to accompany Canadian and Indian ICC members on inspections of the neutralist-held areas.

The Polish statement said, however, that "attempts of certain Western circles to blame the Polish representative for the existing situation are futile.

"The machinations of the rightist Laotian circles, supported by reactionary imperialist centers, have threatened recently to annihilate the bases of the Geneva agreements."

It said that rightwing leader Phoumi Nosavan's staff, "with American help, has not ceased training and equipping subversive groups acting behind the Pathet Lao. Transfers of battalions of General Nosavan into the Plain of Jars are also taking place."

The Polish statement marks the first time the public has been told of Thee's split with the Indian and Canadian ICC members.

The United States, which reportedly has been exerting pressure on the Poles to cooperate in Laos, was mentioned several times in the statement.

It declared that "an increase of tension is caused by U.S. military displays in the area of Indochina and weapon supplies to the rightist groups."

Communist China has made similar charges in recent months.

Leslie & Peggy - I hope this will interest you. Best regards - Dan.
R+R Rel

A Voice for Moderation

May 1963

Racial trouble has struck Albany (Ga.), Oxford (Miss.), Washington, D.C., and now Birmingham. What city or town will be next? Aiken and Augusta have been free of such strife to date. Is this simply our good luck, or our good will and good management, or what? Are we doing all we can to prevent our communities from some day becoming a battleground at the whim of an extremist, colored or white? What are we doing? Anything?

I have just read a book entitled, "Wade Hampton and the Negro" by Hampton M. Jarrell, (U. of S.C. Press, Columbia, 1949). It is slow reading (heavily documented) but an eye-opener. I recommend it for both races. It points out clearly that Hampton, one of our State's greatest leaders in the difficult Reconstruction Period, was truly a moderate in his approach to racial problems. He was condemned equally by both the radical Republicans of the North and by those who advocated absolute white supremacy in our own State. He triumphed over both extremes long enough to restore South Carolina to the Union and give our State ten years of racial harmony and comparative prosperity after carpet-bagger misrule. Hampton was a champion of negro rights, in fact a champion of negro equality under the law, although clearly a segregated type of equality in his day. Hampton was a moderate who "sought a middle way whereby they could, without hatred and strife, solve the difficult social problem of two races living side by side in almost equal numbers." Aging and disabled, he was ultimately displaced by Ben Tillman and other extremists who shaped our State's destiny for the next generation. The perspective of history gives added stature to Wade Hampton, leaving a tarnished image of Tillman.

What would Wade Hampton do today, were he living? Would he sit on his hands and do nothing? I believe he would again lead us upon a moderate course and could again win the support of the vast majority of both races.

What is the fundamental problem of integration versus segregation? I believe it is a conflict between a desire for an equality requiring mixing or association and the counter-desire to remain apart or to disassociate. In today's world these rights or desires must clearly conflict or overlap in certain places and at certain times. Neither desire is all right or all wrong. Our racial problems are something like having two groups of people walking opposite directions on a narrow sidewalk. It's impractical to build another sidewalk. It's pointless to expect one group to get out of the way. Some mixing is necessary to pass one another. Throwing up a road-block won't help. Neither will pushing to go too fast. Shoulders may be rubbed, but if both groups are moderates, they will pass easily with no one really the worse for it.

My analogy is certainly over-simplified, but this is the point: The time has come for the voices of today's moderates to speak out, loudly, clearly, - and with determination to prevail over the die-hard do-nothings or the radical inflamers of the mob. Extremists, white or colored, who are all too vocal and all too ready to fight - or break laws - to hold to their all too narrow, uncompromising positions, will push our land, North and South, to the edge of distrust, fear, hatred, and civil strife, if their voices are heard and heeded by the masses of white or colored citizens.

The time has come for a great many people to understand and accept certain truths --

- It is time for the white man to realize he simply cannot preserve the status quo, that the colored race wants and deserves something better.
- It is time for the colored man to realize he cannot force his personal presence upon the white race without counter-force in some form.
- It is time for the white man to recognize the negro's basic equality under law, and to help the colored race achieve this equality in the large public area, whether it be in buses, railroad stations, with voting privileges, on juries, or holding public offices.
- It is time for the colored man to realize that there is a basic right of disassociation, to set one's self apart from others unwanted for whatever reason (regardless of race), which is just as sacred (and human) as any right of association.
- It is time for the white man to stop throwing road-blocks or delaying action in the way of legal, peaceable efforts of negroes to achieve equality under the law, and to realize that such equality has not really fostered intermarriage or even much social mixing, except for a few mavericks who seek the challenge of rebellion against deep-rooted social custom.
- It is time for the colored man to stop breaking present laws to achieve his goals. Civil disobedience may be understandable in the face of discouragement over slow court action or die-hard white resistance. This does not make it right nor even sensible to disregard local law and create civil disorders. "Non-violent force" is still force and will beget violence, leaving a wake of resentment, hatred, or even loss of life. "Demonstrators" risk losing the support of the white men who favor their cause but abhor mob rule.
- It is time for the white man to stop concentrating his attention on the negro's different attributes (whether they be physical, emotional, mental or moral), and begin concentrating on the human qualities that colored people have in common with white people. We are much more alike than we are different.
- It is time for the colored people to do a far better job of policing or pressuring their own people with respect to preventing crime, anti-social behavior, immorality, and welfare abuse. It is time that those who seek equality work harder for, and insist upon, higher standards among their own people, whether such standards be educational, or hygenic, or with regard to manners or social conduct, or the community's appearance or cleanliness, or meeting their financial and parental responsibilities. Many are successfully doing this, but not nearly enough.
- It is time for the white leaders to be willing, Yes, to invite, the colored leaders of local communities to sit down with them to discuss practical ways and means of solving mutual problems, helping the negro achieve deserved equality in the public area, yet insisting upon their responsible and restrained use of newly-won rights or privileges. Aiken, for example, should have a bi-racial council of some kind meeting regularly and making recommendations to our public officials, educators, and the business community. A local leadership vacuum only serves to invite outside agitators or extremists.

- It is time for the colored man to realize that many white people truly and sincerely want to advance colored rights and living standards, but that "To love thy neighbor" does not necessarily mean to embrace him. It means treating him with fairness, justice, mercy, courtesy, helpfulness and even friendliness, but does not have to include physical proximity or social mixing, unless or until such manifestations of love come naturally, if ever. In other words, our colored friends should not feel any sense of hurt, or resentment, or any sense of inequality, over the white man's desire to remain apart socially. Man chooses his close friends in diverse ways. If this be human nature, it should be accepted as such, without any sense of inferiority or resentment by the "Uninvited" neighbor. Similarly, those colored persons who prefer to remain separate socially should insist upon their right to do so.
- It is time for such bi-racial councils to seek, with patience and moderation but with a sense of urgency, ways of promoting racial equality in the difficult semi-public area of restaurants, department stores, employment opportunities, recreation facilities, etc. More desegregation in this area is inevitable, but requires recognition of timing factors, proper preparations by white leaders, and the earnest cooperation of colored leaders to prevent incidents that flaunt rights of privacy or disassociation.
- It is time for such bi-racial councils to seek some common ground of agreement concerning the difficult question of school desegregation, with a willingness to move off extreme positions and to compromise. This is not impossible. It is being done in some communities. The effort should be made in Aiken and Augusta. Peaceful desegregation of schools voluntarily controlled by local leaders of both races, may be favored or opposed by each of us according to his views, background, or personal feeling. But it is preferable to either the unacceptable status quo, condemned by national and world opinion, or a semi-violent forced integration dictated by outsiders. At the same time, our colored leaders should weigh carefully the economic, psychological and social costs of school integration and not pursue integration for its own sake without careful consideration of the probable consequences in each case.
- Finally, while the moderates' voices make themselves heard, it is time for white and colored men to renew long-standing friendships, to welcome new friendships, to strike mistrust, hate or fear from their hearts, and to treat one another with the patience, courtesy and dignity appropriate to their relationship as men, regardless of race.

Should we wait for a lawsuit and the inflammatory oratory of the courtroom? Should we wait for the tension of demonstrations, parades, and mass arrests? Or is it time for moderate leaders of both races to speak out, and to sit down together to find peaceable, workable solutions to these problems? I believe Wade Hampton would have done this. It's time to make a start!

- Daniel K. Miller

LWD, PA, JT

U. S. News & World Report 6/3/63 R+R Rel.

Interview With Governor Barnett of Mississippi

THE NEGRO'S FUTURE IN THE SOUTH

With pressure against racial barriers growing, is the South changing in its attitude toward the Negroes?

If left to themselves, what would States such as Mississippi do about the drive for mixed schools, mixed restaurants, all the other campaigns aimed against segregation?

Is a real solution to the racial problem possible without conflict and violence?

To get the viewpoint of a State political leader, "U. S. News & World Report" invited Governor Barnett of Mississippi to its conference room for this exclusive interview by members of the magazine's news staff.

Q Governor Barnett, does the Negro in Mississippi, or in any other Southern State, have much of a future?

A Yes, he does. The Negro who takes advantage of his educational opportunities and otherwise prepares himself for responsibilities has every reason to look forward to a bright future and a higher standard of living in any section of the South.

Q As good a future as in the North?

A Frankly, I think he'd have a better future in the South than in the North.

Q Why do you say that?

A Take Negro schoolteachers, for example: In Mississippi we have one Negro schoolteacher to every 119 Negro citizens. In New York, I am told, there is one Negro schoolteacher to every 500 Negro citizens and in Ohio one Negro teacher to every 485 Negro citizens. So there is one example that I think is outstanding.

Q What other opportunities do Negroes have in the South?

A In Mississippi, as in other States of the South, we have many Negro professional people, such as doctors, lawyers, teachers, dentists, undertakers, ministers, social workers, nurses and many others.

In addition, we have Negroes who own their own businesses—quite a number of them, wealthy businessmen. They own real estate. In Mississippi, there are more than 27,000 Negro farmers who own title to land valued at approximately 100 million dollars. More than 27 per cent of the privately owned homes in Mississippi are owned by Negroes.

Q How many Negroes are there in Mississippi?

A About 43 per cent of the population is Negro; 57 per cent is white. Two years ago it was about 45 per cent Negro and 55 per cent white.

Q Then are Negroes leaving Mississippi?

A Some have left, yes. But they are not leaving in great numbers.

Q What kinds of people are leaving?

A I think the better-educated Negroes are staying. Our statistics show that a higher percentage of the graduates of Jackson State College for Negroes remain in Mississippi after graduation than the graduates of any other State-supported college for either race. We believe that the better-educated Negroes stay in Mississippi because they find it easier to secure employment in the fields for which they are qualified.

Those Negroes who leave Mississippi are usually those unskilled in any type of trade or profession.

Q Why do they leave?

A We consider the lack of farm employment as one of the principal reasons for migration of Negro laborers into other areas. Farm mechanization and Government restrictions on cotton acreage have eliminated many farm jobs. Most of these migrants from the South have gone to big cities of the North.

Q Do you think that a wider distribution of the Negro population outside the South would be a good thing?

A It would be for the South, yes. Then the North and East would better understand our problem.

Q Do you mean you think the South would be better off with fewer Negroes?

A Yes.

Q Then would you prefer it if the Negroes left the South?

A No. I'm not wanting them to leave. We value our Negro citizens. But they have the freedom of choice to remain in the South or to move elsewhere.

Q What about schools for Negroes? Are they given an opportunity to get an education in the South?

A Oh, yes, sir. As far as schools are concerned, our Negro students can receive an education just as good as any other student right up through liberal-arts degrees in colleges.

Q Do you have colleges for Negroes?

A We have three State-supported colleges for Negroes in Mississippi. At Jackson State College for Negroes, in Jackson, the State capital, they have about 1,700 Negro students. Alcorn A. & M. College at Lorman, near Utica, Miss., was the first senior land-grant college for Negroes ever built in the United States. It has about 1,450 students. Then we also have the Mississippi College for Negroes at Itta Bena, Miss., with around 1,200 students.

 Copyright © 1963, U. S. News & World Report, Inc.

—USN&WR Photo

ROSS R. BARNETT is a 65-year-old lawyer who is now in his fourth year as Governor of Mississippi.

Governor Barnett is facing trial in federal court on charges of criminal contempt, stemming from his resistance to enrollment of James H. Meredith, a Negro, at the University of Mississippi.

Q Are these colleges accredited?

A Two of them are. Jackson State College and Alcorn A. & M. are fully accredited by, and are members of, the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools. Mississippi Vocational at Itta Bena is a new institution and has not yet attained membership in the Southern Association.

All three are accredited by the Mississippi Association of Colleges and Schools and by the accrediting commission of the State of Mississippi.

I'll show you, gentlemen, how good we are to the Negroes: Since 1952, Mississippi has spent at least 100 million dollars in building school facilities on a State level, 90 million on a local level. And 63 per cent of that money went into construction of Negro school facilities.

At the college level during 1960-62 the State money spent for new buildings averaged $497 per Negro student compared with $372 per white student. Tax money provided for general support of public higher education was $580 per white student and $622 per Negro student.

Q Was that to bring Negro schools up to the standards of the schools for whites?

A It's a continuing gradual improvement. You know, until the Civil War, the Negroes were slaves, illiterate. But they've come a long way since the end of the War Between the States. Proof of the increasing quality of education in our Negro schools is the increasing number of Negro teachers who qualify for higher degrees. We now have 7,382 Negro teachers with a master's degree or above.

Q What about professional training or graduate study? Can Negroes get that in Mississippi colleges or do they have to go outside the State?

A Well, in some instances they have to go to schools outside the State. A legislative grant was passed in 1948 and went into effect in 1949. The grant provides for students who want to take up medicine, law, architecture, engineering and other courses not available in our colleges for Negro students.

The amount of grant varies from $100 to $500 per year. We pay the difference in the amount a college out of State would charge for the course, as compared to the charge in Mississippi. Travel, tuition and living expenses are provided for in the grant. Over 5,000 Negro students have been aided by this program.

Q The only school integration you have in Mississippi is at the University of Mississippi, isn't it?

A Ole Miss is not integrated today, gentlemen.

Q But one Negro, James Meredith, is enrolled in the University—

A You know what he says, don't you—that he's the most segregated Negro in America.

Q Has he opened the door to larger integration? Do you see the time coming when there will be integration in the University of Mississippi on a broader scale?

A No.

Q People in the North usually take the position that the question of school integration, including colleges, has been settled by the U. S. Supreme Court, and the people up here keep asking: "Why don't the people of Mississippi obey the law of the land?" How would you answer that?

A With all due respect to the Supreme Court—and I have the utmost respect for all courts—the 1954 decision in Brown vs. Topeka Board of Education is not the law of the land. It's the law of that particular case. And I don't believe there are many lawyers in America who will disagree with me on that.

The 1954 decision applies to that case only. It does not apply to Mississippi or Alabama or Georgia or any other State. These States have their right to their day in court. All cases are just a little different—no two cases are exactly the same.

Q Do you think that each case of a Negro seeking to enter a white school in Mississippi will have to go through a separate process in court, as James Meredith did? Or will there be a sort of mass entry of Negro students?

A Nobody knows the answer to that.

Q What would happen if public schools in Mississippi were given a direct court order to desegregate? Would the schools be closed?

A I just don't know. It's legal for them to be closed in Mississippi. The trustees may close the schools. The Governor may close the schools—public schools, that is. But we'll have to wait until we get to that bridge before we cross it. The order hasn't come yet.

. . . "Separation of races in education is best for both races"

Q Why is the South so strongly opposed to integration of public schools?

A We believe that separation of the races in public education is the best for both races. Because of our population ratio, if we integrate our classrooms we will have some classes predominantly Negro and some classes predominantly white. We know that a student can learn and develop himself into a good citizen if he acquires his education among classmates of his own race, with a teacher of his own race. The disgraceful situation in Washington, D. C., and other big cities where resegregation has been the final result of forced integration further proves our point that tensions exist in heavily integrated classrooms.

In the report on official investigation of the Thanksgiving Day football riot at the District of Columbia stadium, published in "U. S. News & World Report," it was revealed that 316 whites and 30 Negroes were injured. In addition, 145 persons reported being pushed, shoved and slapped. There were broken noses, broken jaws, dislocated jaws, and teeth knocked out. This was a deplorable racial outburst in our nation's capital.

Q Governor, can you foresee a time when there will be desegregation in Mississippi?

A No, sir. I hope that it will never come. Do you want to know why? Because, gentlemen, we believe in the purity and the integrity of both races. And everywhere people have integrated long enough and extensively enough, it has absolutely ruined every civilization.

Q Do you mean that you regard Negroes as inferior and that you feel intermarriage would dilute the quality of the white race?

A That's exactly it. It has happened, gentlemen. History teaches us that it's happened many times.

Q Do you foresee integration anywhere in the South on any extensive scale?

A No.

WHERE THE PEOPLE STAND—

Q How do you size up the present sentiment of people in Mississippi? Are there more of them who believe in integration now than there were, say, a few years ago?

A I doubt it. The people of our State are firm believers in separation of the races. They are firm and unwavering believers. I don't think many have weakened, though it may be that some were weaker than we thought they were before the 1954 school decision.

Q There have been reports of a shift in attitude in the South recently—that more and more people there are deciding that integration is inevitable and taking this attitude: "I'm still against it, but it's going to come, so we'd better bring it on our terms instead of the Federal Government's." Do you sense such a shift?

A No, sir, I don't.

Q You don't think many people in the South feel that way?

A Some weaklings do. Some moderates do. But I think the big majority of the people are still firm in their belief that integration is wrong.

Q And they don't see it as inevitable?

A No, they don't admit it's inevitable. They think the pendulum will swing back the other way.

Q Why do they think the pendulum will swing back?

A Because the Northern people don't really want integration either. They don't want it any more than we do, even though they say they do. We are honest—we admit that we don't want it. That's the main difference. In the North and in the East they say they want it. They are not honest about it and we are. Now, that's the God's truth about it, gentlemen.

Q What kind of status does a Negro have in Mississippi? Is it comparable to that of a white person?

A Comparable in what way?

JOBS FOR NEGROES—

Q Does a Negro have the same freedom of choice of work and of job opportunities, for example?

A Yes, if he can qualify for jobs. Then, of course, it's up to management—if management wants to hire him. You see, we believe in freedom of choice.

By custom and tradition there are still many types of jobs, of course, which have not been filled by Negroes.

Q What types of jobs are not given to Negroes?

A Well, probably secretaries, stenographers, bank tellers, such as that. There is no law which prohibits Negroes from serving in such capacities, for the hiring of personnel is regarded as free enterprise and decisions are up to management. Whomever the manager wants to hire, he has the right to hire.

Some of these same attitudes prevail in practically every State in the Union. In other words, it's up to management. I don't believe employers ever should be forced to employ people of any race if, in the employer's opinion and judgment, such a person is not fully qualified to discharge the duties and responsibilities entrusted to the job.

Q Are Negroes permitted to vote in Mississippi?

A More than 30,000 Negroes are registered to vote in Mississippi.

Q Isn't this a small number in relation to the number of white voters? Why are there so few Negro voters?

A The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote. You see, there are certain requirements for voting in Mississippi.

Q What are the requirements?

A You not only have to be 21 years of age. You must never have been convicted of an infamous crime or the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors within the past five years. You cannot be a common gambler or a habitual drunkard. You must be of good moral character. And you have to be able to prove it.

Q Do voters have to pass a literacy test?

A They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the State of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials.

Q How does the poll-tax requirement work?

A The poll tax is $2 a year, and, since two consecutive poll-tax receipts are required for voting in a primary, a voter pays $4 for this privilege. The poll-tax receipts, incidentally, go directly into the education fund for both races.

Q Do all whites qualify to vote in Mississippi?

A No, sir. There are plenty of whites who can't qualify. You'd be surprised. We don't believe in a government of the ignorant, by the ignorant and for the ignorant. Like the founders of our nation, we believe that voting is a privilege and not just a right.

Q Can Negroes go into theaters in Mississippi?

A They have their own theaters. But most of the public

. . . There would be no trouble "if outsiders would let us alone"

theaters also have accommodations for Negroes. In small cities, the balconies are often reserved for Negroes.

Q What about restaurants?

A They have their own restaurants.

Q Parks?

A They have their own parks.

Q But they cannot go into the restaurants or parks or theaters reserved for whites?

A No, sir. Now, the Jackson Municipal Park has never been segregated. Negroes don't go into the lake there, but they move about freely and enjoy other facilities.

Q How about swimming pools? Are they integrated?

A I don't think Negroes have ever gone into white swimming pools.

Q Has there been any change in recent years? Is the Negro gaining in stature? Is his position improving?

A Yes, I think it has improved a great deal.

Q Due to the Negro's own efforts?

A Yes. Those Negroes who have justified their advancement have been able to gain that advancement.

We have Negroes who own their own businesses and who serve both white and colored customers, particularly as skilled tradesmen.

If Negroes can do the same kind of work as efficiently and are on the alert like white people they can get salaries like the white people. We have Negro auto mechanics making as much as white auto mechanics. We have Negro bricklayers and painters who get paid the same wage as white bricklayers and white painters. For schoolteachers, it's the same way.

Gentlemen, in Mississippi whites and Negroes work side by side in harmony, peace and understanding. And if the outsiders would let us alone, we wouldn't have any trouble.

Q What do you mean by "outsiders"?

A Agitators who come in and try to poison the Negroes' minds, cause confusion and turmoil. This has gotten worse in the last few years.

Q What is the reaction of white people in the South to those "outsiders"?

A Of course, they resent agitators, "freedom riders" and such people who try to bring about turmoil and strife.

PROGRESS . . . OR TURMOIL—

Q Is this Negro protest movement pointing toward progress for the Negro—or toward more trouble?

A The agitators bring on trouble. All they leave is a lot of turmoil and strife and heartaches.

Q What is your assessment of the attitude of Negro people in Mississippi toward the kind of agitation that you are talking about?

A I'd say that at least 95 per cent of the Negroes in Mississippi are unalterably opposed to "do-gooders" and agitators coming in there with their marches and their sit-in strikes and such silly and undignified acts.

Q Do the Negroes speak up against them?

A They ignore them. They tell the white people they're opposed to the agitation, because the white people are good to the Negroes in the South—in Mississippi, especially. They are good to them.

Q Is there fear among the Negroes?

A Not in the slightest. That's what the agitators try—to put fear in them. They try to poison their minds. But they have no fear.

Q Do Negroes in the South tend to have their own economy, separate from the white economy?

A They have their own doctors, their own businesses, their own schools, their own churches.

Q What would happen if a white student were to attempt to enter a Negro college in Mississippi?

A The Negroes would resent it. I'll give you an example: About three years ago a white man tried to build a residence and grocery store in a Negro section of Jackson. The Negroes filed a petition immediately with the city council of Jackson to prohibit it—and the Negroes won. He didn't get to build in the Negro section. They just did not want him living in their section.

Negroes in Jackson, Miss., want to live to themselves.

Q Do you mean to say that Negroes as well as whites want segregation in Mississippi?

A Yes, they do. Negroes would rather associate with Negroes. Negroes don't want Negroes to marry whites, and whites feel the same way.

Q Why, then, does racial intermarriage occur?

A It doesn't occur in our State. It's against the law.

IN BUSINESS: HARMONY—

Q How strong is the influence of economic factors in persuading Southerners to accept some integration? In Birmingham and a few other cities of the South, businessmen have stepped in to urge accommodations with Negro demands. Do you feel that the South may be hurt economically unless it yields on integration?

A I know that Mississippi has made greater economic progress in the last two or three years than ever before in the history of our State.

There have been 443 new and expanded industries come into Mississippi during our administration. They are creating over 33,000 new jobs in our State—new industrial jobs. Percentagewise, Mississippi's per capita gain in income was among the highest in the nation in 1962. During 1962, Mississippi's new and expanded plants produced capital investments of over 105 million dollars. Our bank deposits at the end of 1962 were 200 million dollars higher than in 1961.

Our State is growing. It's developing. The population, once declining, now is gaining. We've gained at least 70,000 population in the last two years. Our State revenue is growing, even though we have cut our income taxes.

Q What is causing this development?

A Industrial people admire the program that Mississippi has—our economic-development program. Our legislature in 1960 enacted one of the boldest and most far-reaching economic-development programs that any legislature ever enacted. We passed 41 economic-development laws, such as: putting a "right to work" law in our State constitution; giving new industry a 10-year tax exemption; creating an industrial and technological-research commission; adjusting our workmen's compensation laws; reducing income tax.

Industrial people also admire the attitudes of the people in our State. They are friendly. Labor is friendly toward capital. Negroes and whites are all friendly toward management and capital. Industrial people like the friendly spirit of harmony that exists between both races.

Q Do you have labor unions in Mississippi?

A Some, yes. We've put a "right to work" law in our State Constitution. Under this law, workers are not required to join a union in order to hold a job. They have the right of choice.

Q Do labor unions press for racial integration in the South?

A I haven't heard of any unions in Mississippi advocating integration.

(continued on next page)

. . . "If a Negro is unemployed, that's called discrimination"

Q Do unions there practice segregation?

A Oh, yes.

Q Do you think that the economic improvement in Mississippi will help solve the racial problem?

A I think it will contribute a good deal toward easing it. More Mississippians are making more money today than ever before—including the Negroes.

In summing it all up, the Negroes are well cared for in the South.

Q That phrase "well cared for"—does that imply a sort of paternalism on the part of the whites, and that Negroes are not able to make their way on their own?

A Well, we can't help that, if they are unable to do it. But we help them to make their way. They have great opportunities in Mississippi. But you know how little progress the Negroes have made in Africa.

We have a few people in both races who are having a hard time making ends meet. Some lack education or in some cases they lack the ability, or in some cases they lack the will and the energy. You have this situation all over the U. S. If a white person is unemployed in Mississippi, it's just a statistic. But if a Negro is unemployed, that's called discrimination.

AS NEGROES MOVE NORTH—

Q There has been a rather large movement of Negroes out of the South. Do you think that will develop into a mass movement?

A You just can't anticipate what may happen. It may and it may not. What is happening now is that, although many Negroes have gone out of Mississippi, some of them have come back. One Negro who had been to Chicago told me: "Folks told me Chicago was the end of the rainbow. But I went up there and found the whites didn't like me and neither did the Northern Negroes. So I came back down here because here I have friends in both races and I can work and make a living."

Q Governor, it has been suggested that, unless the South begins dealing with relatively moderate Negro leaders, it may find itself having to deal with extremists, such as the white-hating Black Muslims. Do you think the Negroes are likely to follow such extremists?

A Not our Negroes in Mississippi. I can't speak for those up North and in the East.

Q As Negroes gain in purchasing power, do you think they will make increasing and effective use of the boycott to gain their demands for integration?

A They've already tried to stage a few boycotts in Jackson. But every boycott has just fizzled into nothing.

Q How about the vote? As more Negroes vote, can they elect officials favorable to integration?

A A man who would advocate integration wouldn't get 2 per cent of the votes in Mississippi. He'd be laughed at.

Q Might Mississippi vote for a Republican for President?

A If both candidates—Democratic and Republican—were "conservative," they'd take the Democrat. If the Democrat was a "liberal" and the Republican was a real "conservative," then they might take the Republican.

Q How about a third slate of independent, unpledged electors for President in Mississippi?

A Mississippi will be strong for that in 1964, and I think several other States will be, too. We are asking other Southern States to join us in this movement and we are getting quite a bit of favorable response. You know, Mississippi gave its presidential votes to Senator Harry Byrd of Virginia in 1960.

Q In 1948, there was a third presidential slate in the South—

A Yes. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina was the presidential candidate, with Governor Fielding Wright of Mississippi for Vice President. And you'll recall that we came very close to being able to throw the election into the House of Representatives. If a couple or three States had gone as expected, the decision would have gone to the House. And last election, in 1960, it would have taken only a slight change to have thrown the election into the House of Representatives.

Q If that should happen, Governor, what would the South ask of a presidential candidate before giving him its vote?

A We would ask him to let us alone—let the State alone and let us run our own affairs as the Constitution provides.

Q Do the people in the South feel that they are violating the Constitution when they refuse to integrate?

A No. They think that the Tenth Amendment to the U. S. Constitution means exactly what it says, and it plainly says that the powers not granted by the Constitution to the Federal Government or prohibited by the Constitution to the States belong to the States respectively or to the people. The people in the South know that the Supreme Court of the United States cannot amend the Constitution by decree or otherwise.

Q Do you believe that the South can effectively maintain its attitude on segregation?

A I think we can. I think a lot of people in the East and North are soon going to want the same thing that they are trying to take away from the South today. The cities in the East and North are getting darker by the month.

Our trouble in the South, gentlemen, is in getting the facts to the people. A lot of people in the North don't know what the facts are.

Now, we don't try to dabble in the affairs of other States. I wouldn't dare to go to Ohio or New York and tell the people there what they ought to do. I don't know their problems. And they don't know ours. You've got to live with those problems a long time before you can know them. You've got to live close to the Negro and work with him for many years before you'll know him. Those people up North just don't know what they're doing.

In Mississippi, we would not attempt to solve whatever problems may exist because of Asiatics on the West Coast, Mexicans in the Southwest, Indians in the Midwest, Puerto Ricans on the East Coast or Harlem in New York. We leave it to those people living nearest those problems to solve them in the best moral and ethical manner available. We ask the same consideration in Mississippi.

MORE PROBLEMS AHEAD—

Q Do you feel that the Supreme Court's ruling of 1954 against school segregation has helped solve the race problem?

A It hasn't solved anything. It has caused more trouble, more turmoil, more misunderstanding, more hatred than any 100 decisions ever made by the Court before. And I'll tell you something else that's going to happen:

Now the Federal Government has invaded the neighborhood situation, trying to force housing integration. And the next thing, they are going to move against those service clubs up North that don't have Negro members.

The more people who become affected by this integration, the more there are who become sympathetic with the South. Like I said, the pendulum is going to swing back, because the South is gaining more allies all the time.

6/4/63

[Roll No. 65]

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Ashbrook | Hagen, Calif. | Pilcher |
| Aspinall | Hanna | Powell |
| Auchincloss | Hansen | Rains |
| Baker | Harsha | Roberts, Ala. |
| Baring | Healey | Rogers, Tex. |
| Barrett | Hébert | St. George |
| Barry | Holland | St Germain |
| Bates | Horan | Scott |
| Battin | Jones, Ala. | Senner |
| Blatnik | Jones, Mo. | Shelley |
| Boland | Karsten | Shipley |
| Bolling | Kee | Sikes |
| Brown, Calif. | Kilburn | Sisk |
| Buckley | Kirwan | Slack |
| Burton | Kluczynski | Smith, Va. |
| Cannon | Kunkel | Staebler |
| Casey | Kyl | Steed |
| Celler | Latta | Talcott |
| Clark | Lloyd | Teague, Tex. |
| Clausen | Long, Md. | Thomas |
| Davis, Tenn. | McDowell | Thompson, La. |
| Dawson | McLoskey | Thompson, N.J. |
| Dent | McMillan | Thomson, Wis. |
| Denton | Martin, Mass. | Tollefson |
| Diggs | Martin, Nebr. | Trimble |
| Ellsworth | Miller, N.Y. | Ullman |
| Fallon | Morrison | Utt |
| Fisher | Morton, Md. | Vanik |
| Forrester | Nix | Vinson |
| Garmatz | O'Brien, Ill. | Westland |
| Gavin | O'Brien, N.Y. | Whitten |
| Gibbons | O'Konski | Willis |
| Henn | O'Neill | |
| Hubser | Pepper | |

The SPEAKER. On this rollcall 332 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Without objection, further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call may be dispensed with.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 310, noes 0.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield for that purpose?

GROUP RELATIONS AND RACE RELATIONS

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully decline to yield to the gentleman from California for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker, I regret we have not been afforded the opportunity of here presenting our points of view without repeated interruptions. I regret the inconvenience that these frequent quorum calls and other delaying tactics have worked upon all of my colleagues. If forbearance were shown by the opposition, I am advised that those of us who wish to present our views would complete our remarks in not to exceed 30 minutes. However, Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure each and every Member that those of us who feel strongly about this matter will continue our passive resistance to the harassing tactics of the opposition until we are given a reasonable opportunity to present our views on this vitally important subject.

Mr. Speaker, recent articles in the press have taken the view that the 14th amendment is an improper constitutional base upon which to predicate civil rights legislation. Such comments appeared in the Washington Star of last Saturday and in the New York Times of today. Specifically, the New York Times in its article stated:

> The Justice Department discarded the 14th amendment approach for several reasons. If it was challenged the Supreme Court could uphold it only by overturning an earlier decision that voided an 1875 law making it an offense to deny full and equal enjoyment of accommodations of inns, public conveyances, theaters, and other places of public amusement.

The Justice Department presumably relies on five cases decided together by the U.S. Supreme Court on October 15, 1883. The first among this group of cases is United States against Stanley, reported in 109 United States Reports at page 3.

May I respectfully call your attention to the fact that this year these decisions will be 80 years old, and further that the court was divided in its opinion; a most learned dissenting opinion was written by Mr. Justice John M. Harlan. Quite aside from those relevant factors, however, it is true that in this case a majority of the court held sections 1 and 2 of the Civil Rights Act of 1875 to be unconstitutional. A portion of that act had previously been declared by the court to be constitutional. The pertinent provisions under consideration in the case of United States against Stanley and others were sections 1 and 2 of the Civil Rights Act of 1875, and they read in part as follows——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. (After counting.) Two hundred nineteen Members are present, a quorum.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACGREGOR].

Mr. MACGREGOR. Quoting from the Civil Rights Act of 1875:

> SECTION 1. That all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall be entitled to the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and other places of public amusement.
>
> SEC. 2. Any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any citizen the full enjoyment of any of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, or privileges in said section enumerated shall for every such offense forfeit and pay the sum of $500 to the person aggrieved thereby to be recovered in an action in debt with full costs; and shall also for every such offense be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000 or shall be imprisoned not less than 30 days nor more than one year.

It will readily be seen, Mr. Speaker, that there are substantial differences between the Civil Rights Act of 1875 in the sections which have just been read, and the proposal which we introduced yesterday. In the Supreme Court decision of 1883, and I read now from headnote 2 of the Court's opinion, the Court stated as follows:

> The 14th amendment is prohibitory upon the States only and the legislation to be adopted by Congress for enforcing it is not direct legislation on the matters respecting which the States are prohibited from making or enforcing certain laws or doing certain acts, but is corrective legislation such as may be necessary or proper for counteracting and redressing the effect of such laws or acts.

It is clear that the Supreme Court in its 1883 decision, presumably relied upon by the Justice Department, made an obvious distinction between direct legislation and corrective legislation. This is developed more fully by the Court on pages 13 and 14 of its opinion, where the Court holds:

> The legislation which Congress is authorized to adopt in this behalf is not general legislation on the rights of the citizen but corrective legislation; that is, such as may be necessary and proper for counteracting such laws as the States may adopt or enforce, and which by the amendment they are prohibited from making, or enforcing, or such acts or proceedings as the States may commit and take and which by the amendment they are prohibited from committing or taking.
>
> It is not necessary for us to state, if we could, what legislation would be proper for Congress to adopt. It is sufficient for us to examine whether the law in question is of that character.
>
> An inspection of the law shows that it makes no reference whatever to any supposed or apprehended violation of the 14th amendment on the part of the States.

Mr. Speaker, contrary to the 1875 legislation, the bill which we introduced yesterday is specifically tied to the language of the 14th amendment.

Now, continuing from the Court's opinion:

> It is not predicated on any such view—

Referring to the 1875 act:

> It proceeds ex directo to declare that certain acts committed by individuals shall be deemed offenses, and shall be prosecuted and punished by proceedings in the courts of the United States. It does not profess to be corrective of any constitutional wrong committed by the States; it does not make its operation to depend upon any such wrong committed.
>
> This is the thrust of the opinion; namely, that the legislation in the sections referred to is unconstitutional because it is not corrective legislation tied to the 14th amendment——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

Mr. MACGREGOR (continuing):

> and because its operative effect does not depend on any wrong committed by a State or State authority.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi makes a point of order. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 98, noes 105.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 53, nays 277, not voting 103, as follows:

[Roll No. 66]

YEAS—53

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Abbitt | Fuqua | Mills |
| Abernethy | Gary | Passman |
| Andrews | Gathings | Poage |
| Ashmore | Grant | Pool |
| Beckworth | Gross | Rivers, S.C. |
| Bennett, Mich. | Hagan, Ga. | Roberts, Tex. |
| Bonner | Haley | Secrest |
| Broyhill, Va. | Hardy | Selden |
| Burleson | Harris | Stephens |
| Chelf | Hemphill | Taylor |
| Colmer | Henderson | Tuck |
| Davis, Ga. | Herlong | Tuten |
| Dorn | Hoffman | Waggonner |
| Dowdy | Huddleston | Watson |
| Downing | Jensen | Watts |
| Elliott | Landrum | Williams |
| Everett | Long, La. | Winstead |
| Flynt | Michel | |

NAYS—277

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Abele | Feighan | McFall |
| Adair | Findley | McIntire |
| Addabbo | Finnegan | Macdonald |
| Albert | Fino | MacGregor |
| Alger | Flood | Madden |
| Anderson | Fogarty | Mahon |
| Arends | Ford | Mailliard |
| Ashley | Foreman | Marsh |
| Avery | Fountain | Martin, Calif. |
| Ayres | Fraser | Mathias |
| Baldwin | Frelinghuysen | Matsunaga |
| Barry | Friedel | Matthews |
| Bass | Fulton, Pa. | May |
| Becker | Fulton, Tenn. | Meader |
| Beermann | Gallagher | Miller, Calif. |
| Belcher | Giaimo | Milliken |
| Bell | Gilbert | Minish |
| Bennett, Fla. | Gill | Minshall |
| Berry | Gonzalez | Monagan |
| Betts | Goodell | Montoya |
| Boland | Goodling | Moore |
| Bolling | Grabowski | Moorhead |
| Bolton, Frances P. | Gray | Morgan |
| | Green, Oreg. | Morris |
| Bolton, Oliver P. | Green, Pa. | Morse |
| | Griffin | Mosher |
| Bow | Grover | Moss |
| Brademas | Gubser | Murphy, Ill. |
| Bray | Gurney | Murphy, N.Y. |
| Brock | Hagen, Calif. | Murray |
| Bromwell | Hall | Natcher |
| Brooks | Halleck | Nedzi |
| Broomfield | Halpern | Nelsen |
| Brotzman | Harding | Norblad |
| Brown, Ohio | Harrison | Nygaard |
| Broyhill, N.C. | Harvey, Ind. | O'Hara, Ill. |
| Bruce | Harvey, Mich. | O'Hara, Mich. |
| Burke | Hawkins | Olsen, Mont. |
| Burkhalter | Hays | Olson, Minn. |
| Byrne, Pa. | Hechler | O'Neill |
| Byrnes, Wis. | Hoeven | Osmers |
| Cahill | Holifield | Ostertag |
| Cameron | Horton | Patman |
| Carey | Hosmer | Patten |
| Cederberg | Hull | Pelly |
| Chamberlain | Hutchinson | Perkins |
| Chenoweth | Ichord | Philbin |
| Clancy | Jarman | Pike |
| Clark | Jennings | Pillion |
| Cleveland | Joelson | Pirnie |
| Cohelan | Johansen | Poff |
| Collier | Johnson, Calif. | Price |
| Conte | Johnson, Wis. | Pucinski |
| Corbett | Jonas | Purcell |
| Corman | Karsten | Quie |
| Cramer | Karth | Quillen |
| Cunningham | Kastenmeier | Randall |
| Curtin | Keith | Reid, Ill. |
| Curtis | Kelly | Reid, N.Y. |
| Daddario | Keogh | Reifel |
| Dague | Kilgore | Reuss |
| Daniels | King, N.Y. | Rhodes, Ariz. |
| Derounian | Knox | Rhodes, Pa. |
| Derwinski | Kornegay | Rich |
| Devine | Laird | Riehlman |
| Dingell | Langen | Robison |
| Dole | Lankford | Rodino |
| Donohue | Lesinski | Rogers, Colo. |
| Dulski | Libonati | Rogers, Fla. |
| Duncan | Lindsay | Rooney |
| Dwyer | Lipscomb | Rosenthal |
| Edmondson | Lloyd | Rostenkowski |
| Edwards | McClory | Roudebush |
| Farbstein | McCulloch | Roush |
| Fascell | McDade | Roybal |
| Rumsfeld | Snyder | Weaver |
| Ryan, Mich. | Springer | Weltner |
| Ryan, N.Y. | Stafford | Whalley |
| St. Onge | Staggers | Wharton |
| Saylor | Stinson | White |
| Schadeberg | Strattoh | Whitener |
| Schenck | Stubblefield | Wickersham |
| Schneebeli | Sullivan | Widnall |
| Schweiker | Taft | Wilson, Bob |
| Schwengel | Teague, Calif. | Wilson, Charles H. |
| Short | Thompson, Tex. | |
| Shriver | Thornberry | Wilson, Ind. |
| Sibal | Toll | Wright |
| Sickles | Tupper | Wydler |
| Siler | Udall | Wyman |
| Skubitz | Van Deerlin | Young |
| Smith, Calif. | Van Pelt | Younger |
| Smith, Iowa | Wallhauser | Zablocki |

NOT VOTING—103

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Ashbrook | Hansen | Rains |
| Aspinall | Harsha | Rivers, Alaska |
| Auchincloss | Healey | Roberts, Ala. |
| Baker | Hébert | Rogers, Tex. |
| Baring | Holland | Roosevelt |
| Barrett | Horan | St. George |
| Bates | Jones, Ala. | St Germain |
| Battin | Jones, Mo. | Scott |
| Blatnik | Kee | Senner |
| Boggs | Kilburn | Shelley |
| Brown, Calif. | King, Calif. | Sheppard |
| Buckley | Kirwan | Shipley |
| Burton | Kluczynski | Sikes |
| Cannon | Kunkel | Sisk |
| Casey | Kyl | Slack |
| Celler | Latta | Smith, Va. |
| Clausen | Leggett | Staebler |
| Cooley | Lennon | Steed |
| Davis, Tenn. | Long, Md. | Talcott |
| Dawson | McDowell | Teague, Tex. |
| Delaney | McLoskey | Thomas |
| Dent | McMillan | Thompson, La. |
| Denton | Martin, Mass. | Thompson, N.J. |
| Diggs | Martin, Nebr. | Thomson, Wis. |
| Ellsworth | Miller, N.Y. | Tollefson |
| Evins | Morrison | Trimble |
| Fallon | Morton | Ullman |
| Fisher | Multer | Utt |
| Forrester | Nix | Vanik |
| Garmatz | O'Brien, Ill. | Vinson |
| Gavin | O'Brien, N.Y. | Westland |
| Gibbons | O'Konski | Whitten |
| Glenn | Pepper | Willis |
| Griffiths | Pilcher | |
| Hanna | Powell | |

So the motion was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Mr. Sheppard with Mr. Burton.

Mr. Hébert with Mr. Martin of Massachusetts.

Mr. Dent with Mr. Thomson of Wisconsin.

Mr. Holland with Mr. Auchincloss.

Mr. Barrett with Mr. Bates.

Mr. Boggs with Mr. Glenn.

Mr. King of California with Mrs. St. George.

Mr. Trimble with Mr. Miller of New York.

Mr. Kirwan with Mr. Kilburn.

Mr. Ullman with Mr. Harsha.

Mr. Morrison with Mr. Tollefson.

Mr. Aspinall with Mr. Gavin.

Mr. Rains with Mr. Martin of Nebraska.

Mr. Garmatz with Mr. Kyl.

Mr. Fallon with Mr. Ashbrook.

Mr. Celler with Mr. Morton.

Mr. Multer with Mr. Westland.

Mr. Healey with Mr. Utt.

Mr. Buckley with Mr. Talcott.

Mr. O'Brien of New York with Mr. O'Konski.

Mr. Powell with Mr. McLoskey.

Mr. Smith of Virginia with Mr. Latta.

Mr. Kluczynski with Mr. Kunkel.

Mr. Thompson of Louisiana with Mr. Horan.

Mr. Rogers of Texas with Mr. Clausen.

Mr. St Germain with Mr. Ellsworth.

Mr. Shipley with Mr. Battin.

Mr. Thompson of New Jersey with Mr. Baker.

Mr. Sikes with Mr. Shelley.

Mr. Steed with Mr. Brown of California.

Mr. Blatnik with Mr. Nix.

Mr. O'Brien of Illinois with Mr. Roberts of Alabama.

Mr. Sisk with Mr. Slack.

Mrs. Griffiths with Mr. Teague of Texas.

Mr. Hanna with Mr. Leggett.

Mr. McDowell with Mr. Lennon.

Mr. Evins with Mr. Cooley.

Mr. Delaney with Mr. Baring.

Mr. Diggs with Mr. Denton.

Mrs. Kee with Mr. Jones of Alabama.

Mr. Vanik with Mr. Willis.

Mr. Forrester with Mrs. Hansen.

Mr. Whitten with Mr. Staebler.

Mr. Carey with Mr. Davis of Tennessee.

Mr. Dawson with Mr. Roosevelt.

Mr. Scott with Mr. McMillan.

Mr. Vinson with Mr. Casey.

Mr. Fisher with Mr. Gibbons.

Mr. Pepper with Mr. Thomas.

Mr. Pilcher with Mr. Senner.

Mr. OSTERTAG and Mr. PELLY changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. ALBERT. I withdraw my motion for a call of the House, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The motion is withdrawn.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MacGregor].

GROUP RELATIONS AND RACE RELATIONS

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, let me state once again that those of us who would like the opportunity to express our views on what we regard to be a basic issue facing this Congress would conclude our remarks in the course of not to exceed 20 minutes if given the opportunity to do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MacGREGOR. For what purpose?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not going to make any motion. Will the gentleman yield for a statement?

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I simply wanted to state to the gentleman that now that the House has voted not to adjourn I intend to make sure that a quorum stays on the floor.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MacGREGOR. I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. HALLECK. I wonder, if in the interest of the affairs of the House of Representatives, the gentleman from Minnesota, knowing that there are a number of special orders in order for this evening, would give us some idea about what we might expect; if he has consulted with the other Members of the House who have special orders, what we might expect in the way of a termination of the discussions that have been taking place.

Mr. MacGREGOR. I will state to the distinguished minority leader that it is my understanding that there are two Members holding special orders scheduled to follow the special order of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY]. His special order directly follows mine. Thus may I say to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana that I cannot speak for those to follow the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY].

With respect to those of us who wish to be heard on our civil rights bill—and our remarks are going to be as brief as reasonably possible—we will conclude in not to exceed 20 minutes, but may I say further that I regard a basic individual right to be that of the opportunity to be heard, even though briefly, on a critical issue, and I think we ought to have that opportunity.

I regret the inconvenience which the dilatory tactics employed by those who apparently oppose our right to explain our views have visited upon the Members of the House, but I assure the distinguished minority leader and all Members that if given an opportunity to do so each and every sponsor of this bill and each and every Member of the minority side wishing to be heard will cut his remarks to the bone to the end that we may conclude in not more than 20 minutes.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I am delighted to yield to the minority leader.

Mr. HALLECK. The gentleman understands I did not intend by this interrogation to shut off his debate, or statement, or that of any other Member, but I thought only that I might contribute something to an understanding about where we are going and what we are going to do this evening. If the gentleman, as he has now stated, feels that he and his associates who have their special orders can conclude in 20 minutes, I express the hope that there would be no more quorum calls; that we might permit the Members to speak who want to speak, and that we could then adjourn.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I thank the distinguished minority leader. Most assuredly I did not mean by my remarks to indicate that I felt the minority leader was in any way seeking to inhibit our right to be heard on this matter. On the contrary, I appreciate the constructive efforts by the minority leader to reach some reasonable agreement. Let me emphasize that we will conclude in not to exceed 20 minutes if we have the opportunity to proceed in uninterrupted fashion.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, it should be said the gentleman should be congratulated on his forbearance. The gentleman and I asked for 2 hours of special orders and we got 2 hours of special orders because we needed that time. One reason why was because a great many Members had put in a great many hours of work on drafting and writing some very important measures. In January, and since January, these Members have worked on and have introduced these important measures. They have asked us for time to speak on the subject. Each of these gentlemen has agreed to cut to the bare bones his presentation that he has prepared. I should add that we have not sought these delays. We very much want to get on with what we have to say. My special order for 1 hour follows the gentleman from Minnesota. As I said, a number of Members have worked hard on this subject and have asked me to yield to them and I had hoped to do so. I have a number of statements that Members have asked me to put in the RECORD for them. They have agreed to this procedure, but I do think that the right of the Members to be heard on the floor has to be respected.

Thirty-five of us on the Republican minority side have today introduced a second civil rights bill designed to safeguard Bill of Rights protections for individuals. The bill, first, enables individuals and the Federal Government to initiate civil cases to enforce 14th amendment guarantees in the use of public facilities; second, enables the Attorney General to invoke Bill of Rights protections for individuals by initiating civil injunctive actions on their behalf.

We intend to cooperate with the Democratic majority in getting a meaningful bill out of the Judiciary Committee and we expect the majority to do the same in respect of our proposals. Although the House Judiciary Committee has been in hearings for a month, the administration has not yet made a presentation. Therefore we do not know where it stands other than by rumors in the press. Apparently it has taken rioting in the streets to stir the administration into action.

In any event, we call upon the President to exert moral leadership in regard to race relations and Negro rights.

We ask that he publicly commit himself to the country on behalf of the legitimate goals of the Negroes in our country because it is right to do so. He should do this by a forthright presentation to Congress and to the country by a nationwide television and radio presentation.

He should stand for the Bill of Rights, recalling that the 1st amendment protects free speech, freedom to assemble peacefully, and freedom to petition against grievances, and that the 14th amendment guarantees to every citizen the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from California.

Mr. HOSMER. I would hope that the gentleman who is now in the well and those who are scheduled to follow him will not feel constrained to limit their remarks unduly. This body thus far this year has been proceeding at what has been described as a slowdown from a snail's pace, and perhaps it might now be the time, in June, having convened in January, to get about the business of the United States of America, for which I congratulate the gentleman in the well and those to follow him for taking up this evening and asserting some initiative that heretofore seems to have been sadly lacking with respect to this body.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I am delighted to yield briefly to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make this comment at the risk of being misunderstood. In view of the series of quorum calls and the parliamentary procedure which followed I am afraid we may miss the point, that is whether deliberately or not, the gentleman from Mississippi has contributed greatly to the occasion because otherwise the gentleman would not have the interest of the House that he has had in the last 3 hours.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I thank the gentleman from Illinois for that fair, frank, and candid appraisal of the situation.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question briefly?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, for the reason which I have stated fully, I must respectfully decline to yield.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to note that not all of the Civil Rights Act of 1875 was declared by the U.S. Supreme Court to be unconstitutional. Rather, section 4 of that act was specifically declared to be valid. Section 4 reads in part as follows:

> That no citizen, possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law, shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

In commenting on this particular portion of section 4, and in finding it to be constitutional and in reaffirming that constitutionality, the Supreme Court in 1883 stated as follows:

> Whether the statute book of the State actually laid down any such rule of disqualification, or not, the State, through its officer, enforced such a rule: and it is against such State action, through its officers and agents, that the last clause of the section is directed. This aspect of the law was deemed sufficient to divest it of any unconstitutional character, and makes it differ widely from the first and second sections of the same act which we are now considering.

So, too, Mr. Speaker, the language of the legislation which we introduced on June 3d, 1963, ties its operative provisions to the authorizing acts of a State or a political subdivision thereof, thus it divests itself of any unconstitutional character.

Mr. Speaker, arguments may properly lie as to the necessity and propriety of the legislation we have introduced. I personally believe that the need is urgent and that the legislation is well reasoned and entirely proper and constitutional. In truth, there can be no serious question but what legislation in the civil rights field, predicated on the 14th amendment, is entirely constitutional.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased at this point to yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY].

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, may I say to the gentleman that in view of the lateness of the hour I would prefer to have the gentleman yield to other Members and then if there is sufficient time, I shall say a few words.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REID].

Mr. REID of New York. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Minnesota.

I was very happy to join in introducing a bill yesterday to enforce constitutional rights and for other purposes. There are four points that I and my colleagues, I think, would like to make, amongst others.

One, in introducing this legislation we are doing so in a nonpartisan spirit, because civil rights are to important for narrow politics.

Second, we need legislation. The Congress should act. I believe that the experience of the New York State Commission for Human Rights and other State commissions clearly indicates that there is no substitute for law.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. One hundred and eighty-six Members are present. A quorum is not present.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 67]

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Adair | Gibbons | O'Konski |
| Ashbrook | Glenn | O'Neill |
| Ashmore | Green, Pa. | Pepper |
| Aspinall | Griffiths | Pilcher |
| Auchincloss | Hanna | Powell |
| Baker | Hansen | Rains |
| Baring | Harding | Reuss |
| Barrett | Harsha | Riehlman |
| Bass | Healey | Rivers, Alaska |
| Bates | Hébert | Roberts, Ala. |
| Battin | Henderson | Rogers, Tex. |
| Blatnik | Holland | Roybal |
| Boggs | Horan | St. George |
| Bolling | Ichord | St Germain |
| Bonner | Jensen | Scott |
| Bow | Jones, Ala. | Senner |
| Brown, Calif. | Jones, Mo. | Shelley |
| Broyhill, Va. | Kee | Sheppard |
| Buckley | Kilburn | Shipley |
| Burton | King, Calif. | Sikes |
| Cannon | Kirwan | Sisk |
| Casey | Kluczynski | Slack |
| Celler | Kornegay | Smith, Va. |
| Clark | Kunkel | Staebler |
| Clausen | Kyl | Steed |
| Cooley | Lankford | Stephens |
| Corbett | Latta | Talcott |
| Davis, Tenn. | Leggett | Teague, Calif. |
| Dawson | Lennon | Thomas |
| Delaney | Long, La. | Thompson, La. |
| Dent | Long, Md. | Thompson, N.J. |
| Denton | McDowell | Thomson, Wis. |
| Diggs | McLoskey | Tollefson |
| Dingell | McMillan | Trimble |
| Dorn | Madden | Tuck |
| Edwards | Martin, Mass. | Ullman |
| Ellsworth | Martin, Nebr. | Utt |
| Evins | Miller, N.Y. | Vanik |
| Fallon | Mills | Vinson |
| Fisher | Morrison | Westland |
| Flynt | Morse | Whitten |
| Forrester | Morton | Wickersham |
| Friedel | Nix | Willis |
| Garmatz | O'Brien, Ill. | |
| Gavin | O'Brien, N.Y. | |

The SPEAKER. On this rollcall 299 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Without objection, further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 203, noes 15.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The vote shows that a quorum is present.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACGREGOR].

GROUP RELATIONS AND RACE RELATIONS

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. CAHILL.]

Mr. CAHILL. Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues, as one of the sponsors of this legislation, I have patiently sat on this floor expecting that my friends from that side of the aisle would at least show the courtesy to the minority to be heard. It was my hope that it would not be necessary for me to make any observations at all in order to obtain the attention of my friends. Now, I would say that this is not my observation, but I thought the House might like to have the observation of a disinterested, objective observer who was sitting up in the gallery and who happens to be a visitor of mine——

The SPEAKER. Reference to anybody in the gallery is not consistent with the rules of the House.

Mr. CAHILL. I beg the Chair's pardon.

I would say then, may I quote to you the observation of a visitor who told me——

Mr. BASS. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Is the gentleman referring to a visitor in the Chamber, or in the gallery, or a visitor in Washington?

Mr. CAHILL. No; I would say——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend. The gentleman referred to a visitor and it is not the Chair's duty to penetrate his mind.

Mr. BASS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Tennessee to make a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee for the purpose of his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BASS. Since it is the prerogative of the Members to inquire into the minds of the other Members, may I request of the Member to divulge if this speaker is in the gallery or on the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker rules that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BASS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BASS. Mr. Speaker, does the Member now making the parliamentary inquiry have the right to inquire of the Member making the statement as to whom he refers?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman yields for that purpose.

Mr. CAHILL. I would be delighted to yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not have the floor. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Tennessee for the purpose that he mentioned in his observation?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the gravity of the issue here being discussed, I would say to the gentleman from Tennessee that his injection of levity is not entirely unwelcome, but in view of the fact that we on this side are endeavoring to give those who want to be heard that opportunity, and to conclude these special orders, I respectfully decline to yield further to the gentleman from Tennessee for that purpose.

Mr. BASS. The gentleman defers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota has yielded to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CAHILL. Mr. Speaker, I would merely say this: That without characterizing him as a visitor, I will merely say that he is a distinguished member of the bar of the State of Michigan, and having made certain observations, suggested to me that we rightly here in the House could use one of the inventions of the great State of Michigan, that is, after a quorum has been established in this House we should install seat belts.

Mr. BASS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAHILL. I will be happy to yield.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully decline to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully decline to yield to the gentleman from Ohio, having yielded to the gentleman from New Jersey for the purpose of expediting the discourse we are pursuing here today.

Mr. CAHILL. Mr. Speaker, let me make for just a minute or two a serious observation. I hope that my friends on this side of the aisle will permit those of us who have, in spite of the levity between the distinguished Member and myself, a serious interest in civil rights to be heard for the next 15 or 20 minutes.

I know, ladies and gentlemen of the House, that nothing I can say will influence you as far as the field of civil rights is concerned. To some it is a political issue; to some it is a matter of tradition; to some it is a matter of conviction. All of us have our own views on it and it is not my purpose, desire, or ability to influence any Member of this House.

But let me say this to you in all sincerity, in all honesty, and with all conviction. Yesterday a great man, a wise man, and a good man died. He was called John XXIII. And he will go down in history as a man who tried to unite all peoples, all religions. He had something to say on this issue; and if you do not listen to me, listen to him and hear what the Pope, now deceased, had to say on this vital, all-encompassing, all-important subject of civil rights. He said this in Easter of 1960:

> Our sorrowing gaze turns also to the other children of God everywhere, suffering because of race, of economic conditions * * * or through limitation on the exercise of their natural and civil rights.

I say to the Members of this House in closing that whether you listen to the minority or whether you listen to the majority today, tomorrow you are going to listen to your conscience and you are going to listen to the voice of America. And one of these days, whether it is the 88th Congress or Congresses that follow, we will have in the United States of America an effective civil rights bill. And if we of the minority have done nothing else I hope that by our efforts we have brought the attention of America to the need for this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Minnesota for yielding to me.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REID].

Mr. REID of New York. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. Speaker, there are just four brief points I would like to make with regard to the legislation we have introduced.

One, it is nonpartisan, because civil right is just too important for politics.

Second, that we need legislation. There is no substitute for law.

Third, we need moral leadership by all Americans, by the Congress, and by the President; indeed, a sense of moral commitment to equality of opportunity under the law for all.

And in this connection I would call the attention of the House tonight to a letter of the Reverend Martin Luther King to his fellow clergymen—a letter written in the Birmingham city jail, April 16, 1963.

In it he said:

> Injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere. We are caught in an inescapable network of mutuality tied in a single garment of destiny. Whatever affects one directly affects all indirectly.

The fourth point that I would like to make is that this bill that we have introduced, along with the bills of my colleagues previously introduced, is an initial step. I feel there is a need for an FEPC bill. I feel that there is a need for legislation dealing with apprentice training.

And so let me conclude by saying this. Let the voice of Congress on this moral and legislative issue be heard across the land. No American today can plead moral indifference. Whoever belittles one American's rights belittles all Americans' rights. We must walk as one Nation under the law with human dignity and equality for all.

I hope the Congress will pass this legislation. In so doing the Congress will help to revitalize the spirit of democracy. In so doing the Congress will help to make human liberty and equality of opportunity a reality; in short, will take action to live up to and to keep faith with the American dream.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS].

(Mr. MATHIAS asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. Speaker, I was born and I have lived and my home now is in the city of Frederick, Md. That is south of the Mason-Dixon Line. In many ways it is a southern city.

I can understand very fully the emotional reaction of many people in this House and in this country to the legislation that was proposed yesterday, the supplemental 1963 civil rights bill. I can assure you that for myself I take no partisan pleasure in having introduced such a bill nor in speaking in support of it tonight. I have introduced the bill. I rise to speak for it tonight because I believe that it proposes action——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a quorum present to hear the gentleman. I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACGREGOR] has expired.

Does the gentleman insist upon his point of order?

Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker, before I insist on it. Do we have further speakers?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY] has 60 minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is enough, Mr. Speaker. I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will withhold that for a moment, the Chair lays before the House the following personal requests.

The gentleman from Mississippi renews his point of order that a quorum is not present. The Chair will count.

Two hundred twenty-three Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 23, noes 176.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair just counted 223 Members and it is evident to the Chair that a quorum is present.

The motion to adjourn was rejected.

---

CIVIL RIGHTS OF U.S. CITIZENS

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINDSAY. I am delighted to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Well, I was going to ask for a unanimous consent request.

Mr. LINDSAY. Yes, I would be delighted to yield.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after all special orders today heretofore entered I may address the House for 5 hours on the subject of, "Where Were All These Republicans During the 8 Years of the Eisenhower Administration?"

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. ALGER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object but I must observe that we had a Democratic Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take any more time than is necessary. The Members who have asked to be heard have agreed to cut their talks down to the bare bones, and if we can just move ahead we will be finished in a moment.

Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS].

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

There are, of course, many people here who feel very strongly about their opposition to the civil rights proposal which has been made by my colleagues and myself. In good season they will have their time to speak.

It is the glory of this House that they can speak and that they will speak, the efforts to prevent our remarks this evening notwithstanding. Of course, what has happened this evening could well have been expected. Debate has been limited already in this session of the Congress on civil rights amendments to the medical education bill and the impacted areas program. As some wag has said, the frustration of those who are seeking civil rights in America is increased by the fact that the subject is talked to death in the other body and that we are not allowed to talk about it at all in this body. So tonight, in spite of the news that we receive daily which is disturbing, distressing, and deplorable, some people have remained cynical about this subject of civil rights.

They have felt that it was politics and not principle which was the motivation for our civil rights proposals. Tonight I think it is manifest that a deep and abiding principle is at stake.

Mr. Speaker, throughout the Nation men and women are risking their lives and their property on this question. I think it is evident that before this session is over every Member of this House will have an opportunity to say at least one word when the roll is called.

Mr. Speaker, the introduction of this supplemental civil rights bill by so many rank-and-file Members at this time vindicates both the logic and the necessity, both the logic and necessity of title III of President Eisenhower's 1957 Civil Rights Bill. In that year, at the urging of such distinguished Members as the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEATING], who was then a Member of this body, and who now serves with such distinction in the other body, and the present ranking minority member of the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH], this House did enact a bill which comprehended what has come to be known as title III. The other body, unfortunately, defeated that provision of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, the prophets of the press indicate that President Kennedy will also recommended some form of title III this year. Whether he will or not, he has not said. I hope that he does so, and I hope he uses his influence to pass the bill which includes title III in this body and in the other body where he is the leader of a party with so large a numerical advantage.

Mr. Speaker, in proposing this bill we think we have been moderate, we think we have been constructive and positive. I think the fact that we have been moderate is indicated by the sequence of events. Earlier this year the Republican members of the Judiciary Committee and other Republican Members of the House, led by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH], did propose a civil rights program. At that time we went no further than we felt the situation in the country demanded.

Mr. Speaker, since that time there has been a drastic change in our national picture which has presented us with urgent problems.

Accordingly, we have felt it necessary to supplement the original proposal. But even now we have restricted the provisions of this bill so that the Federal Government shall not invade any area of American life where it is not absolutely necessary.

Mr. Speaker, as I have said, we were not moved to file this bill by any intensely partisan heat, but only because it seemed so necessary. Evidently we need action because every day we hear that there have been 500 people jailed here or that 700 hundred people have been jailed there. Mr. Speaker, this is not the spirit of America, and it must not continue to be the shame of America.

There has been comment lately in the press that the President would submit a program of civil rights to the Congress, and there has been some speculation that he would not. It is uncertain whether the program would be submitted this week or next. The Attorney General of the United States has had four dates at different times upon which he was going to appear before the Judiciary Committee to talk about civil rights and to the position of the executive branch of our Government on this question. What they do or do not do is their responsibility.

I would think that tonight rather than obstruct the attempt of Members—rank-and-file Members of this House—to introduce a legislative proposal every Member of this House, regardless of how he feels about the merit of the bill, would be proud that the membership of this House is proposing legislation.

Mr. Speaker, there was a time when this House scorned a bill drafted outside its membership, and there was a time when a bill drafted by the Executive was viewed with suspicion by the Members of the House. This is a bill which has been framed and drafted by the Members of the House—by the rank-and-file Members of the House—and I say that I am proud to be a cosponsor of it.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the careful consideration of this bill by the Members of the House at this session of Congress.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINDSAY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from New York for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, by the introduction today of two bills which would enact an Equal Rights Act of 1963 and a Civil Rights Act of 1963, I join a number of my distinguished colleagues in an urgent call for prompt, effective action to solve the critical civil rights problem which confronts our Nation. We must not—we cannot afford to—delay any longer in according full rights to every citizen, regardless of race, creed, or color.

It is 100 years since the signing of the Emancipation Proclamation. Tragically, a full century has not yet provided equal opportunity for Negroes in voting, education, employment, housing, the administration of justice, and public accommodations.

I need hardly remind my colleagues of the more glaring evidences of this problem. They have been brought dramatically to our attention in recent weeks in stories datelined not only in the South but also the North. We from the northern part of this Nation must not hypocritically lull ourselves into believing this is a sectional problem confined to the South. Such is most certainly not the case. With increasing regularity, our Nation is seeing outward manifestations of the fires which have been smoldering so long in the North as well as the South. My own State within the last week has witnessed demonstrated unrest in the City of Brotherly Love.

This is not a problem which our leaders and our people can continue to view with complacency. The urgency is alarmingly apparent. No longer can we deprive a group of citizens of the rights which most of us have taken for granted. The Negro is entitled to no more rights than his fellow citizens; but most certainly he should be accorded no less.

It is high time that the leadership and the citizenry of our Nation face up to the fact that we have a long way to go in civil rights and that we cannot take long to travel the distance. The problem cries out for quick, decisive solution. The gravity of the situation is such that every citizen should be aware of the problem and searching his soul for answers.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 68]

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Adair | Green, Jr., Pa. | O'Konski |
| Ashbrook | Griffiths | O'Neill, Jr. |
| Ashley | Gubser | Osmers, Jr. |
| Ashmore | Halleck | Pepper |
| Aspinall | Hanna | Pilcher |
| Auchincloss | Hansen | Powell |
| Baker | Healey | Rains |
| Baring, Nev. | Hébert | Reuss |
| Barrett | Henderson | Riehlman |
| Bates | Holland | Rivers, Alaska |
| Battin | Horan | Rogers, Colo. |
| Blatnik | Ichord | Rogers, Tex. |
| Boggs | Jensen | Ryan, Mich. |
| Boland, Mass. | Jones, Ala. | St. George |
| Bolling, Mo. | Jones, Mo. | St Germain |
| Bonner | Kee, W. Va. | Scott |
| Bow | Kilburn | Senner, Jr. |
| Brown, Jr., Calif. | King, Calif. | Shelley |
| | Kirwan | Sheppard |
| Buckley | Kluczynski | Shipley |
| Burton | Kornegay | Sikes |
| Cannon, Mo. | Kunkel | Sisk |
| Casey | Kyl | Slack, Jr. |
| Celler | Lankford | Smith, Va. |
| Clark | Latta | Staebler |
| Clausen | Leggett | Steed |
| Corbett | Lennon | Talcott |
| Davis, Tenn. | Lesinski | Teague, Calif |
| Dawson | Long, La. | Thomas |
| Dent, Pa. | Long, Md. | Thompson, La. |
| Denton | McDowell, Jr. | |
| Diggs, Jr. | McLoskey | Thompson, Jr., N.J. |
| Dingell | McMillan | |
| Edwards | Madden | Thompson, Tex. |
| Ellsworth | Martin, Jr., Mass. | |
| Evins | | Thomson, W |
| Fallon | Martin, Nebr. | Tollefson |
| Farbstein | Miller, Calif. | Trimble |
| Fisher | Miller, N.Y. | Ullman |
| Forrester | Minshall, Ohio | Utt |
| Frelinghuysen, Jr. | Morrison | Vanik |
| | Morton, Md. | Vinson |
| Garmatz | Mosher | Westland |
| Gavin, Pa. | Multer | Whitten |
| Gibbons | Nix | Wickersham |
| Glenn | O'Brien, Ill. | Willis |
| Goodell | O'Brien, N.Y. | Wilson, Bob |

The SPEAKER. On this rollcall, 29 Members have answered to their names a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further pr ceedings under the call were dispens with.

CIVIL RIGHTS OF U.S. CITIZENS

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY].

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCHWEIKER].

Mr. SCHWEIKER. Mr. Speaker, realize it or not each citizen has an enormous stake in the solution to this human problem because each has a vested in terest in the future of our great coun try. Each should be vitally concerne about a prompt solution. I ferventl hope that not only the Congress will aroused to enact long overdue effecti civil rights measures but also that people in all parts of the country will remain apathetic to the pressing nee for action. Let us no longer twiddle ou thumbs while Rome burns.

I commend the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Minnesota and their colleagues on the Committee on the Judiciary who have long seen the need for this action. I wish to associate myself with their efforts to press for this most important legislation.

Mr. LINDSAY. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. BALDWIN].

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Speaker, it has been a privilege to join with the gentleman from New York and more than 20 other Members in introducing this bill which was introduced in the House yesterday.

In the interest of time, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say I fully join in the comments made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACGREGOR] on this bill.

It is time that this Congress express itself strongly and clearly in opposition to segregation in places of business serving the public in opposition to segregation in restaurants and theaters, in opposition to segregation in hotels and motels, and in opposition to segregation in public parks, in public transportation, and in other public facilities.

Mr. LINDSAY. I thank the gentleman from California.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE].

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-two members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 69]

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Adair | Garmatz | Mills |
| Ashbrook | Gavin | Minshall |
| Ashley | Gibbons | Monagan |
| Ashmore | Glenn | Morrison |
| Aspinall | Goodell | Morton |
| Auchincloss | Griffiths | Mosher |
| Baker | Gubser | Multer |
| Baring | Halleck | Nix |
| Barrett | Hanna | Norblad |
| Barry | Hansen | O'Brien, Ill. |
| Bates | Harvey, Ind. | O'Brien, N.Y. |
| Battin | Hawkins | O'Konski |
| Boggs | Healey | O'Neill |
| Boland | Hébert | Osmers |
| Bolling | Henderson | Pepper |
| Bonner | Holland | Pilcher |
| Bow | Horan | Powell |
| Brown, Calif. | Ichord | Rains |
| Broyhill, Va. | Jarman | Reuss |
| Buckley | Jensen | Riehlman |
| Burton | Jones, Ala. | Rivers, Alaska |
| Cahill | Jones, Mo. | Roberts, Ala. |
| Cannon | Kee | Rogers, Tex. |
| Casey | Keith | Ryan, Mich. |
| Celler | Kilburn | St. George |
| Clark | King, Calif. | St Germain |
| Clausen | Kirwan | Scott |
| Corbett | Kluczynski | Senner |
| Cunningham | Kornegay | Shelley |
| Davis, Tenn. | Kunkel | Sheppard |
| Dawson | Kyl | Shipley |
| Delaney | Lankford | Sikes |
| Dent | Latta | Sisk |
| Denton | Leggett | Slack |
| Diggs | Lennon | Smith, Va. |
| Dingell | Lesinski | Springer |
| Donohue | Long, La. | Staebler |
| Edwards | Long, Md. | Steed |
| Ellsworth | McDowell | Talcott |
| Evins | McFall | Teague, Calif. |
| Fallon | McLoskey | Thomas |
| Farbstein | McMillan | Thompson, La. |
| Feighan | Madden | Thompson, N.J. |
| Fisher | Martin, Mass. | Thompson, Tex. |
| Forrester | Martin, Nebr. | |
| Frelinghuysen | Miller, Calif. | |
| Friedel | Miller, N.Y. | |
| Thomson, Wis. | Van Deerlin | Wickersham |
| Tollefson | Vanik | Willis |
| Trimble | Vinson | Wilson, Bob |
| Ullman | Westland | Wilson, Charles H. |
| Utt | Whitten | |

The SPEAKER. On this rollcall 278 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

CIVIL RIGHTS FOR U.S. CITIZENS

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY].

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. LINDSAY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Is there any way, Mr. Speaker, for the RECORD to show that when the Speaker last counted for a quorum and counted 170 Members, that only about 40 of them were on the Republican side?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that that is not the subject of a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINDSAY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOSMER. I would like to dispute the count of the last gentleman to whom you yielded. It was inaccurate. There was a fair proportion of Members on both sides of the aisle when the Chair made his count, and the RECORD should accurately so reflect.

Mr. LINDSAY. I thank the gentleman from California.

Mr. Speaker, lest there be failure of a quorum in the future, at this moment I ask unanimous consent that all Members may revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD on this subject.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am not sure that I am going to object to this request. May I ask the gentleman how much time he intends to use with this kind of colloquy?

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the distinguished gentleman, I will say that we are going to do our very best to hold this down to 10 or 15 minutes at the outside.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is too much time, Mr. Speaker. I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. Two hundred and thirty Members are present, a quorum.

The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, someone far from the South can fully realize tonight that people because of different color of their skin have been denied the right to eat in certain restaurants and attend certain theaters and public places, for today right here in this House there has been attempted through parliamentary procedure to deny us the right to speak on this vital issue before the Nation today. Some could do well to tear a page from the book of Voltaire when he said:

> I may disagree with what you say, but I will defend to the last drop of my blood your right to say it.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield to me?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. LINDSAY. I will be delighted to yield, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts I think has seen an instance in which the majority, and certainly the majority leaders, have stayed here when we had complete control so far as votes were concerned, and have protected the rights of minority Members. I think this is an instance of that. We respect the rights of minority Members. Individual Members have their own rights and prerogatives, but the majority party has stayed here and has voted against adjournment and has protected the rights of the minority Members.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I agree with everything the majority leader has said.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I would prefer that the gentleman from Massachusetts be permitted to complete his statement and then I would be delighted to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINDSAY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I agree with everything that the majority leader has said, and I will go one step further and say that our good Speaker of the House has handled the gavel with fairness and impartiality to all parties concerned in this discussion here today.

Mr. Speaker, it is a high honor for me to join in this discussion with my distinguished Republican colleagues. In introducing the civil rights legislation yesterday, we continued to demonstrate that our party is taking the lead in the civil rights discussion that is taking place in this country. But even more important is the movement for equality itself. At this moment, the struggle for Negro equality is on the march throughout the world. This surging force cannot and will not be stopped and it is our responsibility as legislators to see that additional civil rights legislation is enacted immediately. For this reason the bill that I was happy to introduce with, among others, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY], the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CAHILL], and the gentlemen from Minnesota [Mr. MACGREGOR] and Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS] is a powerful and meaningful bill in this era of the Negro movement.

That expert news commentator, Eric Sevareid, said this recently about the movement:

By its dominant voices, its most unforgettable faces, and its chief acts of bravery does a generation recognize itself and history mark it. For America, this postwar period is surely the era of the Negro passion [and] * * * because this unfolding drama involves the automatic reflexes of the instinctive sense of justice, because it involves namable, hearable, countable, individual persons of flesh and blood, it is going to dwarf the general and social pageants of this domestic era.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the call today is clearly for the rights of all individuals. The bill that we introduced will provide the tools to aid the Negro in his valiant crusade.

The bill would eliminate segregation in public accommodations and vest in the Attorney General broad legal authority in all areas of civil rights.

As a sponsor of the Republican civil rights bill this past January, I am proud to sponsor this additional legislation. Our last Republican civil rights bill was hailed throughout the Nation and the New York Times international edition, published during the newspaper strike, called this legislation the most powerful civil rights bill in a decade.

Added to the proposals of the January bill, this legislation will insure the necessary rights of our Negro citizens.

It will give the Attorney General authority to take legal action against any owner or operator of a business supplying accommodations, amusement, food or services to the public, if such business is authorized by the State or local subdivision, where the business segregates or otherwise discriminates against customers because of race or color. The Attorney General, under the terms of this legislation, may also bring legal suit against any State or local official who seeks to require or encourage segregation or discrimination.

This proposed legislation also contains the so-called title III provision which was passed by the House during the Eisenhower administration but failed in the Senate. This provision grants the Attorney General authority to institute legal proceedings against State and local officials who are depriving or denying individuals' rights to equal protection of the law because of race, creed, color or national origin.

If this House Mr. Speaker, would enact this legislation, along with the legislation our party introduced in January, we would be making a significant contribution to the historical movement that has already begun and which will continue until all men are given their rights as citizens of this great Nation and, even more significantly, as human beings created by God who deserve to live peacefully within the brotherhood of all men.

Mr. LINDSAY. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SIBAL].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. Two hundred and twenty four Members are present. A quorum is present.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SIBAL].

Mr. SIBAL. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to add my voice in support of those who would bring dignity to all of our citizens and by so doing bring dignity, a more complete dignity, at any rate, to this great Nation, which has been a symbol of freedom to so many.

I am also proud to be a cosponsor of both civil rights bills referred to, and the author of one amendment to the medical education bill, which would have guaranteed equal protection under the law to all applicants to medical schools to insure they would not be discriminated against on the ground of race, creed, or national origin, but which the Democratic majority defeated.

Mr. Speaker, the time has come for Congress to stop hiding behind the skirts of people with less responsibility than we have in this area and to stand up and be counted as the elected representatives of all the people.

Only by rule of law can we avoid a great national catastrophe which stands in the wings, and only those of us in the Congress can provide the laws which are so long overdue. The Republican Party has a particular responsibility as it did 100 years ago due to the clear inability of any Democrat, no matter how high his office, to rally his whole party to this great cause.

The clearest evidence of this is presented by what has happened to civil rights in Congress this session and during the 87th Congress, despite the words of the Democratic candidate for President in Los Angeles on September 9, 1960, when he said:

When our next President takes office in January he must be prepared to move forward on three broad fronts: as a legislative leader, as Chief Executive, and as a moral leader.

First, as a legislative leader the President must give us the legal weapons needed to enforce the constitutional rights of every American. He cannot wait for others to act. He himself must draft the programs, transmit them to the Congress, and fight for their enactment—taking his case to the people if the Congress is slow in acting.

And much legislation is needed. We must continue and strengthen the President's Civil Rights Commission. We must grant the Attorney General power to enforce all constitutional rights—not just the right to vote. We must wipe out discriminatory poll taxes and literacy tests, and pass effective antibombing and antilynching legislation. And we must continually strengthen the legal framework which will allow us to move toward economic, educational, and political equality.

Such legislation is already being prepared. I have asked Senator CLARK, of Pennsylvania, and Congressman CELLER, of New York, to prepare a bill embodying all of the pledges of the Democratic platform. And this bill will be among the first orders of business when a new Congress meets in January.

Assuming his sincerity, I say that we in the Republican Party stand anxious to support him if he can lead his own party. But if he cannot, then we intend to fight on until his pledges and ours are redeemed.

Mr. LINDSAY. I thank the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SIBAL].

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. BELL].

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, today I have joined with other colleagues in speaking out on new and vital civil rights legislation which we have recently introduced in this Congress.

Legislation is not the cure-all. But it is the keystone upon which meaningful enjoyment of fundamental rights can be assured. It sets the norm. It provides a forum for, and sanctions for enforcement when rights are denied.

Justice Goldberg commented to the nub of the problem in a recent Suprem Court decision. He stated:

The individual's rights are "present right they are not merely hopes to some future joyment of some formalistic constitutio promise. The basic guarantees of our C stitution are warrants for the here and

The momentous Brown against Board of Education decisions were landmark. They gave hope. But pr ress has been painfully slow. In th decisions the Supreme Court decla that separate educational facilities inherently unequal. It called for equal access and enjoyment of the m fundamental of rights—opportunity fo self-improvement through our institutions of public education, with all deliberate speed.

Many of the States have responded, by mere token compliance. The idle emptiness of unenforced laws has been a source of continuing and great disappointment.

This legislation we have introduce would take some necessary steps towar guaranteeing full realization of the most basic rights.

While progress in education has be painful and slow, effective denial of v ing rights and privileges has been mo than slow.

The right to vote and to have that vote counted is the cornerstone of our democracy. Yet overwhelming evidence and stark statistics outline widespread denial and abridgement of the right to vote in several States. This wrong is by no means confined to any particular geographical area.

The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights disclosed statistics involving 158 countie with a majority Negro population located in 11 States. In 51 of these coun ties, 3 percent or less of the Negroes we registered. In 51 other countries, 10 pe cent or less were registered, and only 11 counties were there more than 30 p cent of the Negroes registered.

A catalog of discriminatory device some more subtle than others, stands ready to strip minorities of their voting rights: The poll tax, literacy tests more stringently applied to minorities than to whites, requirements of registering in a person's own handwriting, requirements for registering without error on forms provided, and requirements for passing constitutional interpretation tests applied more strenuously to minorities than to whites. And there are many more.

The judiciary has invalidated numerous discriminatory devices: The grandfather clause, the white primary, and the Jaybird Scheme have been invalidated. The Supreme Court has tempered the outer fringes of the powerfully abusive and more flagrant denials. But this modicum of judicial strength must be reinforced.

This proposed legislation would strike down discriminatory literacy tests in Federal elections and, it would do much more to guarantee the franchise.

It is my further belief that one of the major concerns of racial and religious minorities today is the lack of opportunity for employment and for advancement once placed. This again involves education because, in many cases discrimination as to the acquiring of education and training in skills has been practiced.

Today a very large proportion of our underemployed persons are Negroes. Recent Department of Commerce statistics reveal that the unemployment rate among nonwhites is more than twice that of whites. Yet, even given an adequate educational background, many of the opportunities for further training through such programs as vocational education and manpower retraining are effectively closed to minority members because of the pigment of their skin.

Testimony before the Education and Labor Committee has disclosed evidences of blatant discrimination. While there might be training opportunities in some States, in others, training courses open to minorities often involve training in kitchen skills such as dishwashing, or in the laundry trade involving pressing and cleaning of clothes. Training opportunities for the more lucrative jobs such as welding, electronics, and administration are effectively denied.

The report disclosed that, in 1960, 69.1 percent of the eligible nonwhites in one Southern State were not registered to vote, while only 27 percent of the whites were not registered.

Education, voting, justice, employment, housing—whichever way the discerning investigator probes, evidences of discrimination can be uncovered.

Today from coast to coast and border to border, the pent-up grievances of the Negro community decry the social unrest. By Justice Department count, there were 43 major and minor racial demonstrations during the week ending May 25, of which 10 were in the North.

It is tragic that violence must bring into sharp focus the patent denial of freedom to certain of our citizens.

War was fought 100 years ago to reaffirm certain of these basic rights. These freedoms have not yet been fully won, nor fully realized. The fight to guarantee these freedoms continues to be fought.

An alarmed public today, as never before, is overwhelmed by the injustices inherent in the rising tide of exploding racial relations.

The shameful denial of basic God-given and constitutionally guaranteed rights must be rectified.

Equality and equality of opportunity must become reality, not mere plaudit.

Mr. LINDSAY. I thank the gentleman from California.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. QUIE].

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend my colleagues, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACGREGOR] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY] for developing this legislation. I am happy to join with them in introducing this bill. I think this, together with the bill that was introduced earlier this year, is sound legislation and is in the direction that we ought to go. I think we ought to go even further than this, however, and toward this end I will be working and that is whenever there is Federal money spent in a program where that money or the benefits of that money are denied to people because of race, color, or creed that such Federal money shall be denied to any such area or any such group. I speak specifically of one area in the field of education where the Federal Government is assisting in the field of vocational education and in federally impacted areas where money is now going which is denied to certain individuals because of discrimination, and for this reason I will support legislation which will deny Federal funds in any Federal program where the benefits of that program are denied to people because of race, color or creed. I hope we can take that action in the Congress, and I will support an amendment on any bill that provides Federal funds for such programs, on each bill as it comes up for consideration by the House, but I would favor most of all legislation which would deny such Federal money to any program where discrimination exists.

Mr. LINDSAY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALPERN].

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, I am not a member of the Judiciary Committee, but I rise to commend the minority members of the committee who have joined in sponsoring the Equal Rights Act of 1963. I particularly want to compliment the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY] and his able colleagues on the committee including the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CAHILL] the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACGREGOR] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MATHIAS] for their remarkable work and superb leadership they are giving in this field. They have been a credit to the minority party in this House.

As one who has made civil rights legislation a prime concern since I came to the House of Representatives I am pleased to associate myself with my distinguished colleagues in support of this bill and to have joined with them in its introduction. Submission of this bill is a positive and forceful collective move for meaningful action in the field of civil rights.

Earlier this session, as in the 86th and 87th Congresses, I sponsored and called for action on a number of specific civil rights bills. One would restore part III of the Civil Rights Act of 1957 as it was drafted in the original legislation. This would give the Attorney General the authority to institute suits where one's civil rights have been violated. This is the very guts of any civil rights legislation. Others would outlaw racial discrimination in employment, provide protection from lynching and mob violence, protect the right to vote, make the Civil Rights Commission a permanent body, aid States to desegregate their schools, protect the rights guaranteed by the 14th amendment, establish a Commission on Equal Job Opportunity, and prohibit segregation in places of public accommodation.

Many of these objectives, I am pleased to note are covered in the Equal Rights Act of 1963 which was introduced yesterday and which is being discussed here today.

Mr. Speaker, I need not tell this House the importance of the issue of equal rights to our Nation and to the peoples of the world. Everyday developments highlight the stark reality of the situation and the compelling need for legislative action.

All of us know this problem is not peculiar to any one section of the country. The recent unfortunate events in Mississippi and Alabama may provide more drama for newspaper stories, but they are no more reprehensible than many practices common in the Northern States. It would be hypocrisy of the highest magnitude to suggest that discrimination on grounds of race, creed, color, or national origin, is somehow less evil because it is accomplished with greater subtlety.

Mr. Speaker, President Lincoln, allowed 100 days' notice between the issuance of his first and second proclamations. We have been on notice for 100 years to face up to our responsibilities in the field of civil rights. This goes beyond all the requirements of reasonable notice. It is high time we put our own moral house in order. What was unreasonable to expect in the 1860's, cannot reasonably be denied a century later.

I have constantly heard claims that the press of other congressional business, admittedly vital to the Nation's welfare, is more than enough to occupy the attention of Congress. The conspicuous absence thus far of administration civil rights legislation seems to imply this. I do not question the sincerity behind such contentions any more than I have to be reminded of the vast amount of unfinished business before this House. But what business has been before this House longer than the business of civil rights. And, Mr. Speaker, when—at what point in time—did matters of human dignity and individual rights cease to be the primary concern of this House.

In the 87th Congress, those of us who introduced civil rights legislation looked hopefully to the White House for support. We were amazed and shocked when it was announced that "the President," and I quote, "does not consider it necessary at this time to enact new civil rights legislation." This response was a far cry from the statements made by candidate Kennedy during his campaign. If, as he said then, "The Presidency is a place of moral leadership," why has the President avoided the fertile field of civil rights legislation for the exercises of that leadership? The implication was that other legislation took precedence over questions involving fundamental constitutional rights. Civil rights supporters bided their time, in the hope that after Congress had fulfilled its function with respect to the trade bill and other vital concerns, the President would then turn his attention to this urgent matter in the 88th Congress.

This Congress has been in session 5 months. Member after Member of this House and in the other body have cried out for action on civil rights. Scores of bills have been introduced on the subject. But where has the administration been? The President has had ample opportunity before this to speak to us—to give us forceful, enlightening leadership that is so vital in this field. As one commentator recently observed, "the administration has broken no lances in Congress."

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, regardless of the reasons there can be no question of the administration's weakness in the field of civil rights. There has been no drive, no leadership. As a result, the image of America held by people abroad has suffered. We want the world to think of our country as a nation of freedom and justice, where human dignity is paramount. We fall short of presenting such a picture when the rights of so many Americans are still violated.

Mr. Speaker, recent developments make it apparent that there cannot be any compromise with the morality and justice of this issue. It has taken a long time for the administration to realize this and now it is announced that the President will shortly present a strong program to Congress. I hope he will. And I trust it will be a bold one. I hope it will cover such basic principles as embodied in this equal rights bill under discussion today.

I fervently urge that priority will be given to this issue. We will fail in our obligations to uphold the Constitution, to act in the national interest if we do not move quickly and decisively. The time to enact legislation to secure every American in his constitutional rights is now. Too much time has already elapsed. For 100 years we have given the Negroes of the Nation only a soiled kind of citizenship. It is high time that Congress acted to clean it up.

Mr. Speaker, it is one thing for us to criticize and another thing to come up with a positive program. That is why I was delighted with the earlier constructive action on the part of the minority members of the Judiciary Committee and to join with them in introducing legislation to make the Civil Rights Commission permanent and to give it broader power, to establish a commission to assure equal employment rights by employers or unions engaged in Federal contracts, and public employment agencies; to curtail the use of literacy tests, to provide assistance to schools seeking to desegregate, to authorize the Census Bureau to secure complete voter registration figures and to give the Attorney General the legal right to enforce school desegregation.

And that is why I am so pleased with the new action by this distinguished group of minority members of the Judiciary Committee in drafting this new legislation and to be associated with it. The bill introduced yesterday is a broad, workable and meaningful one. It meets the basic needs for effective action. I commend it to the committee and to the House.

It includes the section on title III which, as I said earlier, puts the guts into the Civil Rights Act that is sorely needed. This House passed this provision during the previous administration but it failed to get through the other body. Title III grants to the Attorney General authority to institute legal proceedings against State or local officials who are depriving or denying individuals' rights to equal protection of the law because of race, creed, color or national origin.

Other provisions of the Equal Rights Act of 1963 would give the Attorney General, as well as individuals, authority to take legal action against any owner or operator of a business supplying accommodations, amusement, food or services to the public, if such business is authorized to operate by a State or local subdivision, where the business segregates or otherwise discriminates against customers because of race or color. A legal suit may also be brought against any State or local official who seeks to require or encourage segregation or discrimination.

Mr. Speaker, the challenge of the 1860's was given eloquent expression by President Lincoln when he said: "This Government cannot endure half slave and half free." The challenge of the 1960's is equally clear: can a democracy long endure which denies a substantial body of its citizens the equal protection of the laws. The answer in both cases is the same.

In the words of the Civil Rights Commission's report: The inequities—which exist in the area of civil rights—should not be taken as an indictment but as a challenge. This Nation has always responded to any threat to freedom from abroad; yet for more than a century we have been divided over issues or racial equality and freedom of opportunity at home. The time has now come to answer the challenge within—the denial of civil rights to Americans by other Americans.

Mr. Speaker, this is legislation we can and must support. In a larger sense it is not mere legislation. It is a challenge to this House and to the administration to place and keep our Nation in the forefront of the fight for freedom, equality and the dignity of individuals throughout the world.

Mr. LINDSAY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINDSAY. I yield briefly to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SAYLOR].

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I commend the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACGREGOR], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY], for taking the leadership in bringing this matter to the floor of the House.

However, I just want to say that as fine as this legislation is, there are things which in my opinion are even greater than the right to vote or the right to a good house, and that is the right to a job.

Mr. Speaker, we may talk about all of these principles we want to, but until there is no discrimination in this country for men who are willing to work on account of their color or their race or their creed then and then alone will civil rights be a reality.

Mr. Speaker, while there was talk of the President bringing up a program, I want just to remind the Members of the House that the House will pass the program and I hope it will be a good one because the President in 1961 issued a order for the carrying out of fair employment practices. It seems to me every time his own Executive order pinches a little bit they make an exception. I certainly hope they will not do it in the case of civil rights.

Mr. LINDSAY. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLEVELAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINDSAY. I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. CLEVELAND].

Mr. CLEVELAND. Mr. Speaker, as one of the sponsors of the broad civil rights bill which was introduced by Republicans last January, and as a sponsor of the bill we are discussing now, I wish to associate myself proudly with my colleagues in this important legislative endeavor.

Mr. Speaker, we propose civil rights legislation, as we have, because it is right. We propose this legislation in the spirit of Abraham Lincoln and Memorial Day just past. We propose this legislation because we are morally committed to do so.

Mr. Speaker, we propose this legislation because we feel that government by law is preferable to forcing people into the streets and into mobs and into the arms of extremists to assert rights which all Americans, and I repeat, all Americans, have died to preserve through the proud years of this Nation's history.

We invite the support of all Members for our legislation. In doing so we pledge our support to any workable, sound, and progressive legislation proposed by this House to cope with the grave civil rights crisis facing our Nation.

Mr. LINDSAY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINDSAY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

(Mr. HORTON asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from New York for giving me this opportunity to address the House. There are times in a person's life when he becomes very proud of America and very proud to be an American.

I can recall landing with the amphibious forces in North Africa, the landing in Italy, and I recall not too many days ago hearing Astronaut Cooper as he talked to a joint session of Congress telling us about his orbiting of the earth. These are great moments in the life of an American.

Today, as a part of this Congress, I am very proud of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY], I am proud of the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACGREGOR], and the others who have supported this legislation. I am particularly proud of the manner in which the Speaker, Mr. McCORMACK, has handled the proceedings of this House; I am proud of Members on both sides of the aisles as they have resisted the pressures to attempt to keep gentlemen from speaking who had these special orders on a very important matter that involves all of America today. It seems to me one of the greatest issues facing America is this problem of race relations and the giving to each American an equal opportunity.

Today democracy in America is anemic, and until this Congress, until the people of America, assure each and every citizen an equal right to share in all the benefits and all the privileges of this great country, this democracy will not be a healthy democracy. So it seems to me that as this legislation is presented, we here in the Congress should pick up this challenge and do our best to make certain that our democracy is not going to continue to be an anemic democracy, and that all Americans and the world can be proud of this Congress and its leadership in making certain that all American citizens have their equal rights and their equal opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join with 25 of my Republican colleagues in introducing the "Equal Rights Act of 1963." Set against the backdrop of serious racial difficulties, the enactment of this legislation can assure the equal protection of the laws to which every citizen is entitled.

The bill I have introduced would grant broad authority to the Attorney General to act in behalf of Negro citizens currently being deprived of their constitutional guarantees. Events as current as those reported this morning on the front pages of newspapers across the country dictate that this Congress take responsible action in the area of civil rights.

Under the provisions of the legislation I am offering, there would be authority for the Attorney General to take the necessary legal steps to bar segregation and discrimination in any business which supplies accommodations, amusements, food or services to the public.

Beyond providing this legal tool, this bill would make those State or local officials who require or encourage segregation or discrimination subject to a legal suit. The rights of an individual citizen are greater than the desire of any official to enhance his status and must be guarded on that basis.

My bill also contains the so-called title III provision which was passed by the House during the Eisenhower administration, but failed in the Senate. This legislative language would give to the Attorney General the authority to institute legal proceedings against State or local officials where they are depriving or denying an individual his right to equal protection of the laws because of race, creed, color, or national origin.

Mr. Speaker, this is the second occasion I have had to introduce civil rights legislation. Earlier this year, I offered a bill to assure voting and employment rights. This first bill also would provide financial assistance to schools seeking to desegregate.

Hearings have been conducted on this first bill by the House Judiciary Committee. Yet, to date, it has not had any backing from leading administration officials who profess to be vitally concerned with these problems.

I feel this new bill—H.R. 6740—and the earlier bill—H.R. 4034—can bring to bear a number of legal sanctions. These will help to reduce racial tensions in our country and assure the Negro and others suffering the inhumanity of discrimination the protection which is rightfully theirs as American ctizens.

Mr. Speaker, we are a nation of laws. No man nor no group of men is above these laws. To that end, this Congress took action nearly 100 years ago to amend the Constitution and reinforce this democratic principle. Through the amending process, the several States ratified this congressional action and the 14th amendment became the law of the land.

We are today confronted with the same kind of racial injustice that led to that action of the 1860's. It is, therefore, our responsibility to make certain that this vital guarantee is uniformly applied. The people of the United States look to us for that kind of determined action.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACGREGOR] and I would like to thank the Members who participated in this colloquy and all Members who allowed us to put our remarks in the body of the RECORD. The two of us who controlled the time on this subject further would like to express our special thanks to the Speaker for the fair and impartial manner in which he presided over this session here today.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINDSAY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I do not want this day to come to a conclusion without paying tribute to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the majority leader for their repeated demonstrations of fairness and the protection of the rights of the minority in this House today. This has been clearly demonstrated, and I hope as time goes on and as other speakers may follow, whoever they may be, we may take from the pages of today's RECORD a record of the protection of the rights of the minority in the House of Representatives at all times.

Mr. RUMSFELD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to congratulate the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACGREGOR] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY] for bringing this important, timely, and valuable discussion before the House today. In addition to commending them I wish to associate myself with the concern for the rights of all citizens which they have so ably voiced.

Any person on the floor of the House today, and indeed the American people as a whole, should no longer have any doubt as to where the sincere concern and support for individual rights lies.

Mr. WALLHAUSER. Mr. Speaker, as one who has introduced legislation to insure civil rights for all citizens, I rise in support of this important legislation and trust that the distinguished Committee on the Judiciary will report a meaningful bill that will allow the Congress of United States to right a wrong that has prevailed for too long a time. The legislative process, it seems to me, is the correct road to follow on this vital subject and I sincerely trust that action will no longer be delayed. It is my belief that the racial unrest that is manifesting itself today will be quieted if we take the responsible action of recognizing the rights of everyone to first-class citizenship.

Mrs. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, every American citizen has a personal stake in the legislation which many of us introduced yesterday, legislation to enforce constitutional rights including my own bill, H.R. 6736.

If we, the free people of a free nation, genuinely believe in freedom and in the dignity and worth of every human being as the moral and legal basis of our free way of life, then we cannot rest in good conscience until all our people are assured the equal protection of our laws.

Despite the clear and unequivocal guarantees contained in the U.S. Constitution, our daily experience confirms repeatedly the dismaying fact that millions of our fellow citizens are not free; they have never known equal opportunity or what it means to get an even break; they do not receive equal protection of the laws.

The Constitution, however, is not a self-enforcing document. It requires interpretation and application by the courts and implementing legislation by the Congress. In the area of civil rights, the courts have spoken frequently and clearly and decisively and have given life to the principles of the Constitution and to the highest ideals of our people. Congress, unfortunately, has been slower, more hesitant and less clear about its own responsibility in this regard.

Congress cannot open the hearts and liberate the minds of those who insist on practicing discrimination in their personal lives, but we can and must deny to segregation and every other form of racial discrimination any shadow of public sanction or support.

This is not coercion. It is prevention. It is not our purpose to punish or to intrude, but to protect people and to enforce the law of the land, equitably and humanely. If, in seeking to accomplish this end, it should interfere with local customs or institutions, it will only be because those customs and institutions have been built upon an indefensible foundation—injustice, discrimination, and disregard for the primary rights of human beings. Our freedom cannot extend to the point where we are free to deprive others of their freedom, whether we live in the North or in the South.

We owe a great public debt of gratitude to our Negro citizens who have refused to resort to violence in their struggle to obtain a minimum recognition of their rights. They have willingly suffered abuse, brutality, deprivation, and humiliation to obtain rights which should always have been theirs without question and which the rest of us take for granted.

How long can we expect restraint, if we do not join wholeheartedly with those who seek nothing more than justice? How legitimate are our appeals for moderation, if all we mean is to perpetuate the status quo? How much respect for law and order can we expect, if the law is not used to protect the underprivileged and the disadvantaged?

As a matter both of principle and of prudence, Congress must not delay in equipping the Government with authority to protect quickly and effectively the legal rights of all our people, regardless of color, religion, or economic position, whenever these rights are threatened. This is the entire purpose of our Republican civil rights legislation.

The means we propose would be simple and effective and they are constitutionally sound. Our bill provides what the Constitution already implies, that places licensed by public authority to offer service and accommodation to the general public must not discriminate or segregate against part of that general public because of race or color, and it empowers the Attorney General to institute legal proceedings against State or local official proceedings against State or local officials who deprive persons of their legal rights to equal protection of the law on the basis of race, creed, color, or national origin.

There is nothing partisan, Mr. Speaker, about this bill or about the civil rights bill we jointly introduced in January. Nor does this legislation seek to substitute for the even more fundamental necessity of personal commitment and private action in the field of civil rights. We call upon all people of good will to join with us in this noblest endeavor of our times.

Mr. JOELSON. Mr. Speaker, although the statements today have no doubt been permeated with politics, I think that the proceedings today have been all to the good.

No matter what our motivation, it is gratifying that at long last both major parties are setting their sights on meaningful civil rights legislation.

I for one do not care which party gets the credit. If Democrats and Republicans team up to obtain a breakthrough in the wall of inhumanity and hate, America itself will get the credit. And that is fine with me.

I congratulate and join with all my colleagues who are yearning to be a part of a Congress that faces up to the challenge of our times. The day I can cast my vote for mutual self-respect and human dignity will be the finest in my own public life. Let us all work together in a spirit of brotherhood toward that shining moment in history.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleagues in introducing a civil rights bill which will go far toward insuring all Americans the rights they have been so unjustly denied, in the most critical areas of race relations today.

This bill will prohibit businesses operating under State authority from denying their services to members of the public solely on the basis of race or color. Furthermore, it will extend private and Federal authority to bring civil suits to prevent further deprivations of constitutional rights.

This will be a tremendous source of new strength for the efforts to eliminate discrimination in public accommodations and in public education. Our Nation is not free so long as we deny any American child equal education, equal opportunity, indeed, equal existence.

As a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, I am particularly sensitive to the impact of the recent events in some parts of the Nation. These events are grist for the Communist mills which daily proclaim our inability to secure the promise of our Constitution even to our own citizens.

But it is not for international opinion that we must pass this legislation. We must do it because it is right and because it is just.

The time for deploring the growing tension in our race relations has long since passed. A firm expression of congressional conviction is needed more than ever before.

Mr. WYDLER. Mr. Speaker, I submitted the following statement to Subcommittee 5 of the Committee on the Judiciary, for consideration during the current hearings on civil rights and in support of my bill, H.R. 3148, to amend the Civil Rights Act of 1957.

The struggle of man for freedom is both a foreign and domestic problem for the United States. Abroad we are fighting the Communists so that men around the world might enjoy freedom. At home we are struggling with our neighbors to maintain a dual society.

Many of our citizens who would be willing to fight a war and to die to see a man be fully free in South Vietnam or Cuba would face violence rather than allow a Negro his full freedom at home.

It is a matter of conscience. We have already seen the day pass when new legislation makes a significant difference. Not the law, but lack of intention is at fault here.

Nevertheless, as a lawmaker I must try to make use of the tools at my disposal. I have sponsored the civil rights bill, H.R. 3148, and state that each section is self-evidently justified. It will do for my neighbor what I would have him do for me. It should be passed not because it will solve the problem but because it will help. It is a small step, but it is in the right direction.

We have been witness to a lot of meaningless and childish statements concerning civil rights lately—both pro and con. What we need is mature reflection not only on the questions of integration and equality, but on man's dignity, our neighbor's and our own.

Mr. SCHWENGEL. Mr. Speaker, I have never appeared before the House for a cause that I felt more deeply about than the cause of civil rights.

The civil rights we ask for is a basic and acknowledged American right.

Since coming to Washington as the Representative of the First District of Iowa I have come to realize much more the meaning and importance of the American ideals under which we function here. This Capital area is the focal point of this great Republic, a place where more has happened to benefit people than has happened anywhere else in all the rest of history.

And we have learned from our history that as we give more freedom to others we have more freedom ourselves. In doing this we have served ourselves and our system well. Following this precedent we have assured a spiritual growth that has also given us great material benefits and many comforts.

It is not hard for me to see that these advantages I have mentioned would have been even greater had we been more zealous in our efforts in this regard.

Mr. Speaker, it has been just 100 years since our most American American, Mr. Lincoln, issued the Proclamation of Emancipation. It was 100 years ago last December since he said, in making a plea to Congress for his proclamation—that we should remember that—

As we give freedom to the slave we give freedom to the free—honorable alike in what we give and in what we preserve.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that in reading the newspapers of recent weeks and the visiting of the schools in the District of Columbia, has revealed to me the awfulness of the problems that arise when the ordinary civil right of the people are not recognized and granted.

I would also like to say that it is awfully late in the history of the free world to still find a need to sponsor a bill in the Congress of the United States implementing the oft stated principle of freedom and equality.

It is not only late, but it is a tragedy of monumental significance, to note that the spirit, aims, and ambitions of our forefathers have not yet been fully implemented.

Mr. Speaker, I speak with urgency and with deep feeling on this important subject. I voice the hope the better spirits and judgments will soon prevail and that we can more fully implement the moral forces on which this great American ideal is built.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

---

HIS HOLINESS, POPE JOHN XXIII

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRICE] is recognized for 30 minutes.

BW June 8, 1963
Number 1762

BUSINESS WEEK

The race crisis

Coming to a head

The Negro drive for civil rights has moved faster than anyone might have expected, North as well as South

With segregation laws being knocked down by the courts, difficult decisions now are squarely up to businessmen

Pres. Kennedy's Administration now accepts it as a national problem, and plans to take stronger action (page 24)

Faster than anyone might have imagined a year ago, the racial issue is building up steam.

In the past few weeks, the Negro drive for equal rights has ceased to be a series of local outbreaks. It has spread to a lengthening list of cities, North as well as South, and the federal government regards it now as a national problem (page 24).

Bolstered by Supreme Court decisions, the Negroes have gone on the offensive. Even in such hard-core states as Mississippi and Alabama, they have turned the tables. Thus, next Monday's scheduled attempt of Negroes to enroll at the University of Alabama in the face of Gov. George C. Wallace's pledge to "stand in the schoolhouse door" and bar their way no longer looks like a pioneering Negro attack on a barrier but like a last-ditch stand of segregation.

Balance of power. With the struggle no longer so one-sided, businessmen find themselves more than ever in the middle of a no man's land. As long as state and local segregation laws stood, they could as a group remain on the sidelines. Now that legal supports of segregation are being struck down by the courts, they are faced with direct demands by Negroes and must make difficult decisions that inevitably offend one side or the other.

In dozens of cities, businessmen who cater to the public are being asked to serve Negroes as well as whites, and employers are being asked to employ or upgrade Negroes. And those who have substantial community influence, as many businessmen have, are working as never before to preserve the economic interests of their cities.

Paramount question. Even in the Deep South, the crucial question is no longer one of die-hard resistance but of when: Will adjustments to Negro demands come fast enough to head off serious social and economic trouble?

Last week, for example, 212 prominent Tuscaloosa businessmen and other leading citizens signed a petition asking Gov. Wallace to stay away from their city, the site of University of Alabama, and not interfere with the court-ordered enrollment of Negroes.

This came after a business group headed by George A. LeMaistre, president of City National Bank, and Harry Pritchett, real estate man, worked for months promoting peaceful acceptance of the inevitable integration of the university. One of the group, J. C. Duckworth, president of the First Federal Savings & Loan Assn., sums up their thinking:

"We have two examples—Oxford, Miss., to the west and Clemson, S. C., to the east. Both towns have their Negro student, but one has federal troops and the other doesn't."

In a dozen speeches to business groups, LeMaistre emphasized "the economic effects of violence as in Little Rock." Since Little Rock, and its sharp drop in capital investment for years after its school crisis, most businessmen seem convinced that the price of trouble is too high.

Compounding an ill. Racial trouble is especially destructive when it comes on top of other problems. Merchants in downtown Birmingham, for example, have been hard pressed by competition from outlying shopping centers. Negro boycotts and white customers' fear of violence have cut volume further.

Federal Reserve figures regularly show Birmingham sales to be under those of other Southeastern cities. "This is obviously caused by unrest in the community," says Chamber of Commerce Pres. William M. Spencer. The city's Committee of 100 also reports some letters from companies saying they will no longer consider locating there.

Birmingham's economic trouble is not new. Employment has dropped about 18,000 since the peak of 1957, and capital spending has fallen rapidly in the past few years.

Moral concern. Some cities claim to be guided by principle, rather than economic self-interest.

In Charlotte, N. C., five leading hotels and motels just opened their rooms and restaurants to Negroes, and Mayor Stan Brookshire says: "This community is voluntarily facing up to what it thinks is right. This action represents acceptance of the principle that discrimination based on the color of a man's skin is legally and morally wrong and economically unsound."

Chambers of Commerce and other business groups in Atlanta, Raleigh,

Greensboro, and Durham, N. C., have publicly urged businesses that cater to the public to give equal service to Negroes. In Durham, 40 of the main employers said they would not only integrate work forces but would also be willing to train unqualified Negroes for better jobs. Biracial committees, which Negroes once battled hard to obtain, are now functioning in a dozen cities in the South.

Still there's trouble. Despite such concessions, trouble lies ahead. Part of the menace comes from Negro impatience. Far from satisfied by their gains, Negroes see only a vindication of their struggles and a spur to fight for more.

"Negroes are fed up—the ferment is increasing," says Mrs. Ruby Hurley, NAACP regional director in Atlanta.

North and South, Negroes are stepping up the pace of their marches, picketing, and sit-ins, provoking mass arrests and sometimes violence on both sides. Negro willingness to risk violence shows up in a city such as Gainesville, Fla., where Negroes retaliated against a white attack by dragging a white man from his car and beating him.

Says Paul Anthony, field director of the moderate Southern Regional Council: "You get a sense of real militancy and an anti-white feeling that we haven't experienced before." The council notes that "we are adopting measures which already are outgrown by Negro needs and impatience."

On the other side of the coin, Negro aggressiveness crystallizes white resistance. Even in cities with a reputation for moderation, some whites have lost sympathy with Negro tactics. After nine days of Negro mass demonstrations in Greensboro, N. C., Mayor David Schenck noted: "As a result of the large demonstrations, our group of moderates is shrinking . . . I've had trouble lately getting people to serve on biracial committees."

Chamber of Commerce Pres. John Harden adds: "A few weeks ago, the directors of the Chamber of Commerce and the Merchants Assn. independently passed resolutions urging equal treatment of all people. Today I am sure the Chamber directors wouldn't pass such a resolution."

Trouble up north. Housing and job opportunities are among leading new racial issues in Northern cities.

In Philadelphia, local chapters of CORE and NAACP picketed and demonstrated against alleged bias of building trade unions on municipal projects. Blackjacks, bottles, and fists have been used freely. Last week, NAACP negotiators wrung out of the trade unions an agreement to hire a Negro plumber, steamfitter, two apprentice electricians, and two sheet metal workers.

One irony of the week-long picketing at building sites: The NAACP included among its targets a school that had been designed by a Negro architect and was situated in a Negro neighborhood. However, construction continued despite picketing.

At the White House, the President appealed to 100 business executives to order integration of their Southern stores, hotels, theaters, restaurants.

The race crisis

Kennedy decides on action

Lights burn late at the White House. Congressional leaders clear the decks for action they had not contemplated even a few weeks ago. The civil rights issue is officially a national problem now.

Washington realizes that the battle of Birmingham gave Negroes a sense of unity and success. The impending showdown with Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama over admission of Negroes to the state university creates urgency. The Administration fears that the pace of picketing and sit-ins will step up as schools and colleges let out for the summer.

Trend of feelings. Negro moderates become more militant as the crisis grows. The legal-minded NAACP (National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People) is faced with losing the initiative to the Freedom Riders and sit-in students of CORE (Congress of Racial Equality). So it, too, moves into the streets.

NAACP discloses plans to picket building projects throughout the North where unions discriminate against Negroes. And a spokesman for 125 NAACP lawyers announces: "I'm not going to wait for the aid of the Justice Dept., and the reason is that my people are not going to let me."

Until now, the Administration has boasted that it was making more progress in civil rights through legal action and persuasion that it could by more dramatic means. It has made a record in helping Negro voter registration, promoting employment among defense contractors, and barring discrimination in federally assisted housing.

Legislation. Next week, the President will ask Congress for two significant civil rights measures:

- To prohibit discrimination in commercial places that engage in interstate commerce, which includes getting supplies from out of state—such as films for movie houses and food for restaurants. Stores, of course, are a main target.
- To speed school desegregation, perhaps by authorizing the federal government to take part in drawing up desegregation plans and to act as conciliator in disputes.

Many businessmen such as chain

The New York Times Magazine 6/9/63 R+R Rel

SRC

In Birmingham—The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. (right) and the Rev. Ralph D. Abernathy lead a march of Negro demonstrators.

'Not Token Freedom, Full Freedom'

To a reporter who has covered the racial struggle, the alternative to granting the Negro's demand is violence, for Southern white 'gradualists' have let time run out.

By CLAUDE SITTON

ATLANTA.

They say in Hinds County,
No neutrals have we met,
You'll either be a Freedom Fighter
Or a "Tom" for Ross Barnett.

THE preacher in the blue-denim jumper snapped his right arm forward like a pitcher throwing a fast ball. His left foot slapped the floor. And 300 teen-agers swung into the chorus of the Negro protest movement's version of the labor-union song from the east Kentucky coal fields, "Which Side Are You On?"

Scenes like this one in the hot, crowded basement of the 16th Street Baptist Church in Birmingham, Ala., can be seen nightly in some corner of the South. Although the lyrics refer to Jackson, Miss., Negroes — integrationists and Uncle Toms—and to Mississippi's white-supremacist Governor, they have meaning for all Southerners.

Long-suppressed discontent over segregation, frustration aroused by token racial change and a touch of black-nationalist fever have generated a social upheaval of unforeseen suddenness and intensity. Whites have made what seemed to them significant compromises. But their response has fallen far short of the Negro's insistence upon "Freedom, NOW!"

The drive for equality has penetrated into the segregationist heartland—the cities and towns of the lower South, the rural Black Belt and even the Mississippi Delta. The whites in these areas have been stripped of one legalistic defense after another. The resulting desperation has driven some of them to seek relief in the ranks of the right wing and others in the contemplation —and sometimes the execution—of violence.

The rising pressures from both sides indicate that the string is running out for the Southern moderate. He has sought to keep the peace by swallowing an occasional dose of desegregation but only when it was forced upon him by a Federal judge or by Negro demonstrations.

IT seems clear that the moderates and even the sane segregationists who value the region's future welfare more highly than its customs must set about the task of extending full equality to Negroes. The alternative, at best, will be recurring crises that will sap the vitality of the South and the nation. The choice can no longer be postponed until some pleasantly distant tomorrow.

Those who question the need for urgency, who persist in picturing the Southern Negro as a subservient cuffy, fawning gratefully over scraps from the master's table, lack vision, hearing or both. In his home, his lodge and his church, he has never concealed his desire for first-class citizenship and now that he is proclaiming it in the streets, who can say that he is happy, patient and satisfied?

Negroes like to say that the Emancipation Proclamation freed them physically and that the Supreme Court decision against public-school segregation freed them mentally. The evidence supports them, for it was not until after the historic 1954 ruling that the initiative in the civil-rights struggle passed to them from the white liberals.

The drumbeat of thousands of feet on the sidewalks of Montgomery, Ala., in 1955 signaled the quickening pace of the campaign for equality as Negroes boycotted buses in one of the earliest mass protests.

Five years later, the silent but symbolic presence of four college students at a Woolworth's lunch counter or North Elm (Continued on Page 78)

CLAUDE SITTON is Southern Correspondent for The New York Times, based in Atlanta.

You'll marvel at the quality and performance of a Klepper Foldaway . . . at its amazing compactness (folds to fit any car) . . . at the ease and speed of its assembly (without tools or strain) . . . You'll like its maneuverability — its constant stability and safety, its excellence as a family boat . . . Kleppers are sold and serviced 'round the globe; used by more people than any other folding boats made . . . 4 world championships — 2 Atlantic crossings.

- Carry it like Luggage . . . minimum storage space.
- Patented Snap-Lock Fittings make assembly easy, correct every time;
- Built-in Air Tubes . . . Guarantee maximum safety and stability.
- Economical . . . No dockage. No trailer. Low maintenance.

FREE CATALOG

HANS KLEPPER CORP., 820 Greenwich St., N. Y. 14
Please send FREE catalog TM14
Boats ☐ Tents ☐
Name _____
Address _____
City _____ Zone ____ State _____

Negroes walk in the Montgomery, Ala., bus boycott, which began in 1955. It signaled the quickening pace

'Not Token Freedom, Full Freedom'

(Continued From Page 21)

Street in Greensboro, N. C., touched off a wave of sit-in demonstrations that swept the South. Then came score upon score of Freedom Riders bound for the bus and train stations of Jackson, knowing that Parchman Penitentiary waited at the end of the line.

The Negro was talking, too. The few whites who listened dismissed the statements of civil-rights leaders as the mouthings of extremists, yet those leaders knew, if they did not say, that they were actually racing to keep up with their people.

There was the Rev. Fred Lee Shuttlesworth, later to be slammed to the sidewalk by a fire hose in Birmingham, telling a throng in a Greensboro church: "We don't want token freedom. We want full freedom. What would a token dollar be worth?" And then, eyes shut tight and right hand pointing to the ceiling, shouting: "You educated us. You taught us to look up, white man. And, now, we're looking up!"

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, fresh from Montgomery and the bus boycott, had an explanation for what was coming to be known as the new Negro militancy. "When people see a way out, they become aggressive," he said. "When they don't, they give up and find themselves adjusting to their plight."

IN one biting sentence, Mrs. Ruby Hurley, southeastern regional secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, summed up the demand that the Constitution's pledge be fulfilled: "What we're saying to you, Mr. White Folks, is this: 'You wrote it and all we want you to do is live by it.'"

The reply was tokenism in the upper South and something less in the hard-core states. Two crises came and went, at Albany, Ga., with little more than mild expressions of concern and a friend-of-the-court brief from the Justice Department. It took a series of mass demonstrations this spring, culminating in the Birmingham riots, to shake white complacency, in the North and South.

WHITES are now being forced to consider whether they are willing to pay the rising price of segregation. Is it worth herding children to jail by the hundreds, setting dogs upon adults or knocking them down with jets of water so powerful that they chip the bark off trees? Is it worth the violence that has stemmed from such repressive measures, or the economic and social toll exacted?

The cost of future episodes may make Birmingham seem like a small down payment on a very large mortgage. The determination of Negroes to cast off the shackles of racism leaves no doubt on this score. The point is made by James Forman, executive secretary of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. That organization, which grew out of the lunch-counter sit-in demonstrations, is providing the shock troops who are carrying the civil-rights struggle into the rural areas of the Deep South.

Sitting in his office at "Freedom House," a modest structure just off Atlanta's West Hunter Street, he speaks quietly but firmly.

"There's going to be a considerable amount of violence if major changes are not made," he says. "I dare say that 85 per cent of the Negro population, if not 95 per cent, does not adhere to nonviolence or does not believe in it. They are allowing the nonviolent movement to go ahead because it's working, and I think it's imperative for the Government to permit it to work."

Mr. Forman takes exception to Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy's deprecation of the Freedom Walk. The student committee and the Congress of Racial Equality are sponsoring this series of efforts by whites and Negroes to carry on the demonstration begun by William L. Moore, a white integrationist who was slain near Keener, Ala., as he trudged toward Jackson bearing placards urging equality. "You just can't keep a man down and deny him all his rights and then expect him to fight the battle on your terms," he says.

Although Negroes have seized the initiative, their leaders are still hopeful that whites will join them in the struggle before it is too late. "The country, I believe, is becoming aware that the people are really serious about getting their civil rights," observes Mr. Forman, "that what happened in 1960—when we had the sit-ins—was not a fad, that it is growing, that the nation, itself, must grapple with the problem, 'Which Side Are You On?'"

If whites decide to make the effort, it must be a sincere one. Empty promises will no longer suffice. And a resort to subterfuge will only intensify the Negro's bitterness and further undermine his faith in America.

THIS is apparent in the words of the Rev. James Bevel, one of Dr. King's more militant disciples. Like many other lieutenants in what Negroes call "The Movement," he dresses in work clothes, bibbed overalls and a plaid shirt.

"I used to be tricked by white folks," says Mr. Bevel, who comes from Cleveland, Miss., in the heart of the Delta. "But white folks aren't going to trick me any more. We are supposed to be a democratic nation: We're going to have to make democracy work or throw it away. You can't tell anybody in Asia or Africa that we have a of the campaign for equality. Then came the 1960 lunch-counter sit-ins at Greensboro, N. C. (center) and the 1961 Freedom Riders (here Alabama Guardsmen ring one of their buses).

democracy when we're using Hitler tactics."

Some observers believe that men like Mr. Bevel represent the wave of the future. If they do, gradualism will get short shrift. "Some punk who calls himself the President has the audacity to tell people to go slow," he says. "I'm not prepared to be humiliated by white trash the rest of my life, including Mr. Kennedy."

The Bevels are the inevitable end product of the terror and hoodlumism employed by racists to deny the right of Negroes even to seek redress of grievances. This is particularly true in Alabama and Mississippi. The attacks on sit-in demonstrators in Jackson, the shooting of a voter registration worker in the Delta, the use of electrical prod poles in arresting Freedom Walkers at the Georgia-Alabama line can only encourage retaliation in kind.

Many of these acts of violence could have been prevented had the moderates exercised their power to control the extremists. It has been demonstrated repeatedly in the South that an assertion that law and order will be maintained has been all that was necessary. But having abdicated this leadership to the demagogues in the past, the moderates now find it difficult to recapture.

Moreover, the moderates have assisted the more militant Negroes in their rise to power by undercutting established local leaders. These whites have pleaded for time

(Continued on Following Page)

NELSONIZING

REMAKES OLD SPACE SHOES LIKE NEW

$5.95

regularly $8.50

Special 10-day offer! To acquaint you with the unexcelled quality of our craftsmanship, we now offer our regular $8.50 molded shoes rebuilding service at savings of 30%. All work done on the premises in our block long factory. Offer expires June 22nd.

B. NELSON, INC.
114 E. 39th St., N.Y.C. 16
MU 9-4466

ENJOY AT HOME

The new versatile MacLevy MIST-AID STEAM VAPOR BATH UNIT weighs only 15 lbs., converts any home tub or shower into a professional TURKISH BATH STEAM-ROOM.
Set timer . . . Steam in less than 3 minutes. Attractive design — variety of models, MIST-AID recesses in wall, hangs on wall or concealed in medicine cabinet, closet or basement.
Now in many homes, U.S. Army, Gyms & Motels. Proven and tested, easily installed by your plumber, sells for $275, operates on regular 110 volt house current, also 200 volt model, U.L. Approved. Write for FREE Mist-Aid and famous MacLevy Exercise & Reducing Equipment brochure. MacLEVY, 320 5th Ave., N.Y.C. Tel. WI 7-4073.

Add these to your decorating dictionary

(gran'ik & mas'ter-craft)

n. pl. GRANICK & MASTERCRAFT

1. Outstanding examples of the upholsterer's craft in sofas, sectionals and lounge chairs, period and present in motif. 1a. Dining room, bedroom, accent and occasional designs, superbly crafted for any of many decorating moods. All are available exclusively through your decorator, dealer or architect at our New York City, Philadelphia and Westbury showrooms:

ARMAND MORELL 425 East 53rd Street, N.Y.C., 2313 Chestnut Street, Phila. GRANICK FURNITURE Merrick Ave., Westbury, L.I.

(Continued from Preceding Page)
and when it was granted have failed to use it for constructive action. They have sent responsible Negro leaders back to their followers with pledges and then have failed to carry them out.

The public position of the moderate likens him to the mugwump, that political bird of the late 19th century. Instead of advocating step-by-step-desegregation, he has rested placidly on the fence with his mug on one side and his wump on the other of the controversy. The inescapable conclusion is that the moderate has used an honorable term to screen dishonorable inaction.

THERE are impressive signs in some areas that moderates now realize the predicament of the South and are willing to take measures to remedy it. Leaders in Greensboro, Charlotte, Durham and Raleigh, N. C., Knoxville and Nashville, Tenn., and Atlanta are advocating steps that would result in "open cities" with little or no segregation or discrimination in facilities serving the public. But even these bold proposals may be too little and too late.

This question is raised by the 15 executive committee members of the Southern Regional Council, a biracial organization that long has called for equal opportunity.

"Equality is an American ideal," they say in one of their few public statements. "It has become also a practical necessity. But it is first of all an issue of human decency.

"In the United States, and particularly in the South, we are adopting measures which already are outgrown by Negro needs and impatience. Had we years ago vigorously defended voting rights in the courts, had we made beginnings in the desegregation of public accommodations and services, had we established rules to protect fair and equal employment rights, had we done these and other like things then—which we are beginning to do now—they might have been in time. They are no longer."

DESPITE the explosiveness of the situation, the South and the nation have time to work out a solution. It need not be a drastic one. A degree of gradualism is built into the social system.

Experience has shown, for example, that if every lily-white lunch counter in the Deep South ended segregation tomorrow there would be no flood of Negroes seeking service. One reason is that many of them simply cannot afford it.

If every segregated public school system adopted a free transfer policy, there would be no lines of Negroes knocking on the doors of white classrooms. Residential segregation, as it has in the North, would limit the number of applicants. And the less qualified would be discouraged by the unquestionably higher standards of the white schools.

A similar situation exists in employment. Years of deprivation have imposed a cultural lag on the Negro. Southern employers who have honestly sought to desegregate their work force have had difficulty in finding sufficient numbers of qualified personnel.

FURTHER, most Negroes are as anxious as most whites to avoid unpleasantness. They have no desire to force themselves on others. Those who sincerely fear that desegregation will lead to repeated racial incidents might consider the words of William B. Hartsfield, Mayor Emeritus of Atlanta. "The Southern Negro is the greatest incident-avoider in the world," he once said.

Nevertheless, Negroes do want, and will continue to demand, the right to move freely in this society without being constantly reminded of their skin color. There is much that can be done to assure them of this right.

They contend that, at the least, the Federal Government can put an end to the police brutality that constitutes one of the chief handicaps to their efforts toward self-improvement. Present Federal laws in this field are considered so inadequate as to be useless.

A second major complaint is the slowness with which the lower courts have moved to implement the 1954 school desegregation decision. Only some four-tenths of 1 per cent of the Negro students in the 11 states of the Old Confederacy are now attending classes with whites.

THE delay engaged in by the courts in handling this and other civil-rights issues is hardly surprising when one considers that a number of Federal District judges are segregationists. What is surprising to many Negroes who supported President Kennedy in the 1960 election is that some of his appointments to the judiciary are men of this type.

Stronger advocacy of civil rights by the Administration all along the line is plainly a necessity for the resolution of the current crisis. And the President and his aides now appear to be moving in that direction, if somewhat belatedly.

However, any lasting settlement must have the support of the South's white leaders, most of whom are of a moderate persuasion. To achieve it, they must be willing to take far greater risks than they have in the past. But these risks cannot compare with those that would be incurred by continuing the inaction of the past.

These leaders might begin by making an attempt to inform themselves of the Negroes' most pressing desires. Their failure to do so until now has been pointed out editorially by The Greensboro Daily News:

"If some of the South's white leadership has not, in the French queen's imperious language, said, 'Let them eat cake,' it has at least failed to acquaint itself with the currents and crosscurrents of this revolution. By failing to recognize that change is inevitable—that the Negroes' status as a race just 100 years away from slavery has been vastly transformed — these leaders now confront situations in which reasonable reactions are no longer control."

IN ALABAMA — A Freedom Walker is arrested at the state line.

ONCE they know the extent and nature of the problem, the moderates might begin a campaign designed to win public support for the measures needed to solve it. If these officials, business executives, lawyers, doctors, clergymen and editors put as much energy into seeking a solution as they have into dodging any involvement in the dispute there could be little doubt over the outcome.

The urgency is emphasized in a statement given to the judiciary committee of the House by representatives of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. "We can see that time has run out," it says. "It has run out both in terms of the patience of the Negro community and it has run out in terms of our successful delusion that a moderate effort is enough."

see p 2 & 3 for speakers scheduled

Rx R Rel.

LWD
VJ
PA
ML
SB
BP

RACE RELATIONS DEPARTMENT
Division of Higher Education and the American Missionary Association
Board of Homeland Ministries
United Church of Christ

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Fisk University
Nashville, Tennessee

RACE RELATIONS INSTITUTE TO MEET IN NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE

As American race relations enter a period of extreme tension and rapid change, the nation's oldest forum for the discussion of racial problems is preparing to meet in Nashville, Tennessee. The 20th Annual Race Relations Institute will draw some 150 lay and professional workers in the field of intergroup relations, representing both public and private agencies located in more than half the states in the nation.

Meeting on the campus of Fisk University from June 24 to July 6, the participants will hear prominent speakers from government agencies, civil rights organizations and universities, who will analyze the fast-moving developments in race relations today and also provide background information on the psychological, sociological political, economic and religious aspects of minority group problems in the United States.

"The general purpose of the Institute," according to its director, Dr. Herman H. Long, "is to orient leaders of local communities in the problems and methods of implementing better intergroup relations."

Dr. Long is Race Relations Secretary of the American Missionary Association Division of the United Church of Christ's Board for Homeland Ministries. This division and the Council for Christian Social Action of the same church are the sponsoring agencies for the Institute, which has been held yearly since 1943. The Department of Racial and Cultural Relations of the National Council of Churches and Fisk University will also assist in the presentation of the Institute program.

The concern of the present Administration in the present crisis is reflected in the number of federal officials who are scheduled to address the Institute during the two-week period. These include John Doar, an attorney in the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice, who will speak on the work of the department in securing the right to vote for Negroes in the South. Mr. Doar was present in Greenwood, Mississippi, during the mass registration drive this spring.

The Institute will also hear from the general counsel of the United States Commission on Civil Rights, Clyde C. Ferguson, on leave from his position as professor of law at Rutgers University. He will discuss the program, objectives and recommendations of the Commission, created by the Civil Rights Act of 1957. The Commission's life has been extended twice since then and it is currently up for renewal again in Congress.

Federal action to provide equal job opportunities in governmental agencies and in firms holding government contracts will be outlined by Hobart Taylor, Jr., executive vice-chairman of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity. He will also discuss the means by which citizens can assist the work of the committee in filing complaints against discriminatory practices and in assuring compliance with the executive order which set up the committee.

Brooks Hays, special assistant to the President and former congressman from Arkansas, prominent in the Little Rock crisis of 1957, will also speak to the Institute. He will discuss the crucial developments taking place today from the perspective of a southern moderate who has pressed for peaceful change for many years. Mr. Hays is also a prominent lay leader of the Southern Baptist Convention and was once its president.

Two federal officials in the housing field will explain the implications of the President's executive order barring discrimination in federally-financed housing. Speaking for the Federal Housing Administration will be Albert Thompson and for the Public Housing Administration, Hubert Jackson. Both are from Atlanta, Georgia.

The role and contribution of private organizations in promoting better human relations and equal opportunities for all American citizens will be described by representatives from a wide range of organizations, including the N.A.A.C.P., the American Jewish Committee, the Catholic Interracial Council, the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, the Southern Regional Council, the Southern Christian Leadership Council and others.

Other topics to be included in the Institute program illustrate the varied ways that questions of race affect the lives of all Americans today. Participants will hear talks on race and international affairs, the current status of school desegregation, both North and South, race and religion, the historical background of American race relations, and the role of white liberals in southern racial change.

Problems of America's other minority groups, as well as their future prospects will be covered by speakers on the Puerto Ricans and the American Indians. The question of anti-Semitism today will also be discussed.

Rounding out the Institute program, in addition to the addresses mentioned, which form the basis for seminar discussions, will be workshops and clinics for further intensive discussion. These will emphasize employment problems, community action and religion and race.

CGB
6/10/63

R & R Rel.

U.S. News & World Report 6/10/63
VOLUME LIV—No. 23 WASHINGTON, D.C.

A NEGRO REVOLT BREWING IN NORTH?

Northern cities are next, in the growing campaign of Negroes for faster, more complete integration. Pressure is on for new moves in schools, housing, jobs. Worried politicians see tension rising, in a situation loaded with political and racial dynamite.

A threatened revolt in the North against continued segregation of the races suddenly is being forced into the open by Negro leaders.

A growing number of racial incidents in Northern cities gives weight to the threat. Trouble has flared in Philadelphia, Baltimore, New York, Detroit, St. Louis, Chicago and Boston, among other places.

Negro organizations are moving away from dependence on courts and toward direct pressures to bring about change.

Politicians regard the whole racial situation as loaded with dynamite. It is causing President Kennedy to appeal for more voluntary integration and to lay plans for seeking new civil-rights laws from Congress.

Negro leaders insist that cities in the North move in three fields.

1. Schools. Negroes demand elimination of the school segregation that grows out of housing patterns and the flight by white families from mixed neighborhoods to all-white areas. To gain this end, Negroes are attacking the neighborhood pattern of school districting, asking assignment of pupils on a basis to promote bi-racial classes.

2. Housing. Negroes demand an end to customs and practices that prevent them from moving into white neighborhoods. They describe as "racial ghettos" the areas into which Negroes often are crowded in Northern cities.

3. Employment. Negroes demand that employers begin actively recruiting Negroes for jobs in order to overcome inequalities in employment opportunities.

The militant new attitude of Negro leaders broke into the open on May 5, in a speech by Representative Adam Clayton Powell, chairman of the House Committee on Education and Labor.

Representative Powell made the prediction that Washington, D. C., "is going to be the scene of one of the worst race riots in the history of America" unless something is done to ease racial tensions.

Mr. Powell, in an interview on page 37, observes that, in his opinion, the Negroes now have whites "on the run" in this country and should keep them there.

The race situation took a dramatic turn on the evening of May 24, when Attorney General Robert Kennedy, the President's brother, met with a group of Negro leaders in New York City. The resulting exchange of views proved politically explosive.

James Baldwin, a Negro author, said the Negroes warned Mr. Kennedy about the possibility of "a major clash between Negroes and whites in the North." Mr. Baldwin said that Mr. Kennedy was "shocked at the passion displayed" by Northern Negroes and "we were a little shocked at the extent of his naïveté."

Earlier, Mr. Baldwin had been quoted as saying that "the spinelessness of the Administration has had a terrible effect." The Negro author added that "it is incumbent on Washington now to take

(continued on next page)

SHOULD PRESIDENT "RISK HIS LIFE" FOR INTEGRATION?

—USN&WR Photo

The Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr.

CHICAGO

President Kennedy—even at "risk of his life"—should personally escort two Negroes when they attempt to enter the University of Alabama on June 10, said the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr.

The Negro integration leader told a news conference here on May 27:

"Governor Wallace has said that he would present his body in order to prevent enrollment of the students. If the President were to be present when the students seek to enter the university, it would be a creative and dramatic act with great moral significance."

A newsman suggested that such a move might endanger the President's life. Dr. King replied:

"The risk to his life is not the major consideration. The Negro risks his life every day. The consideration is, 'Am I doing the right thing?' The President should have full protection. But he must also stand up for what is right."

VIOLENCE IN THE NORTH

In May, violence growing out of racial troubles was reported in a number of Southern cities. In the same month, police reported this in Northern cities—

■ PHILADELPHIA, May 27-31—More than 40 people were injured, including 22 policemen, in a series of melees at a picket line around a school-building job. Pickets representing the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People were protesting alleged bias against Negroes in labor unions. On May 31, unions agreed to accept some Negroes in skilled construction jobs.

■ BOSTON, May 25—Four were arrested in a fight that started between a Negro youth and a white youth near a housing project in suburban Roxbury. A crowd of 50 to 75 people gathered, but dispersed when police arrived.

■ CAMBRIDGE, Md., May 14-15—About 60 were arrested in Negro demonstrations attended by heckling white youths. At one point two policemen drew guns to disperse a crowd of angry Negroes. Then other police arrived and the incident ended.

■ NEW YORK, May 14—Two were injured, 17 plate-glass windows were smashed in 14 shops, and a hotel was evacuated after a bomb had been reported placed there, in the aftermath of a Harlem rally to spur support for Negroes in Birmingham, Ala.

■ CHICAGO, May 13—Negro and white policemen were watching an often-robbed garage on the West Side when four Negro youths ran out. One was felled by a police shot after ignoring orders to halt. A crowd gathered, threw rocks at the police.

■ ST. LOUIS, May 5—Police moved in to break up a dice game in a Negro section. The players, all Negroes, resisted. A crowd gathered. Rocks were thrown. Twenty policemen and eight dogs quelled the disturbance. Police verdict: "A crime problem, not a racial one."

Philadelphia police haul bleeding Negro picket into squad car for trip to hospital. Melee at school-construction site grew out of charges of union bias.

Four days later, clashes between the police and pickets were still going on, until agreement was reached with unions to hire some Negroes on the project.

—Wide World Photos

[continued from preceding page]

a moral position and stop playing politics."

Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, a professor of psychology at City College of New York, described the meeting with Robert Kennedy as "tragic." He said:

"There was no communication. . . . There were times when we just broke out into hysterical laughter . . . the laughter of desperation."

Dr. Clark interprets the Negro viewpoint in an interview starting on page 38.

Attorney General Kennedy was described as "jolted" by what he heard from the Negro leaders.

Wheels start turning. It was after that dramatic May 24 meeting that the Department of Justice and the White House started wheels turning toward further action on race relations.

Work was rushed on drafting of new civil-rights bills strengthening the hand of the Federal Government in dealing with racial discrimination.

President Kennedy urged State Governors to use their positions of leadership to promote equal opportunity for Negroes. He invited a group of businessmen to meet with him to discuss jobs for Negroes.

Attorney General Kennedy met with executives of retail stores that have outlets in the South.

There was discernible a new air of urgency about the civil-rights problem in Washington. A look around the country showed why.

In the South, demonstrations broke out in Jackson, Miss., Baton Rouge, La., Tallahassee, Fla., High Point, N. C., Chattanooga, Tenn., and Charlottesville, Va.

Worse trouble to come? In the North, as racial incidents spread, there came one forecast after another of more and worse trouble yet to come.

Chicago's Urban League director, Edwin C. Berry, said, "Chicagoans are sitting on a tinder box."

The chairman of New York City's commission on human rights, Stanley Lowell, said on the WNBC-TV "Searchlight" program:

"There's been a tidal wave which is coming across from Africa and is sweeping through the South and is going to reach the North, and it's going to engulf us here in New York and in other places, as well, in the North."

In Philadelphia, the labor secretary for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Herbert Hill, announced the beginning of a nation-wide drive against racial segregation in labor unions, and said:

"The arena of combat for the NAACP has moved from the courtroom to direct, mass action."

Ra R Rel.

INTERVIEWS: A REVOLT BREWING?

WHAT NEGROES IN THE NORTH ARE REALLY AFTER

The North, accustomed to scolding the South about its treatment of Negroes, suddenly discovers this: Negroes are demanding better treatment in the North, too.

Why? How do Negroes really fare in the North? What more do they want? And how do they propose to get it? By violence?

For answers, "U. S. News & World Report" turned to two Northern Negro leaders.

Representative Adam Clayton Powell, New York Democrat, was interviewed in Paris on his way to an international conference. Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, psychologist, was interviewed in New York. His interview starts on page 38.

"Now's the Time to Keep the White Man on the Run"

At PARIS

Q Mr. Powell, exactly what is it that Negroes in the North back home are after?

A Complete desegregation. Not necessarily integration, but desegregation. They want to move out of the "black ghettos" into other areas where they might want to live. Only this way can segregation in the public-school system in the North be broken down. Public-school segregation in the North is as rigid as in the South, because Negroes in the North live in black ghettos.

Secondly, they want equal job opportunities, including upgrading. Per capita income in the North for a Negro family is much less than for a white family.

Thirdly, because most Negroes are Democrats, they want more recognition in patronage than they have received from Democratic leaders in the big cities.

Q Are these the same things they want in the South?

A Absolutely. It must be realized that there is very little difference between the North and the South, except that I would say there is more hypocrisy in the North and more honesty in the South.

Q You have been quoted as saying that Negroes now have whites on the run and this is the time to keep them running. Is that right?

A Absolutely correct. The white man is afraid today. He's not afraid because he outnumbers Negroes. He's not afraid because he controls the instruments of power, such as the police in Washington, where the Negro population is 56 per cent and the police force is 86 per cent white.

But all of a sudden—in Birmingham, Ala.—he has come face to face with the fact that this numerical superiority and this naked power can no longer contain the black mass. He has seen little children stand up against dogs, pistol-packing policemen and pressure hose, and they kept on coming, wave after wave.

So the white man is afraid. He is afraid of his own conscience. He's afraid for the future of the United States if he allows this image of Birmingham to continue to be spread abroad. And, because he is more or less religious, he is afraid of judgment. And so now is the time to keep him on the run.

—Wide World Photo

Representative Adam Clayton Powell

Q Do you mean that the white man is on the run because of Birmingham?

A As a result of Birmingham. Birmingham has been the catalytic agent which has changed the picture of the United States radically in the past weeks.

Q You mentioned Washington, D. C. What more do the Negroes want there? Some people say they have everything —equal rights to Government jobs, voting rights, homes in good neighborhoods, acceptance in restaurants, parks, hotels, theaters and swimming pools. What else do the Negroes want in a place like Washington?

A We have just concluded hearings before my Committee [House Committee on Education and Labor] on discrimination in the nation's capital. And what you have just said is exactly true for a group which I call the "black bourgeoisie," the upper class. This is a group that is better off than the average Negro anywhere in the United States. But 70 per cent of the population of Washington, D. C., is at the other extreme of the spectrum. Three times as many Negroes are unemployed as whites. Seventy per cent of the people on the relief rolls in Washington are Negroes.

 Copyright © 1963, U. S. News & World Report, Inc.

The Government does employ Negroes, but private industries do not. We can't get Negroes into some companies. We can't get Negroes into the department stores. We can't get them into the police force. The police force recruits whites from outside the District of Columbia while there are able Negroes in the District. We cannot get them equal hospital facilities.

The number of dropouts and pushouts in the school system is tremendous, with no employment opportunities for them, and the Board of Trade in Washington, which is the controlling group, refuses to do anything in this area. They told me they do not have the power. But three days after telling me that, when the Attorney General of the United States put a little pressure on them, they suddenly produced 350 jobs for Negro youths. On May 7 they said they didn't have the power. On May 10 they produced 350 jobs, and they could produce more. All this was produced in testimony before my Committee the last of May.

Q Mr. Powell, do you feel Negroes are entitled to more rights than whites have?

A This is something that has been cropping up recently—it's been called preferential treatment. It's been advocated by such outstanding organizations as the Urban League—a leader of the Urban League in Washington, Mr. [Walter B.] Lewis, so testified the other day.

I disagree with this 100 per cent. I do not believe in preferential treatment for Negroes at all. All I'm asking for is that the doors of opportunity in every area be opened, and then let the Negro take his own chance on whether he will succeed or not.

This is what's happened in Federal Government employment. The door of opportunity has opened. Negroes are taking Civil Service examinations and, as you've just said, have a tremendous percentage working in the Federal Government.

Q What do you think is the meaning of the growing militancy of Negroes in the North?

A Barry Goldwater [Senator from Arizona] was recently asked by editor Charles Stone of the "Afro-American" this question: "If you were a Negro, would you be patient?" And Goldwater replied: "Hell, no."

The Negroes' militancy is based on the fact that they're now finished with their first century of freedom. This is the centennial of the Emancipation Proclamation. Negroes now are on the threshold of the second century of emancipation, and they don't need to be patient any more. And they don't believe in gradualism.

They are happy with the Supreme Court decisions but are not happy with the enforcement of those rulings. And it's very interesting to note that the Supreme Court itself in recent days has given up the doctrine of deliberate speed, and, in this ninth year since the 1954 decision holding school segregation unconstitutional, has now ordered immediate integration.

The Administration has not done all that was expected because the President of the United States has not called for forceful civil-rights legislation and has not forced the housing agency to live up to his antidiscrimination executive order in housing. Bobby Kennedy has been doing a very good job, but, here again, the timetable has got to be stepped up by the Administration, and the President must now personally enter into this area.

Q Do you think there is a real possibility of violence if Negro demands are not met more fully or promptly?

A Yes, I do. Martin Luther King, in a national periodical, said before Birmingham that he believed that the power of nonviolence had now come to a place where it was no more than—and I quote him—"a tactical military maneuver." And one of the great things that Martin Luther King did in Birmingham was to go from bar to bar, from pool parlor to pool parlor, urging people not to be violent and to give up whatever weapons they had. But I do not think that anyone can control the black mass any longer. The only way it can be controlled is for the white majority to give the black mass what is long overdue and to give it immediately.

"The Negro Is Tired of Waiting"

What is behind the growing militancy of Negroes in the North? Are Negro youths turning to the Black Muslim movement? Dr. Kenneth B. Clark, a psychologist who works with Negro youngsters in New York City's Harlem district, answers such questions in this exclusive interview.

At NEW YORK CITY

Q Dr. Clark, there have been numerous outbreaks of racial violence recently—not only in the South, but in the North as well. And there have been predictions by some Negro leaders of more serious race trouble ahead. Do you think that a Negro revolt is brewing in the North?

A I think that the term "revolt" is a misleading term. The Negro is not plotting to take up arms against his country. But Negroes are impatient for their rights as American citizens. They want these rights now. This impatient insistence of Negroes to free themselves from racial injustices and cruelties takes many forms.

Q What forms is it taking?

A It takes the form of seeking redress through the courts, through the exercise of political power—and it has taken, in recent years, the form of direct action.

Q Do you mean violent action?

A No, direct action does not mean that the Negro will initiate violence. Responsible elements of the Negro community are certainly not inciting or even subtly suggesting to Negroes that they take violent action, because it is quite obvious that the Negro, being in the minority in America, would only be the victim of violence. He could not hope to gain justice or equality by advocating violence.

Q Do you see a serious danger that this campaign by Negroes will lead to violence in the North?

A The Negro does have to take into account the strong possibility that the mere insistence upon his rights as an American citizen might bring about violent reactions on the part of those who would want to deny him his rights. The Negro seems to be prepared to accept this violence directed against him if this is the only way that he can obtain his rights.

Q Do you find a growing militancy among Negroes in the North in asserting their demands?

A It appears to be an increasing militancy. The Negro has always been disturbed about the inferior status assigned to him in America. But there is a difference, I think, between the Negro's reaction in the early part of the twentieth century and now.

Q How would you describe the mood of the Negro today?

A The mood of the Negro today is that he must have the same rights that every other American citizen enjoys—no matter what the cost. He seems prepared to make the supreme sacrifice if this is necessary. And he wants those rights now. He is tired of waiting.

Q What about the Negro youth?

A The Negro youth, as I see them here in my work at Harlem Youth Opportunities Unlimited, seem increasingly alienated from white America. The Black Muslim philosophy of hatred for whites has permeated their thinking to a disturbing extent. In general, Negro youths seem to feel that they cannot hope for justice from white America and that, therefore, they must experiment with techniques of complete isolation—separation from the whites.

Q Do you think the Muslim movement is going to attract a large following among Negro youth?

A I don't know whether it's going to attract a large following, in the sense of membership and total identification. But the Muslim movement does seem to be terribly attractive to them as a philosophy and a point of view. Many of these youngsters who express to us the Muslim philosophy say, "We're not Muslims. But what the Muslims say is true: You can't trust the white man."

Q Is the Negro as impatient in the North as in the South?

A Oh, yes. There's no question that the new demonstration of insistence and urgency on the part of the Negro is not regional. It is more dramatic and clear-cut in the South. In the North, sometimes you get the feeling that the Negro is not too clear as to how he can express his dissatisfactions, because the problems which he confronts in the North seem to be more subtle and complex. The facts of Negro ghettos, segregated schools and pervasive job discrimination in the North are symptoms of the serious and explosive problems which exist in the North.

Q In the North, Negroes appear to have already many of the things for which they are demonstrating in the South. Why, then, are Northern Negroes so unhappy?

A The key part of your question is that phrase "appear to have." Actually, the difference is that, in the South, you have the flagrant signs of discrimination and the direct expressions of bigotry. The rules are fixed: "This is a white school. That is a Negro school." Or, "This is a white man's job. That is a Negro's job." In the North, things are not so clear or honest.

Q Do you think the Negro's situation in the North is as bad as it is in the South?

A In some respects it is worse, because it is less clear.

Q Do you really mean that Negroes have fewer opportunities in the North than in the South?

A No, I would not say that.

Q Or fewer rights in the North?

A No. I think what you have in the North is a form of "gentlemen's agreements," and a white power structure that is much more subtle in expressing its discrimination and prejudice and philosophy of white supremacy.

Q What is it, specifically, that Negroes feel they do not have in the North? What do they want?

A They are protesting against segregated schools. They are protesting against rigid racial segregation in housing—a containment of the Negro population in restricted areas, in racial ghettos. They are protesting against the conspiracy of real estate and financial institutions to maintain this segregation in housing.

And Negroes are protesting against racial discrimination in jobs that is as insidious in the North as throughout the South—in spite of State laws against discrimination in employment. New York City is offered as an example of liberal legislation and practices on this subject. Yet the fact of the matter is that even here the overwhelming majority of Negroes and Puerto Ricans are relegated to menial, low-paid jobs and are exploited by labor unions as much as by employers.

Q How do Negroes intend to overcome these situations in the North? Do they demand new laws?

A My personal opinion is that there are no new laws necessary in a State like New York. We have very good laws against discrimination in employment and against discrimination in housing. What we really need is effective enforcement of these laws.

Q How about the courts? Do Negroes believe that laws and courts can handle this problem?

A Obviously, laws and courts cannot handle this problem totally, but they are very important. The Supreme Court of the United States has been a most significant factor in precipitating the present confrontation between whites and Negroes on the moral and constitutional issues of race in America.

—Black Star Photo

Dr. Kenneth B. Clark is professor of psychology at City College of New York. His study of the effects of racial discrimination on Negro youngsters was cited by the U. S. Supreme Court in its ruling against segregated schools. He was one of the Negroes invited recently to talk with Attorney General Robert Kennedy about the demands of Negroes in the North.

But the Supreme Court cannot enforce, itself. It is up to the executive and legislative branches of our Government to see that the laws are, in fact, implemented. And, of course, in this case, there is also the Negro. The Negro is now taking into his own hands the responsibility for seeing that his rights are not ignored.

Q You spoke of segregated schools in the North. Aren't Northern schools integrated?

A No, we do not have integrated schools in the Northern urban areas. Oh, the schools are not labeled "white school" and "Negro school." You do not have segregation by laws. But you do have in the North a de facto segregation that is just as damaging to Negro youngsters as the segregation that exists in the South.

The bulk of the Negro youngsters who are being turned

. . . "Employers will have to actively recruit Negroes"

out of these segregated Northern schools are functional illiterates. They have not been taught to read or speak well. They are deficient in arithmetic. They are not equipped to compete, with any hope of success, for other than menial jobs.

Q Why is this?

A Because the schools that are attended by most Negro youngsters in most Northern cities are inferior to the schools attended by most white youngsters. These children are the victims of criminal educational neglect. It almost seems that these schools are deliberately preparing Negro youngsters for a menial status in life.

Q How do Negroes expect to overcome this Northern style of school segregation? Do they want to do away with the system of neighborhood schools?

A There is nothing sacred about the neighborhood school any more than there was about the little red schoolhouse.

Q Do you want Negro youngsters to be transported across town to other schools?

A There are many ways to obtain more democratic schools in America. School boards can reorganize school-district lines, taking into account the importance of having racially balanced schools. And certainly they could be sensitive to the relationship between balanced schools and the placement of new schools.

I think that, in the schools of America today, there must be a special type of crash program to see that Negro pupils are brought up to a respectable and acceptable level of academic performance.

Q Do you want Negro pupils to be given special treatment because they are Negroes?

A Well, Negroes are being treated as Negroes now, to damaging effect. So if they must be treated as Negroes for beneficial effect, this must be done.

HIRING MORE NEGROES—

Q Do you apply this same view to jobs?

A The job discrimination against Negroes has been so widespread and has continued for so long that you may have to engage in some kind of compensatory positive discrimination to overcome the effects of this long-standing injustice. I think that employers will have to go out and actively recruit Negroes as Negroes.

Obviously, an employer cannot employ an incompetent Negro merely because he is a Negro. But, if it is necessary for business and industry to develop specialized training programs in order to be able to employ a representative number of Negroes in skilled managerial and executive positions—then this must be done. Furthermore, business and industry should insist that our schools should start educating Negro youngsters so that they can be incorporated into our economy.

Q In the past, Negroes have argued that the law should be color-blind. Are Negroes now asking that they be given special treatment because of their color?

A One cannot rectify past injustices by pretending that they didn't exist. The Negro in America has clearly been damaged by past practices of segregation and discrimination. If we're going to correct this past damage, we're going to have to correct it by direct, effective action which takes into account the nature of that damage.

We can't tomorrow say: "All right, we're not going to have any more segregation, we're not going to have any more discrimination. We're going to treat all Americans as if they are Americans, and therefore everything will be right." This is nonsense.

During the transition period from injustice to justice, it is my personal opinion that we cannot pretend that there are no consequences of past injustices. We've got to face those consequences and do whatever is necessary to rectify them.

Q Even if it means becoming color conscious?

A Absolutely, because the problems are problems that resulted from color consciousness. It has to be resolved by color consciousness until we get to that ideal state where we need no longer worry about a person's color.

Q Does that mean that the Negro wants the law weighted on his side?

A Of course not. That would be discrimination. He's not saying that you must pass laws that give Negroes privileges and rights not enjoyed by other American citizens. But he is insisting on removal of the special forms of oppression from which he has suffered because he is a Negro. And this evil must be corrected by whatever action is required.

Q On housing—how do Negroes intend to overcome the kind of segregation that exists in the North?

A By opening up living areas to all people, regardless of race. Now in big urban areas we have this problem of whites fleeing from the central cities into the suburbs that are, in effect, white sanctuaries where real estate, banking and political barriers are placed in the way of Negroes who want to move there.

Q How do you overcome this "flight to white sanctuaries"?

A I think there is only one way, really, to overcome this, and that is to deal with the problem of segregation not in terms of just the municipality—the city itself—but to deal with it in terms of the entire metropolitan region. We need regional social planning.

Q How are suburbs kept closed to Negroes now?

A Banks will not finance home purchases by Negroes in those areas. Real estate brokers generally will not show or sell Negroes homes in white residential sanctuaries. And public officials, either directly or indirectly, participate in or accept this conspiracy against Negroes.

Q Many people express puzzlement over this: They say Negroes at this time are making progress in many ways, and they wonder why, as Negroes make more progress, they become more militant—

A One of the reasons people don't understand this is that they don't understand history. No totally oppressed people ever revolt or rebel. Now I use your word "revolt" in this sense: The Negroes' revolution comes as a consequence of what white liberals call progress. The closer a human being gets to a goal, obviously the more restive he gets in wanting that goal.

"NO COMPROMISE"—

Q Do you mean that the closer the Negro comes to equality the more insistent he is going to be?

A That is right. The more insistent he is going to be. And this is not peculiar to Negroes. Now I am speaking as a psychologist. There are only two ways that America can avoid the embarrassment of racial difficulties. One would be total oppression. The other would be total equality. There can be no compromise.

Q Where do you think all this trouble is leading?

A I feel that we are really now on the threshold of a truly democratic America. It is not going to be easy to cross that threshold.

But, if we do not create a more democratic society very soon, then we are really in trouble.

THE NEW REPUBLIC A Journal of Opinion Volume 148 Number 24 Issue 2534 June 15, 1963
Published weekly (except for omissions of four summer issues) and distributed by The New Republic, 1244 19th St., N.W., Washington 6, D. C. Phone: FEderal 8-2494. Single copy 35c. Yearly subscription, $8.00; Foreign, $9.00, Armed Forces personnel or students, $5.00. Advertising rates upon request. Subscribers desiring change of address should notify us at least three weeks in advance. Include old and new address.Copyright© 1963 by Harrison-Blaine, Inc.Item g. Second class Imprint, reading Second Class Postage Paid at Washington, D. C. Indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature.

6/15/63

THE WEEK

3. Kennedy and Baldwin; Rise in Radiation; "No One Fully Understands"; Economic Arithmetic; The Bill for Education; Fringe Benefits; Relief in Illinois; A Day at the Polls; Foreign Reports

ARTICLES

11. Kong Le
by Takashi Oka

13. Slicing Up the Cuban Problem
by Roger Fisher

15. Pan-Africanism Comes of Age
by Russell Howe

18. People of the Slums
by Joan Colebrook

DEPARTMENTS

23. Books 33. Films
36. Correspondence

THE STAFF

Editor-in-Chief – Gilbert A. Harrison
Publisher – Robert B. Luce
Editors – Christopher Jencks, Robert Evett
Murray Kempton
Associate Editor – James Ridgeway
Circulation Manager – Bertha Lehman
Assistant to the Publisher – F. R. Ruskin
Business Manager – Glenon Matthiesen
Copy Editor – Lucille Davis

Contributing Editors: Alexander M. Bickel
Robert Brustein, Asher Brynes,
Helen Fuller, Frank Getlein,
B. H. Haggin, Morton H. Halperin,
Irving Howe, Gerald W. Johnson,
Stanley Kauffmann, Walter Z. Laqueur,
Charles Burton Marshall, Helen Hill Miller

Kennedy and Baldwin

R+R

"Suddenly I looked at the Attorney General and understood that he did not understand us and for just a minute I felt for him. We were, after all, saying something quite un-American. We were talking against tinkering. We were saying that even the most effective political manipulation is basically unacceptable to Negroes. It didn't mean anything for him to tell us that this Administration has done more in this area than any other Administration. We were asking him to stop thinking about this as the special problem of a particular group of people and to begin to think about it as an American problem."
– DR. KENNETH CLARK, the psychologist, remembering the visit of James Baldwin and friends to the Attorney General of the United States on Central Park South, May 24, 1963.

All parties present seem to agree that communication broke down in the confrontation of Robert F. Kennedy with a group of Negroes assembled by James Baldwin. Baldwin picks a special moment after which any sense he had of people talking to one another departed. Jerome Smith, an exhausted veteran of Martin Luther King's itinerant non-violent army, was telling the Attorney General what he had endured from policemen in the South; Robert Kennedy is said to have answered: "A lot of people have had a hard time." The reaction the Attorney General recalls was "hysterical" laughter; the reaction Baldwin remembers was despair. At one point, the Attorney General brought up and dismissed the suggestion that the President escort two Negro students this month into the University of Alabama; it would, he said, be only an "act." "But that's what we want," someone replied, "an act." The President's brother was talking about a piece of stage business; the Negro was talking about the affirming gesture. One word, two meanings.

The Attorney General was sitting with persons one thinks of as examples of the security and success which some Negroes have found in America: James Baldwin, the novelist; Lorraine Hansberry, the playwright; Harry Belafonte and Lena Horne (she having flown in from Hollywood on a few hours' notice); and Clark, who has been a resource for the Supreme Court. Yet the central figure was none of these. It was Jerome Smith, a 25-year-old wanderer from jail to jail, a man with fierce contempt for a government which would protect the "free world" but cannot protect him in Alabama. "All of us said that Jerome was the whole thing. If the Attorney General couldn't listen to him, he couldn't listen to anyone else," Baldwin told a reporter later.

Consider the figure of James Baldwin. He is fashionable now, and how extraordinary is his difference from the Negro who used to be fashionable. Walter White was all executive competence. Marian Anderson was endurance and calm. Baldwin is exhaustion and tension, a rag doll pulled on the one side by a child who loves and on the other by a child who hates. He is a waif, an outcast, living in a waiting room between Harlem and our America; yet he is on the cover of Time and the Attorney General calls upon him for counsel – and does not get it.

The real shock to the Negroes was their suspicion that the Attorney General of the United States felt so helpless. They listened to his explanation of how difficult it is for the Federal Bureau of Investigation to improve justice in the states and cities of the South. "Mr. Kennedy," Lena Horne said, "you've never been a Negro questioned by the FBI." How could he understand? How many can remember seeing a Negro FBI agent? Yet that is the least of it. It would be elementary justice for the FBI to hire Negroes, but it would make very little difference in Lena Horne's complaint. For she is saying the cops are on the other side. Just how many white American women as wealthy and comfortable as she have unpleasant memories of an FBI investigation? Miss Horne could have added that although Jackson, Mississippi, will hire Negro policemen, they will not be permitted to arrest white people.

When the Administration began considering a civil rights bill, the first suggestion that occurred was a section affirming the right of a Negro to be served lunch in any mercantile establishment dealing in goods produced in interstate commerce. But the desegregation of lunch counters has already been accomplished or soon will be all over the South, and by the Negroes themselves. So here we have a bold assertion of the interstate commerce power by a government which seems otherwise powerless to prevent its citizens from being bombed. James Baldwin and his friends are all for law – as is Governor Wallace of Alabama – but they're trying to say something more important than "protect us from the rowdies and the dogs and the swinging clubs and the jails." They're asking for more than legal rights. Though no restaurant, hotel, or theater in Washington, D. C., would bar a Negro today, as they did 20 years ago, last week a prominent Washington funeral director (white) refused to accept the body of a four-year-old Panamanian colored boy; the dead are still segregated. A labor gang on the street is still either all-white or all-black; the truck driver is white, his helper is Negro. A guest for lunch with the Attorney General remarked last week how struck he was at how Southern the scene was as Negro waiters bent to pour coffee while the Attorney General wondered aloud what Negroes are thinking.

The Baldwin meeting left Robert Kennedy feeling rejected: "We seem to be shut out everywhere," he said. He most earnestly wishes to be the honest broker between contending interests. But he cannot be broker to the official South because he offers the threat of Progress to people whose oldest pride it is to be inflexible; and he cannot be broker to the Negro, because he is offering the poor token of Progress to people whose sudden pride it is to find themselves revolutionaries. A political order which for 100 years has needed to think of the Negro only as a voter now confronts him as marcher, as rebel.

And what do the marchers want? Martin Luther King puts it in three words – "all, here, now." They want to qualify, and they will not qualify so long as they are done for, as servants are done for. A few thousand more Negroes hired or upgraded on the job this year will make little difference. We are dealing here with prolonged, massive neglect. The neglected are certainly not all Negroes, yet by the nature of their condition and the urgency of their protest, the Negroes are today the only face of the poor which enforces itself on a public otherwise determined to flee as far as it can from the spectacle of the poor. Who sees West Virginia? We are talking about one-tenth of the population of the United States, 12 percent of whom are out of work. When we think about where the Negro lives, we have to think about all our slums; when we think about him unemployed and untrained, we have to think about the darkening future of all the unskilled; when we think about the schools his child has to go to, we have to think about all our blighted schools. Finally, we can solve his problem only by engaging all our own. The festering hostility in New York, Chicago and Los Angeles – as well as Birmingham – is rooted not in segregated public accommodations or even in segregation by neighborhoods, but in resentment at being so long and so hopelessly at the bottom. That is why Kenneth Clark was so precise when he came up with the word "un-American" to describe the nature of the Negro's insistence. Massive deprivation does not lend itself to our national habit of fixing and tinkering. Fortunately, there have been recently some faint and hopeful signs this thought has got through at the top in Washington.

Rise in Radiation

Radiation from nuclear tests will be at least twice as high in the US this year as it was in 1962, and perhaps more than that. The amount of leukemia-producing Strontium-90 deposited in the bones of American chil-

The New Yorker
June 15, '63
R & R Rel.

THE NEW YORKER

THE TALK OF THE TOWN

Notes and Comment

ONE mild, sunny afternoon last week, we boarded a No. 4 bus at Fifth Avenue and Forty-fourth Street, rode to Lenox Avenue and 110th, and began a long, slow walk through Harlem. It was a sleepy day in the city, and the only thing that seemed to set 110th Street apart from any downtown thoroughfare was the number of small children playing on the sidewalk and in the street itself, chattering in Spanish and English, many of them wearing keys around their necks for entering their homes while the adults were out. The games were the ordinary ones—drawing with chalk upon the pavement, jumping rope, and playing baseball with bats improvised from wooden sticks broken off cracked window frames. There was an odor of uncollected garbage, but a city garbage truck was creeping slowly down the north side of the street.

We turned the corner uptown on Eighth Avenue and noticed a drugstore, much like any other, except that the products featured more prominently than cosmetics were powders for cockroaches and a salve for curing rat bites. On the avenue and the side streets leading to 125th Street we counted sixty-three men, standing outside bars and in the doorways of apartment buildings, engaged in casual conversation, staring off into space, or simply pacing back and forth. Two fist fights, partially in earnest, broke out on the corners of 119th and 123rd Streets. Since approximately thirteen per cent of the Harlem labor force is unemployed (more than twice the percentage for the city at large), and since the problem of over-population in Harlem is notorious, the "No Loitering" signs on nearly every building seemed to create a certain restlessness in the occupants, who simply could not find a legally sanctioned wall against which to lean. Billboards on the brick façades of several buildings announced the forthcoming election of Schaefer Beer's "Miss Beaux Arts" from among eight pretty, smiling Negro girls, none of them very dark.

At Harlem Square, on the corner of Seventh Avenue, a meeting was in progress. Among the speakers on the platform (obtained, after some resistance from Mayor Wagner, by the Harlem Anti-Colonial Committee) were Sylvester Leaks, who was introduced as representing Malcolm X, leader of the Black Muslim movement, which favors complete segregation and seeks to gain government of the blacks by the blacks; William Worthy, a Negro journalist whose passport was withdrawn by the State Department after he made a forbidden trip to China; and Conrad J. Lynn, a defending lawyer in several Negro cases before Northern and Southern courts. A crowd of seven or eight hundred people had gathered around the platform, which partially obscured the front of a bookshop advertised as "The House of Common Sense and the Home of Proper Propaganda." (The store features books by and about Negroes, and is sponsored by a movement that favors the immediate return of Negro Americans to Africa.)

William Worthy was speaking when we arrived. He suggested the formation, by Negroes, of a Freedom Now Party, to propose Negro candidates for public offices. "Think about it," he said. "Talk about it. Kick the idea around. We may not win many offices, but with one out of ten Americans a 'Negro' [he apologized briefly for his use of this word, which is in disfavor among Black Muslims, who prefer the term "Afro-American"], we can make our voice heard in the land." There was applause when Mr. Worthy sat down, and he rose again to say a few more words. "Do you know what would happen if Fidel Castro were President of the United States instead of John F. Kennedy?" Mr. Worthy said. "Bull Connor would be given a fair trial and then shot. Ninety-five per cent of the police would have to flee to South Africa for political asylum. J. Edgar Hoover would be thrown into an integrated cell. If that didn't cure him, he would be left there for life." The crowd laughed and applauded.

Mr. Worthy sat down again, and the crowd continued to grow. The next speaker was Conrad Lynn, who, in a hoarse but articulate shout, heaped derision upon Martin Luther King. "King says, 'If blood flows, let it be our blood.' Well, I have news for him. There is going to be a lot of white blood flowing in this country—in the North and in the South—until the Negro is accepted as an American citizen. The law is an instrument of oppression. Take it from me; I'm a lawyer and I know. Well, we have guns, and we are going to make our presence felt. When Mayor Wagner refused to let us have this platform, I went as a member of a delegation to City Hall. A Negro policeman was among the whites barring our way—a stooge for the white Boss Man. Perspiration stood out on his brow. Well, we got this platform, and we are going to get our rights. This evening, at nine o'clock, we are going to have a celebration in honor of the victory of Jomo Kenyatta, in Africa. When this meeting is over, I want you all to line up for a protest march to the United Nations, and then to come with your flags to our celebration. I was at a meeting recently, down South, and some white man looked around and said, 'The niggers in this crowd outnumber us two to one!' He didn't count the 'niggers.' He was just scared. They're scared because they have a guilty conscience. Well, we have power, and we're going to use it!" The crowd stamped and milled and became so restive that the five policemen who had been lounging on the fringes of the gathering shifted uneasily. One of the policemen left to make a telephone call.

Just then we spotted a friend in the crowd, a young Negro woman who has lived in Harlem all her life, and walked back with her to Lenox Avenue as another speaker began to shout.

"There's going to be trouble," our friend said. "The families of some of these people have been on relief for three generations. They have energy and no work on which to spend it. Every night now in Harlem, there's a rumor that some white policeman has abused a Negro. On a hot summer night, it wouldn't take much to set off a riot—not isolated violence but a kind of revolution. Five years ago, it was still a problem for social workers—jobs, education, housing in which children wouldn't wake up to find rats in their beds. Now something will have to be done on an enormous scale or there's going to be murder."

We walked into the restaurant of Muslim Temple No. 7, on Lenox Avenue, bought a copy of the Black Muslim newspaper, Muhammad Speaks, and sat down at a table.

A waiter came up to us and said, "I'm sorry. We don't serve integrated couples. Not since Birmingham."

"Should we stage a sit-in?" our friend asked us, half seriously.

"No," we replied, and went with her to have our coffee farther down the street.

•

WEST COAST INTELLIGENCE: On windy days, a San Francisco radio station issues "small-car warnings" for the Golden Gate Bridge.

Creative Chat

EVERYONE knows that a book that is read in a few hours may have taken several years to write, but how many know that a three-day conference may be the fruit of a similar gestation? At any rate, that was the case with the Conference on Education for Creativity in the Sciences, being held this week at New York University, at which a hundred scientists, spearheaded by Jerome B. Wiesner, special assistant to President Kennedy for science and technology, are discussing such questions as:

Which educational practices tend to diminish and which to encourage scientific understanding and creativity?

How can students be further stimulated toward fruitful scientific activities?

What institutional environments will encourage individuals to perform most effectively in education, government, and industrial laboratories?

Is scientific creativity on the individual and institutional level being stimulated in other countries in ways that would be applicable and valuable here?

This powwow owes its existence to nearly five years of meetings held monthly during the academic year, on Saturdays, in the business office of Dr. Myron A. Coler, who is the director of the Creative Science Program of N.Y.U.'s Division of General Education and founder and president of the Markite Corporation, originators and manufacturers of conductive-plastic precision potentiometers. Oh, for an asterisk! A precision potentiometer is an electromechanical device, weighing anywhere from a fraction of an ounce to approximately twenty-five pounds, which converts changes in mechanical position (typically, the rotation of a shaft) into corresponding changes in electrical voltage.

Very well. We called, by appointment, on Dr. Coler in the Markite Corporation's offices, at 155 Waverly Place, and found him in a book-lined room, seated at a curved desk. A lean man with a mustache, wearing gray flannel trousers, a dark coat, and an alert, sensitive expression, he rose to greet us and, when we asked how about scientific creativity, began to pace around the room. "I have notebooks on the subject dating back to 1932," he said. "I became interested in the fact that one could have at one's disposal all the tools for making something but then never make it. How do you get to use the tools? In 1941, I became a consultant to N.Y.U.'s Division of General Education, and in 1956 Dean Paul A. McGhee, who likes to encourage non-academic research, said to me, 'How about some work on the subject of creativity in the sciences?' So I turned over some of my courses and took half a year to work out a program. I don't like this word 'creativity,' but when you look for substitutes you get neologisms. You might ask, Why another program? Well, I didn't think much of what had been done in the field, for the following reasons: One, my first area of worry was that it wasn't being properly approached on an interdisciplinary basis—engineers were talking to engineers, and so on. Two, the approach was too often anecdotal—the focussing on the achievements of an individual can utterly obscure what makes them happen. Three, there was a tendency to cite so-called outstanding creative people—Einsteins, Beethovens, Newtons—on whom (a) we don't always have sufficient information, and (b) who are so exceptional that what one learns about them may not be useful. And, four, there was a great deal of fudgy thinking in this creative area—people have often confused creativity with novelty."

Dr. C. sat down, stood up, and started to walk around again, in a rather small area. "I thought it would be good to get together an interdisciplinary group, not too large and not too small, of people who had done creative work and would be reasonably compatible," he said. "I got up a list of eighty-odd names, and from this there evolved a group of twelve, including me. All of them have at least two areas of strong interest and competence; I think you'll find that creative people are always more than one-dimensional."

Dr. C. handed us a list bearing, besides his own name, those of Dr. Nicholas E. Golovin, a member of President Kennedy's scientific advisory committee; Dr. H. Herbert Fox, senior chemist at Hoffmann-La Roche, Inc., manufacturers of pharmaceuticals; Dr. Harold W. Mohrman, director of research of the overseas division of the Monsanto Chemical Company; Dr. Anne Roe (Mrs. George Gaylord Simpson), professor of education at Harvard; Dr. Harold K. Hughes, professor of physics at Indiana State College; Dr. Ellis B. Blade, Markite consultant, and his wife, Dr. Mary Frances Blade, associate professor of mechanical engineering at Cooper Union; Dr. Morton I. Teicher, dean of the School of Social Work at Yeshiva University; and three N.Y.U. faculty members—Sidney G. Roth, director of the Office of Research Services; Russell F. W. Smith, associate dean of the Division of General Education; and Dr. Morris I. Stein, professor of psychology and director of the Research Center for Human Relations. "We meet in this room at nine-thirty in the morning, have coffee and cake, talk, argue, read and discuss papers, invite distinguished guests to talk, and generally concern ourselves with the problem of scientific creativity," he said. "What is it, how does it happen, how is it fostered—can it be isolated, measured, nurtured, predicted, directed, and so on. At twelve-thirty, we go out for a rather long lunch at one of five restaurants in the neighborhood; I think this promotes a continuing flow of discussion better than having a box lunch sent in. We come back around two-thirty for another couple of hours or so. We've focussed our discussions on

VJ, PAV, MLV, BAJ

R+R Rel.

THE WORLD □ AMERICAN SURVEY

Race Against Violence

WASHINGTON, DC

SOME people in America are saying that racial segregation died when Mr " Bull " Connor loosed dogs on Negroes in Birmingham. This remains very much to be seen. The sort of extremism that the Governor of Alabama chose to personify this week may be a dying gasp. Nevertheless, over civil rights President Kennedy faces the challenge that has been lying in wait for him from the start. This is to fight with passion for an imaginative and generous racial policy which he believes to be right. The unworthy alternative is to sound the alarm that the Negroes are getting out of hand but to try to devise some solidly cautious formula that will keep the country at least a step ahead of violence, without risking a real showdown with southern and other conservatives—and without getting to the real roots of the racial tumult.

Perhaps there is a lesson for the Administration in the plight of southern businessmen who are discovering that they are damned if they do and damned if they don't. If they give equal treatment to everyone in their shops, theatres and restaurants, the White Citizens' Councils and other segregationist groups attack and boycott them; if they refuse to do so they become the targets of Negro demonstrations and boycotts. This, however, means that at least they have not much more to lose by doing what is morally right than by persisting in what is clearly wrong.

In his broadcast on Tuesday, President Kennedy appealed to the hearts of his fellow Americans, not just to their heads or their pocket-books. Nevertheless, many liberals dread that the American dilemma may be falsely resolved by further instalments of what has come to be called tokenism. They feel certain that token concessions cannot solve anything as far as the Negroes are concerned and may well aggravate Negro unrest. Vice-President Johnson expressed the matter well when he said at Gettysburg that " to ask patience from the Negro is to ask for more of what he has already given enough." But will Mr Johnson and other Administration leaders go all out against the southern determination to talk to death legislative proposals that will bring about really significant changes if these are introduced in Congress ?

Unhappily the factor chiefly favouring the passage through Congress of decisive legislation is the grave prospect of further violence. Even white Southerners now shrink from that extreme of their own peculiar logic. They have been made aware that more and more Negroes are unwilling to submit any longer, without putting up a fight, to outrages, daily humiliations or murders such as that in Mississippi this week. As one Negro leader has said, Negro demonstrators are " sitting down " because they are tired of being made to feel ashamed of being black. Gradualism is in disfavour with increasing numbers of Negroes, not without reason. Since the Supreme Court's decision in 1954 on racial desegregation in schools, Negroes have spent millions of dollars and suffered many hardships to have that decision implemented. But at the rate at which this is being done—viewed by many southern whites as alarmingly fast—it is claimed that it will take another ninety-three years to end the colour bar in education. Yet the issue in the schools has ceased to be one of abstract justice and has become a life and death matter for Negroes. Automation threatens to shut them out permanently from almost any job unless they can improve their standard of education. Fear and frustration regarding not their own but their children's futures are what chiefly embitter them.

To offer tokenism to Negroes in this mood is to wave a red rag at a bull. A few Negroes inducted at bayonet point into hitherto lily-white southern universities will not bring about the change of heart for which the President appealed. Nor is opening even a swimming pool to Negroes the epoch-making event Atlanta, Georgia, seems to think it is. Negroes are looking for bigger changes than these. It is said, for instance, that Sunday morning is the most segregated hour in American life. The churches have failed to lead. And, while some southern Chambers of Commerce have evidently been nagged by the ugliness of their communities' public image into deciding that the more blatant and brutal segregationist upholders of " law and order " have become expendable, cities like Birmingham do not yet seem to have repented to the point of displaying either generosity or conspicuous courage.

Belated recognition that racial tension is bad for business does not clear the channels of communication that have become so sadly clogged. The biracial committees now being touted as a worthwhile approach to the South's problems are in fact a device that is at least thirty-five years old. Yet the Mississippi advisory committee to the United States Commission on Civil Rights, consisting entirely of Mississippians, recently expressed " profound shock " at the extent to which Negroes are denied the protection of the law in that state. People who did not know about this did not know many Negroes.

One result of the lack of communication is deep Negro suspicion of almost any white proposal. All too often such suspicion may be soundly based and it has to be taken into account even when it is exaggerated. The Attorney General, Mr Robert Kennedy, was almost certainly right when he said that a real

SPANISH HOOTCH

Bad Cheer in Galicia

FROM A CORRESPONDENT

FOR the northern tourist, enchanted by the sampling that even a modest purchase entails, the Spanish wine shop is a splendid institution. For many a Spaniard, wondering how much water—or worse—has leaked into those imposing arrays of barrels, it is an argument in favour of drinking beer. The argument is particularly strong in Galicia, at the north-west tip of Spain. During the last few weeks, semi-official sources have attributed more than thirty deaths and many cases of partial paralysis and blindness—some occurring as far away as the Canary islands—to doctored Galician liqueurs, notably the licor café and the aguardiente de hierbas. The fatal ingredient in these "drinks of death" has been found to be methyl alcohol, and the same poison has been found in Galician vinegar and tinned conserves.

An official, quoted by the Barcelona Trade Review, has estimated that the 450 million gallons of wine drunk in Spain in 1961 had been "baptised" with up to 25 million gallons of water. The wine sold for consumption by tourists probably suffers most: in one coastal hotel, a white wine which had begun life with a strength of about 14 degrees was registering barely 10 degrees by the time it reached the dinner table. But even the vino corriente drunk in Spanish homes contains, Spaniards say, "almost as much water as the milk."

Having "baptised" his wares, a distiller or bodega owner may add inferior alcohol to maintain their nominal strength; he may even base an entire product on dubious alcohol acquired cheaply from a backyard supplier. Barkeepers and their clients will call the stuff "mata-rata" (rat-poison), or worse, but—barring accidents—there will be no lack of outlets for it in the bleaker industrial areas. Unfortunately, in Galicia accidents have abounded.

Local authorities, fearing the impact of the Galician scandal on the region's exports and tourist trade, tried briefly to hush it up. The police tended to snap when barmen and topers telephoned or called personally, bottle in hand, asking for advice. The judge appointed to supervise a special enquiry was thought at first to be unduly secretive and was accused, by rumour, of trying to cover for certain influential personalities. But since the beginning of May, the Galician press has been allowed to report the affair fully and the police have coped valiantly with the hundreds of samples of apéritifs, liqueurs and vinegars delivered to them for analysis. Eight arrests have been made, thousands of alcoholic drinks confiscated, and the names of offending firms have been publicised.

For good measure, the press has informed its readers how to test their drinks chemically for traces of methyl alcohol. Los compradores de alcoholes no deben dejarse sorprender ("purchasers of alcohol should not let themselves be surprised") is the warning headline to a recent article. No self-respecting barman is now without his test-tube, filter-papers, sulphuric acid, potassium permanganate, potassium dichromate and spirit lamp. Even so, sales of spirits and liqueurs dropped seriously in almost every Spanish province last month.

INDIA

Disputed Power

FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT IN INDIA

PRESIDENT RADHAKRISHNAN, who arrived in Britain for an official visit on Wednesday, is generally thought to hold a position under the Indian constitution like that of the monarchy in Britain. This view is challenged in a recent book by Dr K. M. Munshi, "The President under the Indian Constitution." As one of the architects of the Indian constitution, Dr Munshi attempts to prove that the president is a good deal more than a formal head of state. Dr Munshi played a leading part in the drafting committee of the constituent assembly which organised the Indian system of government; he was later minister of food, and is now an elderly but still scintillating light of the right-wing Swatantra party.

His book argues that the constituent assembly neither created nor intended to create a powerless president. It granted the president much more freedom of action (some members feared too much) than the British crown enjoys; in particular, the president is not bound to accept cabinet advice. The cabinet, constitutionally, is to "aid and advise," and suggestions for a formal provision that the president must accept its advice have, during the drafting of the constitution and since, always been rejected. The president's authority depends on specific powers, rather than on traditional sentiment. He can be impeached, which implies personal responsibility. He can refuse his assent to bills. He has certain legislative powers, and authority in an emergency distinct from his normal executive powers.

The core of these arguments, which do not convince most constitutional lawyers in India, is that the president has sworn an oath to defend the constitution and should have the power to do so, even at the cost of overriding the cabinet. Dr Munshi's purpose is political. On the face of it the book merely continues an argument that has been conducted among lawyers since the late president, Dr Rajendra Prasad, raised the same questions some three years ago. But its appearance now (it was written early this year) is no accident.

During the crisis last autumn, several voices on the Right suggested that the nation should look for salvation not to the prime minister but to the president. This doctrine rose partly from sincere patriotism, partly from political frustration. It did not get very far: the Queen need not fear that the president will start pouring a private foreign policy into her ear. But it is a reminder that presidential influence did play a substantial part in the removal of Mr Krishna Menon.

PERU

Along the Inca Road

SINCE he is not yet on the army's black list, Sr Belaúnde Terry, who, according to unofficial results, won more than a third of the votes at last Sunday's general elections, will probably be allowed to take over as Peru's next president. His two rivals were Sr Haya de la Torre, the veteran leader of the Apra party, who won the most votes at the elections last year which the army quashed, and General Odría, who ran Peru in an authoritarian manner in the early nineteen-fifties. General Odría, who came third on the list, has already conceded victory to Sr Belaúnde; the Apra leaders are pointing to fraudulent goings-on in one of the areas from which they expected most support.

Sr Belaúnde is a youngish architect whose main political philosophy, so far, has been rather fuzzily based on the reopening of the ancient Inca highways. As president, he may surprise people. His middle-class following tended to fall off after his rather theatrical and bellicose response to the army's seizure of power a year ago. His Popular Action party calls itself left-wing; it may now have become so.

The check on whatever Sr Belaúnde hopes to do will still be the army. The older and more senior officers, while nursing their old vendetta against Sr Haya de la Torre, will probably be content if things in Peru go on much as before. But many of the younger officers, colonels and below, are becoming impatiently aware that unless there is reform there may well be revolution. Seeing themselves as Young Turks (or Nasserites, which is now the more fashionable term) they ache for an opportunity to take over from a system of government which they believe to be bungling, ineffectual and corrupt. Many Peruvians, who are not as a general rule well disposed towards the military, might be inclined to agree with them.

solution of the racial problem will come only when all Americans recognise the struggle for civil rights as involving them personally. Yet it is feared by Negroes and white liberals that this might mean patiently waiting for local authorities to experience a change of heart. The Administration may seek power for the Attorney General to institute suits to end racial segregation in the schools unless local authorities themselves come forward with plans to do this which satisfy Washington. But some liberals fear that Washington might be satisfied too easily by plans for token desegregation only.

Hitherto local authorities have been only too successful in dodging or defying federal rulings and laws aimed at racial segregation. Even Supreme Court Justices have seemed to be painfully climbing trees, encumbered by their robes, in order to try to catch birds. But the segregation birds they sought to trap have merely flown off into other branches and continue to flaunt themselves there. This spectacle, much to the fore over the past nine years, has benefited neither the law nor the Constitution. Therefore the Administration may now try sterner measures and over a wider front. But a law that seeks to prevent the exclusion of anyone from public places because of race will have difficulty getting through Congress. Progress has undoubtedly been made with registering Negro voters and the Administration hopes by this means eventually to break the South's ultra-conservative Democratic chieftains or to make them bend and in doing so to alter drastically the South's political structure. Yet it is doubted if this can be achieved in under twenty-five years unless federal voting registrars are introduced all over the deep South's rural counties. This would be resisted fiercely.

Mr Robert Kennedy has said that the situation of Negroes in northern cities is just as serious as that of the Negroes in the South and has called for what he describes as really drastic action. The northern situation has been aggravated by the exodus of Negroes from southern conditions. In the North it is not lack of voting rights that holds the Negroes back but economic discrimination which is practised against them by, among others, the powerful but predominantly white trade unions. The Negroes themselves, like these white trade unions, are well on the way to becoming a powerful pressure group. But, recalling the bloody labour strife of the quite recent American past, this prognosis is not entirely reassuring. The Administration may well be compelled to act as boldly as President Kennedy did over Cuba, if the centenary of the Emancipation Proclamation is not to witness a sort of restaging of the Civil War.

Testing a Fresh Start

PRESIDENT KENNEDY'S public reseizing of the initiative in international affairs, by his announcement on Monday that a fresh start is to be made in the negotiations with Russia on banning nuclear tests, gives him an opportunity of raising the question of a test ban to a new level both in Moscow and in Washington and of trying out the strength of the conciliatory approaches on the subject which have come to him from both cities recently. Incidently, he has also now a good justification for the discussions with Mr Macmillan which he could hardly have avoided on his trip to Europe without rejecting an old friend.

While Mr Khrushchev's readiness to have the nuclear negotiations taken out of the stale atmosphere of Geneva does not necessarily mean that a final breakdown is less likely, it does prove that he still wants to develop his contacts with the West ; this view, supported by the surprising freedom with which American experts have recently been allowed to visit Soviet atomic installations, will be confirmed if, as expected, agreement is reached this week on the details of the direct telephone link between Mr Kennedy and Mr Khrushchev. By choosing to head the new test ban talks someone as well liked in Moscow and as famous for his success in negotiations with the Russians as Mr Averell Harriman, Mr Kennedy has indicated that he is really anxious to achieve success this time too. His good faith is also demonstrated by his announcement that the United States will refrain from nuclear testing in the atmosphere as long as other countries do the same.

This promise will appeal particularly to Americans, who have just been warned that radio-active fall-out over the United States will go up substantially this summer as a result of the intensive atomic tests carried out last year. Although the public is assured, not entirely convincingly, that the increase will not be harmful, concern over it is one reason for the recent proposal from Senators Dodd and Humphrey, usually on opposite sides on this issue, that negotiations should concentrate on banning atmospheric tests, which are responsible for fall-out, leaving the relatively harmless underground tests until later. While the Russians have refused to consider such a solution, the fact that it has widespread bipartisan support suggests that the chances for getting a test ban treaty through the Senate may be improving, even though Republican criticisms of Mr Kennedy's new approach make it clear that the congressional struggle would be bitter. But, even if nothing comes of the re-examination in Moscow, the President's admirable speech on Monday—far more admirable than most American commentators seem to have realised—will at least have pinned responsibility for failure once more on the Soviet Union.

Shocks and SSTs

FROM A SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT

THE supersonic transport is fast becoming the only type of aircraft in the world to be both preceded and followed by shock waves of damaging proportions. No such aircraft is built in America and none may be for another seven to ten years but the shock of Pan American World Airways' unexpected order for six 1,500 miles-an-hour Anglo-French Concord transports was so great that President Kennedy himself was moved last week to try to repair the damage to the prestige of the American aircraft industry. In a hasty insertion into a speech delivered shortly after the Pan American order had been made public, the President said that he had decided to ask Congress for enough money to build at least one experimental prototype of a supersonic design yet to be decided upon. If, after testing, this American SST is found to be "superior" to that being built by any other country, production will go ahead. But, the President added, "if these initial phases do not produce an aircraft capable of transporting people and goods safely, swiftly and at prices the traveller can afford and the airlines find profitable, we shall not go further."

In view of the firm commitment of Britain and France definitely to build a dozen or more supersonic aircraft, the President's caution has dismayed some observers. By thus delaying the final SST decision he and his principal adviser on aviation, Mr Najeeb Halaby, have condemned the United States to start production at least two years late. Not only will the Concord be in service well ahead of any American supersonic transport but the Russians are also known to be working on a similar aircraft and for propaganda reasons they will make every effort to score first—even if their SST turns out to be no more than a much-modified version of one of their jet bombers.

Critics, both in aviation and elsewhere, have been making much of the lagging pace of the supersonic transport effort in the United States but these critics, at home and overseas, overlook two important factors which dominate American thinking about the SST. The first is that at this point the United States has perhaps

LWD, VJ, PA, ML, SB, BP

R&R Rel. Newsweek

Changing Attitudes In the White South

Man and boy, by birth and by choice, Federal Judge Seybourn H. Lynne was an Alabamian. But the question before him had long since been settled: no governor may defy a U.S. court order. And so, two days after hearing the case of U.S. vs. George C. Wallace in Birmingham, the silver-thatched judge enjoined Alabama's governor—his governor—from carrying out his vow to turn three Negro applicants away from the University of Alabama—his alma mater—when they arrive this week.

But, for two poignant paragraphs at the close of his opinion, Lynne departed from the impersonal voice of the law to speak for himself. "May it be forgiven if this court makes use of the personal pronoun for the first time," he wrote: "I love the people of Alabama. I know that many of both races are troubled and, like Jonah of old, 'angry even unto death' . . . My prayer is that all of our people, in keeping with our finest traditions, will join in the resolution that law and order will be maintained."

It was the prayer of a deeply disturbed South in a changing season. Spring was ebbing softly into summer, dappling the mountains green and gold, lighting the wild backwaters with lemon lilies and butterfly weed, setting the cultivators out into the dusty cotton fields. But a thornier harvest lay ahead. This was the summer of the Negro's discontent, a season of mounting pressure from Washington, from the North, and from mass-marching Negroes at home.

It would find the South at once united and divided, resigned and resistant, worried enough to yield a few steps, angry and fearful enough to be dangerous.

The Choice: Increasingly, the bent of the South's business and political leaders has been to keep the peace, even at the price of some desegregation. But they have given grudgingly, moved more by resignation and fear than by conscience, more by the dictates of good business than good morals. And, more often than not, they have given just enough—a hotel or a classroom here, a park or a lunch counter there—to buy time. Now, some are skittish and angry over the mounting Negro demands for more. Are they up to those demands? If not, the advocates of all-out defiance are waiting. These diehards are confident that the Negroes are playing into their hands and will at last be betrayed by their own rising militancy, uniting all whites against them.

Whatever the effects may be, militancy is bustin' out all over—and throughout the South, whites are finding it at once bewildering and provocative and frightening. To a Columbia, S.C., liquor dealer, it was like trying to crash a country club uninvited: "What are they gaining to be allowed in a place where they're not wanted or accepted?" To a retired assistant fire chief on New Orleans' modest Irish Channel riverfront, it meant the old order of things was changing: "They seem to have a contempt for us poor whites now. They don't make way on the sidewalk for the whites as they used to." To a Jackson businessman, it meant the South no longer knew its Negroes quite so well as it thought: "The Negro may still give you that nodding, servile sort of expression, but now you wonder what he's really thinking. Not only are we now afraid he hates our guts, but we are afraid he may be able to do something about it."

Mills Cowling

Bitter-enders: Wallace (in dark glasses) and Barnett

And to a Mississippi state legislator, it was plain topsy-turvy. "I rode a mule to school in Jackson 40 years ago," he says, "and I had a nigger mammy from New Orleans that almost raised me. We treated our niggers good. When they got in jail, they came to us to get 'em out. When they got sick, we got the doctor for 'em. The niggers just aren't ready to take care of themselves, even today . . . But all this pushing and shoving . . ."

Certainly, the South is still segregationist at heart. Incredulous at the spreading Negro rebellion, it still reflexively blames someone else for its troubles—the Kennedys, the Supreme Court, "outside agitators," Communists, the Northern press. But its own conscience has grown a bit prickly—more so than Southerners like to admit outside the family. "My wife is a strong segregationist," one Birmingham cement contractor told another over coffee in a Montgomery, Ala., motel. "She says once you give in to 'em, where's it gonna stop? But I don't know. We say we like the Negro in his place. But . . . look at what his place is."

"Oh, sure," conceded his colleague, a stauncher segregationist. "I guess if I was a nigger I'd be doing the same thing."

Associated Press

Lynne: Love and a prayer

Conscience: Others see the point, too. It struck an Atlanta architect on a construction site one day. "I saw the privies built, good toilets, with signs, one for white, one for colored. Then I looked at the white carpenters eating lunch in one spot and the Negroes in another, and I thought for the first time, 'Why should this be?'" And a Mississippian, afraid to identify himself, told NEWSWEEK's Karl Fleming: "We keep saying, 'Nigger, you're happy, you hear? You're happy.' We say we've had 100 years of peace side by side with the Negro. But . . . it's been above and below."

Conscience apart, the mind of the South has grown increasingly fatalistic about change. By pollster George Gallup's count, the idea that desegregation is inevitable grew from a 45 per cent minority view just before the 1957 Little Rock crisis to a 76 per cent consensus in 1961. "You spit into the Pacific for so long," a Little Rock businessman said sourly, "but when you notice no change in the tide, you sort of get discouraged."

And violence is a chastening experience. A subdued Ole Miss—bloodied by rioting over the admission of James H. Meredith last fall—enrolled its second Negro student last week without so much as a shout in anger. Tailed by an Army helicopter and a reconnaissance plane, Cleve McDowell, 21, an honor graduate of all-Negro Jackson State College, drove up from Jackson with two U.S. marshals and checked quietly into the law school. Gov. Ross Barnett's segregationist brain trusters—among them Citizens Council chieftain William J. (Mustache Bill) Simmons—pressed him to go to Oxford and resist. But university officials—worried about accreditation—helped persuade him to stay home, where he contented himself with an angry TV apologia: "The state of Mississippi cannot cope with the U.S. Army . . ."

Quixotic: In Alabama, even some of Wallace's admirers were troubled by his plans to stand guard personally on the last totally segregated state school system in the U.S. Injunction or no, he meant to go through with his plans even though it might "involve my personal freedom." But hardly anyone thought he could win. "Everybody understands it's a very quixotic thing he's doing," a friend conceded, "and they love him for it. But no one is fooled by its efficacy."

Indeed, the Wallaces and the Barnetts are a dying breed in the statehouses of the South. White defiance still runs deep in rural Dixie, in the black-belt towns and farmlands where the Negro population is high. But the South has been moving from the country to the city, leaving some of its heaviest ideological baggage behind. The urban South is acutely hungry for industry—and increasingly aware that race trouble is bad for business. Accordingly, it has softened the tone of Southern leadership—a shift that has been dryly characterized as Babbittry replacing bigotry.

More and more, the politicians have moved with the change. Most of the South's governors are moderates of one or another stripe, ranging from North Carolina's progressive Terry Sanford to Georgia's Carl Sanders, a law-and-order segregationist. Even Arkansas's Orval Faubus won his fifth term as the middle-roader in a field of six.

The erosion of farm-weighted election laws in the South under Federal court pressure is likely to accelerate the trend. It was the city vote—liberated by the courts from Georgia's old county-unit primary system—that plumped hardest for Sanders against former Gov. Marvin Griffin, who preached segregation with both cracker barrels. Even Ol' Marv thought defiance had its limits ("Being in jail kind of crimps a governor's style") but he had missed the real point. "Segregation," said one official with a surer instinct for survival, "is certainly not the issue it used to be."

Chipping Walls: Nor is it the inviolable faith it used to be. Negroes are swimming with whites in Durham, N.C., golfing with whites in Atlanta, going to movies with whites in Nashville, driving buses in Memphis. The pressure of Negro demonstrations—and the specter of Birmingham—are chipping the walls still more. Sometimes, where the climate is right, the rhetoric of change is explicitly moral. After a wave of demonstrations in Durham, N.C., Mayor R. Wense Grabarek—barely in office when the marching began—helped nudge through the desegregation of all the city's hotels, half its restaurants, and many of its downtown hiring offices. "I believe most of you will agree with me that the days of inaction are past," he said. "The time is here for us to re-examine our moral, social, and economic consciences."

Most often, however, appeals to conscience have proven less potent than appeals to pragmatic dollar-sense. When

Harold Moore-Durham Morning Herald

The new Dixie: Swimmers in Durham . . .

Gerald Holly-Nashville Tennessean

. . . moviegoers in Nashville . . .

Darrell Thompson

. . . and golfers on a public green in Atlanta

Atlanta's Chamber of Commerce came out for desegregation of all businesses serving the public, one official remarked: "The men who voted on that are not integrationists and they are not 'segs.' They are hardheaded businessmen." And Charles Grigg, a Florida State University sociologist who has studied biracial bargaining committees, concluded: "The trouble with getting professional civil-rights people in on these negotiations is that they always want to bring in brotherly love. And brotherly love has nothing to do with the terms of negotiation."

In that pragmatic spirit, white Birmingham businessmen—dealing mostly with Negro Birmingham businessmen—bartered a few grudging promises of token desegregation for peace. And after the Little Rock blowup, efforts to attract new industry ground to a standstill until after a moderate new school board had taken over, reopened the high schools Orval Faubus had closed, and quietly integrated them. "If the politicians would stay out of the act," said Everett Tucker Jr., the old-family segregationist businessman who heads the school board, "business leaders would solve the problem much quicker."

Most Southerners—even Southern moderates—seem sadly short on understanding of the meaning of the Negro's pursuit of that brightly feathered will-o'-the-wisp he calls freedom. "The Negro is making quite a push to prove some kind of point," an Atlanta industrialist who backed the Chamber of Commerce desegregation proposal told NEWSWEEK's Joseph Cumming. "I think the white man's reaction has been, 'Gee, we didn't realize'." Nor did the industrialist understand that the point might be more important to the Negroes than the privilege. "I don't believe they're going to eat in those restaurants in any great numbers," he said. "They're going back to turnip greens and pot liquor as soon as the people who brought the issue up have left town."

Moderates commonly complain that the Negro is pushing too hard, that he wants too much too soon, that progress would come in good time without pressure from Negroes or from Washington. "Nonsense," snorted publisher Ralph McGill, pacing his office at The Atlanta Constitution, hands jammed in his pockets and an unfinished column waiting in his typewriter. "There never has been any gain without Federal pressure or social and economic pressure."

Calculated Risk: If there is indeed a danger that pressure might alienate moderates, it is a risk the Negroes are prepared to take. Their leaders have felt a growing disaffection for the moderate, anyway, and they have come to regard his stock in trade—token integration—as little more than a subtler form of resistance.

The moderates are under even stiffer attack from the bitter-enders. While office girls stuffed envelopes and retailed lapel pins proclaiming NEVER (for 10 cents) in the anteroom outside, Mustache Bill Simmons, the éminence blanche of the Mississippi Citizens Councils, told a visitor last week: "The militancy of these demands makes the moderate position virtually untenable. It's all right when the Negroes talk in vague generalities about human dignity, rights, and all that stuff. But when they get bricks flying and a chanting mass streaming through the streets, it makes the liberals think." Yet, having won some concessions, the Negroes are unlikely to stop. "It's not human nature to be satisfied with half a loaf when you can get the whole loaf."

So militant whites—one Ole Miss professor calls them White Muslims—confidently watch the sparks of racial trouble flying about the North, waiting for a blowup that would bring the rest of the U.S. into step with them. "We're in a holding action," says Erle Johnston, director of Mississippi's anti-integration agitprop agency, the State Sovereignty Commission. "The more incidents that occur in the North, the more people begin to face the problem we have been facing, the more allies we get for a return to constitutional government." And Mississippi, at least, is dug in to await reinforcements. "The Federal government is going to have to take every inch of ground it gets in Mississippi," Johnston said.

With Wallace's own house divided in Alabama, Mississippi is indeed the last Southern state that belongs lock, stock, and statehouse to the bitter-enders. Of all the states of the Old Confederacy, Mississippi remains the poorest, the least urban, the most heavily populated with Negroes—and the most intransigent.

Bennie Knows: Despite Cleve McDowell's peaceful arrival last week, the Ole Miss explosion last fall had only hardened the lines. The Jackson Citizens Council—5,000 strong then—has logged in 1,000 new members since. The Sovereignty Commission cranked out a report praising the student rioters who "fought the enemy invaders barehanded, just as the Hungarians did when armed might was used to destroy them." In Mississippi, a candidate for lieutenant governor could—and did—sign on as a campaign worker the ex-cop, Bennie Oliver, who kicked a Negro demonstrator in a Jackson dime store two weeks ago—because Oliver "knows how to handle the racial problem."

"We don't have any moderates in Mississippi," a lawyer said, sipping black coffee in the den of his colonnaded Jackson home. "I don't think there's room for 'em."

Newsweek—Karl Fleming

Mustache Bill Simmons: The lapel pins said NEVER

That was one voice of a troubled South in a troubled season. George Wallace's—promising to call out the National Guard to "preserve the peace"—was another. And so was the anxious voice of a Raleigh, N.C., city judge—the voice of a South groping for answers.

Before Judge Pretlow Winborne were two young Negroes, arrested when they tried to sit in the white section of a segregated theater. The judge found them guilty of trespassing. But that didn't close the case.

"What they're really guilty of," he said, "is trying to be somebody, and who can deny them that right? When one sets about to do this, can it be done by intimidation, force, economic pressure? . . . No, never, it cannot be bought, nor can they be forced on somebody else.

"On the other side of the coin, the question could well be asked, where someone waits and desires earnestly to have respect, dignity, to live with esteem in his community, should not everything be done to give him that atmosphere . . . [in which] he can achieve his goals? If not, how does anyone expect him to achieve his goals?"

Judge Winborne paused.

"The answer is not here today," he said. "I wish to the Lord it were."

INDICTMENTS:

Hoffa Again

In his time, James Riddle Hoffa, boss of the Teamsters union, has beaten such raps as wiretapping and fraud. Even in Attorney General Robert Kennedy's time, he has been dented so far by nothing worse than a hung jury (on charges of taking payoffs from an employer) while the Justice Department has scored 69 convictions on 149 indictments of his Teamsters associates. But Hoffa, currently under indictment for jury tampering, was hit last week by yet another indictment—and there were indications that this was the one that Hoffa-hunting Bobby Kennedy had been waiting for.

The latest, 53 pages and 28 counts long, was returned by a Federal grand jury in Chicago. It charged that Hoffa and seven real estate developers had conspired to defraud the sprawling (200,000 members in 22 states), spiraling ($200 million) Central States Teamsters Pension Fund by misusing $20 million in loans for fourteen projects in six states from Florida to California.

The Teamsters boss himself was accused of "fraud, deceit, misrepresentation," and of "overreaching" as a trustee of the pension fund in order to obtain rubber-stamping of the loans by fifteen fellow trustees, none of whom were indicted. All the defendants were charged with having relieved the borrowers of cash, stock options, and stock as "finders fees" and with having diverted approximately $1 million worth of the fraudulent loans for their personal purposes.

The coast-to-coast investigation of Teamsters trust funds was begun the week Robert Kennedy took office in January 1961. To direct what became a team of six U.S. attorneys and twelve FBI legmen, he picked Charles Zellender Smith, 36, a slender, soft-spoken Negro attorney with a tested talent for coming up with hard facts. As deputy prosecutor for King County (Seattle) he had come up with enough of them to put Hoffa's predecessor, Dave Beck, in prison for embezzlement. Though a Republican, Smith passed the Kennedy test: "He's good and we want him."

Reappraising Files: After following the trail to Chicago, Special Attorney Smith set up shop last August in a dingy, three-room office a few blocks from the city's Federal building. Within a week he put out dozens of subpoenas and ordered cartons of records lugged into the grand jury. Among them were some intriguing files from Real Estate Research Corp., Chicago's leading appraisal firm and adviser on the free-wheeling deals favored by trustees of the truckers' fund.

With such research, Smith was able to convince the grand jury that Hoffa and his co-defendants had repeatedly misrepresented the facts in making loan applications—in person, on the phone, or in writing—and always with the object of milking the fund of enough to take some cream off the top.

Among the instances of alleged hornswoggling which are richly detailed in the indictment:

▶Hoffa allegedly told Real Estate Research that $750,000 in debentures had been sold to raise money for North Miami General Hospital and that sponsors of the project had $200,000 in cash. He was accused of telling fund trustees that $500,000 had been spent adding a floor to the hospital and that Dade County had agreed to match any Teamsters loan. The fund approved a $2 million loan, but the government charged: no debentures sold, no cash, no new floor, no agreement.

▶A $3.3 million loan was made to First Berkeley Corp., New York, after fund trustees were told it had a net worth of $3.6 million. The government contended the corporation was worth less than $5,000. When the company was negotiating purchase of some buildings in Los Angeles, trustees were told the properties had been appraised at $4.2 million. No such appraisal was ever made, according to the government.

The indictment also accused Hoffa of diverting $100,000 from loans to extricate himself from the wreckage of the "Teamsters' model city of tomorrow," in Sun Valley, Fla. The head-on crash of this idyllic retirement project resulted in a Federal fraud indictment against him—a case that has been dropped because aspects of it are "necessarily embodied" in the indictment returned in Chicago.

Hoffa, who may well be developing a prosecution complex, got the news of the government's latest blast while planning to fly to Nashville for arraignment this week on charges of tampering with the hung jury in the extortion case in which he faces a retrial. His reaction, according to one of his lawyers: "He says he doesn't understand it. He's absolutely at a loss." What he stands to lose if convicted on the 28 counts of the Chicago indictment is $37,000 in fines and 140 years of his time in jail.

UPI

Old Ironsides: As tugs maneuvered the 166-year-old U.S.S. Constitution at her Boston pier she sailed into a squall. Sen. Edward Kennedy wanted her at the New York World's Fair to do more for Massachusetts tourism; Bostonians feared she'd founder. Kennedy promised: "No storm will sink her, no New York pirate will steal her."

SUPREME COURT:

Stormy Water

"The present case . . . will, I think, be marked as the baldest attempt by judges in modern times to spin their own philosophy into the fabric of the law, in derogation of the will of the legislature."

The biting words spoken against the U.S. Supreme Court last week came not from a last-ditch states' righter but from liberal Justice William O. Douglas in his dissent from the majority in the Colorado River water-rights case. What's more, his bitter language was directed against his long-time associate and legal ally on the Court, Hugo L. Black, who wrote the opinion upholding Arizona's rights over California's.

For some 40 years, California and Arizona have been squabbling over the

EMMET JOHN HUGHES

Letter to a Governor

Gov. George C. Wallace
The State House
Montgomery, Ala.

Sir:

You are right about a couple of things.

You are right that the North abounds in "citadels of hypocrisy." You can point to a New York, racially supposed to be quite an "open city"—with no less than 117 city schools whose 90 per cent Negro and Puerto Rican enrollments proclaim de facto segregation, as the whites quicken their flight to suburban racial shelters. You can point, too, to those lily-white labor unions whose leaders prate liberalism but practice discrimination. You can point to national unemployment statistics measuring the impact of automation—with a Negro jobless rate double the white—and forcing many a Negro to eye the machine as his most modern and ingenious foe.

You are right that the Negroes have broken, with regrettable success, at least one white monopoly: the preachment of racism. And even apart from raging Black Muslims, you might slyly cite—in your own defense—an occasional, inflamed Negro lament, as when a James Baldwin cries: "There's no difference between the North and South. There's just a difference in the way they castrate you."

You would be right, too, if you blandly noted that the Federal government prepared for the racial storm with little more than a policy of waiting-for-the-dust-to-rise.

You are, in these few things, right—partly.

You are, in all else, wrong—preposterously and destructively.

You are wrong about the law.

You castigated the Federal courts as "lousy" and "irresponsible." They wholly lack, in your elegant language, "the legal brains to try a chicken thief." So you have proven your superior competence by issuing the laughable judgment: "I am the law."

You are wrong—almost blasphemously—about freedom.

You insist that nothing around you threatens to "destroy" freedom but "the omnipotent march" of Federal power. In your neighbor-state of Mississippi, you discern no menace to freedom as Negroes are bombed, clubbed, or herded in garbage trucks to hog-wire enclosures. In your own state, your obstinate defiance alone summons the very Federal power you profess to dread.

You are wrong—willfully—about the South.

As for the Negro South, you etch in fantasy, as a model for the nation and a sanctuary for the black man, the "little country town" of Alabama—even though Negro emigration from this bucolic paradise has sped on so that nearly half the nation's 19 million Negroes now live outside the South. As for the white South, you recently ventured a remarkable observation: "There's a lot of prejudice and bias against us Southerners." To decry such uncharitable feelings in Negro voters or other critics in the North appears roughly as rational as to accuse Jews of showing "bias" toward anti-Semites.

You are wrong—most pathetically—when judged just by your own aims.

Yours is a stubborn, tedious exercise in self-defeat. You decry Communism, grieving that American Communists are "using" Negroes. The grief is wholly misdirected: it is the whites of Alabama who are being used—literally and rejoicingly—by Communist propaganda the world over. You denounce compromise on integration: "There isn't any middle of the road. You're either for it or against it." And so you state the case of Negro leaders for whom all appeals to "gradualism" and "tokenism" have become unbearable affronts. The only genius of your hate is to liven what you would kill.

And all this achieves the ultimate fantasy—the vision of yourself, gallantly alone, beating back the onrushing, outnumbering horde. You are wrong again. You are not alone. You are not even unusual. You belong to an old and populous breed: the race of men from all continents and all ages who imagine that the way to master reality is to defy it.

You are a French colon, incongruously moved from Algeria to Alabama. You are an Arab traditionalist, incredulously agape at the sight of Israel. You are an aged Tory imperialist, still blinking over the puzzle of how India got free.

There is a saving difference, however, for the American South. Your own state can give birth to a jurist who warmly confesses that "I love the people of Alabama," even as he admonishes you: "No legalistic formula is required to express the craving of honest, hard-working, God-fearing citizens for a moral order logically supported—an attitude long ago expressed when Coke informed King James that there was a law above the king." Your own South retains its historic power, unimpaired by your folly, to give birth to men of greatness. And these are the men who can earn the thanks of their nation as they strive to lead—not lacerate—the forces of change and the hopes of freedom.

R+R Rel.

FROM: OFFICE OF COMMUNICATION
UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST
Fisk University
Nashville, Tennessee

June 24, 1963

- By John H. McCray -

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE -- As Congress prepared its expected battle over President Kennedy's newest Civil Rights proposals, and state and local governments and leaders stirred feverishly to temper an unprecedented rash of racial disorders, some 200 of the nation's top sociologists and race relations leaders went coolly about the business of beginning their annual institute on race relations Monday, at Fisk University.

The group, together with the listed 27 consultants - respectfully dubbed "sociological eggheads", the ablest and brainest, in their fields opened the 20th Annual Race Relations Institute sponsored by the Board of Home Ministries of the United Church of Christ, and directed by the Race Relations Department of the American Missionary Association. The Institute, founded by the late Dr. Charles S. Johnson - a foremost scholar and sociologist - is directed by his successor, Dr. Herman H. Long, who heads the Race Relations Department.

Running for two weeks, the Institute has this general purpose, Dr. Long explains:

". . . to orientate leaders of local cummunities in the problems, process and methods of implementing better intergroup relations. It endeavors to assess the status of current developments, provide authoritative information on the psychological, sociological, political, economic and religious aspects of intergroup problems, and to evaluate techniques and strategies."

While some participants are from as far west as Hawaii, most come from the 30 states of the eastern half of the United States and the District of Columbia, and are employed by either public or private agencies. They attend daily sessions that are loaded to the hilt on a multitude of subject areas: Religious and moral implications of Human Rights, international implications of domestic race relations, psychological and historical aspects of the racial and cultural backdrop, problems in employment, housing, federal action in implementation of equal rights.

Consultants, about equally divided in number between whites and non-whites, conduct lectures, workshops, seminars and various clinics, replete with audio-visual aids and, with the dispassion of a physician prescribing aspirins for his patient's headache. Participants - the racially mixed audience - scribble notes, quizz consultants and engage other associates in debates from the floor and, exchange ideas and experiences. Out of all of this develops a formula on methods and techniques for use back on the homefront. Methods and techniques are revised yearly to fit the newer problems which appear characteristic of the human relations field.

The Fisk University Race Relations Institute is generally conceded to be the best staffed and equipped in the world, and is operated on a professional, rather than emotional or partisan, basis. Its stature, influence is reflected in the number of topflight staff members of President Kennedy's administration who are serving as consultant and source persons in several categories. Presidential Assistant and former Arkansas Congressman Brook Hays gave the opening night speech. John Doar, Assistant Attorney General, headed the Institute's list of legal consultants. Clarence C. Ferguson, Jr., general counsel of the Civil Rights Commission, Hobart Taylor, Jr., executive vice chairman of the President's Committee on Equal Job Opportunities, and Hubert M. Jackson and Albert L. Thompson, both of FHA's Intergroup Relations Division, comprised other federal consultants listed.

Dr. Max Wolf and Elliott Shirk, respectively of the Departments of Labor for New York and Pennsylvania, several professors and directors of state agencies and regional organizations are scheduled to lead group discussions during the Institute.

Other minority groups are being represented by consultants from the American Jewish Committee, the American Indian Center, Puerto Ricans, while the NAACP and Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the Southern Regional Council, the Anti-Defamation League and the Catholic Interracial Council furnish resource persons who specialize either in Negro approach to racial problems or, the interracial approach.

The Nation, 6/29/63

fication for high office. A depressing aspect of the partial break-up of the British class system after the Second World War was that the values remained the same; a few more people were simply allowed to qualify for leadership. But the Profumo case questions these values. He was obviously no more fitted for leadership than thousands without his qualifications.

Perhaps the case has taken the British a little nearer to judging a man for what he is rather than what he seems to be. We say "perhaps" because a great attempt is being made to obscure the whole affair in a cold-war smoke screen. The fact that Miss Keeler also knew a Soviet Embassy official obviously needs investigating, but it is a minor matter compared to the morality of British public life. Unfortunately, the Labour Party seems to think this security risk a better angle from which to attack the Tories. If so, this can only mean that many of the younger Labour leaders have accepted the dominant values because they, too, have acquired the same kind of qualifications as Profumo. The end of the affair is yet to come, but it has already been epitomized fairly well by Jack Andrews, a London truck driver interviewed by The Wall Street Journal. "Macmillan and the rest of the Tories should start raising daffodils," said Mr. Andrews, "and let somebody else run the government." But the fellow probably votes Labour anyway.

Highways to Profit

Rapid transit by rail, the only common-sense solution to the traffic paralysis attacking our streets and highways, got a big boost from San Franciscans last April when they approved a $792 million bond issue for a seventy-five-mile rail-construction project. Other cities are moving in the same direction. The transit agency in Washington, D.C., has recommended that rail transit be substituted for a projected highway-expansion program. Approved by the Senate, and now before the House, is a $500 million bill to aid urban mass transit (see "Rapid Transit: the Neglected Highway," by Senator Harrison A Williams, The Nation, May 4). These preparatory steps have already served a useful purpose by smoking out the opposition. For years Congress has been told by sundry patriotic lobbyists that any action tending to restrict highway construction endangered the national security. Tanks need highways, they said; guns need highways; the GI needs highways. But now, with the San Francisco development and the threat of a federal rapid-transit bill hanging over them, the lobbyists are coming to the point. The executive vice president of the American Road Builders Association recently warned of the harm which "talk of a revival of rapid transit" would do to the highway program. At a convention of road builders in Chicago, Commerce Secretary Hodges was urged to title his address: "Trends Threatening Highway Development in America through Curtailed Motor-Vehicle Use." An office of the Automobile Manufacturers Association declared that the real danger for cities was not too much traffic, but too little — and the decline in property values if highway needs are neglected.

The point at issue would seem to be not national security, but the profits security of the road-construction and auto industries.

Freedom Now — But What Then?

REER

Loren Miller

Within the foreseeable future, eighteen million Negroes will burst the bonds of almost two centuries of isolation and surge into the mainstream of American life. Talents and energies now siphoned off into an all-consuming struggle against racial restrictions will be freed for application to man's fundamental problems. Moreover, the coming of that good day will end the enormous expenditures of human and economic resources long frittered away in the futile effort to preserve the segregation system. They, too, will become available for useful social purposes. However, it would be a mistake to assume that these profound changes will automatically usher in a society that will make full and effective use of these new potentials for social progress. We know better. Once before, almost a hundred years ago, a similar promise lighted up the American scene and was snuffed out after a decade of uncertain flickering.

In retrospect, it is apparent that one of the contributing factors to the failure of Reconstruction to sustain a hastily improvised political democracy in the South was lack of foresight and absence of planning for what lay beyond Emancipation. There were no guide lines for those who undertook the task of constructing a new social order to replace the old, which was swept away when two and a half million former slaves and a half-million disadvantaged free Negroes were incorporated into the American body politic. Everybody hoped for the best; nobody planned for it.

Abolitionists had glued their eyes on the destruction of slavery as an end in itself and, immersed as they were in the doctrine of the natural rights of man, they pitched their hopes for the best on a vague belief that individual merit would triumph in a society of free and freed men. Slaveholders had caught no vision because they could not admit the possibility that their peculiar institution could ever pass away; confronted with the reality, they were more than content to replace the old stratified order with another. Bedazzled by the glitter of white supremacy, poor whites were blind to the opportunity to make common cause with Negroes for an assault on common problems.

Loren Miller, Los Angeles civil-rights attorney, is a vice president of the NAACP and publisher of the California Eagle, one of the country's oldest Negro newspapers. His article, "Farewell to Liberals" (The Nation, Oct. 20, 1962), aroused widespread interest.

The Republican Party stumbled into civil war with no design for Emancipation and consequently no blueprint for the problems inherent in victory. In an effort to supply Republican deficiency, Charles Sumner and Thaddeus Stevens prodded their party into enactment of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, but it fell under corporate leadership which quickly swapped the shaky democracy that had been created for the privilege of pursuing its own selfish ends. [See Walter Burnham's article, p. 545.] A new social order based on total exclusion of the Negro from political affairs, and his pursuant isolation, grew Topsy-like out of confusion. The history of race relations since that time has been the story of efforts to conserve and implement the Negro's isolation by the myriad devices of the segregation system and the complementary struggle of the Negro to batter down the walls of his Jim Crow prison.

The walls are tumbling down now and it is disturbing to find that we are ill prepared for the new Reconstruction that must be undertaken when—no longer if—the segregation system topples and the nation again faces the task of incorporating Negroes, eighteen millions of them this time, into an American body politic in all ways infinitely more complicated than that of 1865. It may seem to the outsider that the segregation system is a peculiarly Southern institution. Negroes know better. Its overt Northern manifestations are seen in the massive ghettos of Northern urban complexes and in the segregated public facilities they spawn. But there is more to segregation than that. Its spirit is all-pervasive and where it does not separate, it isolates to breed frustration, hopelessness, despair and hostility. Today's unpreparedness, akin to that of a hundred years ago, stems from the fact that intensive preoccupation with immediate and galling racial problems has minimized, almost precluded, consideration of what lies beyond victory. Attainment of civil rights, like Emancipation, has become almost an end in itself.

Like their Abolitionist forebears, civil-rights proponents, traditionally led by the NAACP which now shares leadership with Martin Luther King, CORE and the student movements, have been single-minded in outlook: Destruction of the Jim Crow system is their one aim. Segregationist heirs of the slaveholders cannot, or will not, admit that their order is done for; they content themselves with yelling "never" at the top of their voices. Liberals gave their hearts to gradualism a decade ago and implicitly decided then that their notion of the future was the incorporation of the Negro in an evolving society on a pragmatic, step-by-step basis. The Democratic Party which, by a strange and ironic reversal of roles, has fumbled its way into whatever there is of party leadership of the liberation movement, cannot blueprint an integrated commonwealth because its composition compels it to deny that it envisages such a development. Lying at the back of everybody's mind has been the tacit assumption that there was plenty of time to plan for the future. Nobody had foreseen the explosion of the past few years.

Birmingham brought the revolution to sudden climax. Why, nobody knows. Maybe it was the dogs, maybe singing school children trooping into Bull Connor's paddy wagons, or maybe the completely symbolic picture of the white cop with his foot on a Negro woman's neck. Anyhow, in the expressive Negro idiom, we have run fresh out of time. The future is upon us. And with victory in sight and inevitable, we are confronted with the searching question of where we go from here. In essence, the inquiry is whether civil-rights victory is an end in itself or only a beginning, a means to an end. At the moment, Negroes, whose answer is all-important and perhaps decisive, seem to regard it as an end. The slogans under which they march are limited in scope. The Freedom Now concept contemplates putting the submerged Southern Negro or the trapped Northern ghetto-dweller on a parity with his culturally deprived and disadvantaged white prototype. Fair housing and fair employment laws are designed to give the Negro equal access to existent supplies of housing and jobs, but fall short of coming to grips with the fact that vast reforms are necessary to provide an adequate supply of housing, and to stay the ravages of automation in those very categories in which Negroes must seek employment. The examples could be extended. This appraisal does not disparage Negro demands; they are valid and necessary tactical weapons in the struggle for equality. But as Whitney Young, National Urban League director, points out: "There are forces at work such as automation, urbanization and a host of others that, on the surface, are indifferent to race, which unless identified and remedial steps taken will find the masses of Negroes five years from today with a mouthful of rights living in hovels with empty stomachs."

White Americans also tend to regard attainment of civil rights as an end in itself when they talk about denials of such rights as being harmful to our international image, or by what they say about equalitarian housing and employment legislation, or even when they argue, as President Kennedy did recently, that Negroes should be secure in their constitutional privileges because it is morally right that they should enjoy them. Again, these views are valid as far as they go, but they neglect the fact that when the prisoner is freed, the jailer is given his liberty. Both may put their newly found freedom to good use by tackling the problem that made one of them prisoner and the other jailer in the first place. A quick glance will demonstrate how the denial of civil rights has affected, and still affects, the national welfare.

There are no ifs in history and we can never know who would have been elected to the Presidency, to state legislatures or to Congress in the past three-quarters of a century if the Negro had not been deprived of the ballot. We do know that isolation of Negroes bred the one-party system of the South and that, in turn, it isolated that section from the rest of the nation to the detriment of poor whites. Coincidentally, the one-party system aggrandized Southern Congressional power and gave Southerners their present life-and-death control over federal legislation. President Kennedy has complained that he is immobilized by Southern control of the House Rules Committee. Critical urban problems, federal aid to education, and housing issues, to pick a few examples, go unattended by Congress because their resolution will not fit a formula acceptable to the white South. We also know that labor organizations, agrarian-reform movements, trade and professional organizations, even service clubs, and the whole vast array of voluntary groups which play such a vital role in public affairs, have had to tailor their programs to suit the irrational demands of the segregation system.

The nub of the matter is that the existence of an unassimilated, and by definition unassimilable, racial group has had, and still has, telling consequences for the nation. Americans have lived with this fragmentation so long, and it seems so natural to them, that they assume its permanence and reckon that if they extend full civil rights to the Negro component, and stop right there, they will have settled the issue. On this reckoning rests the widely held assumption that civil rights is an end in itself.

Of course, attainment of civil rights and the wiping out of all racial disabilities would produce immense satisfaction among Negroes and, by the same token, would exert a considerable influence on national life. The Negro bloc would at once become a powerful pressure group, demanding and getting concessions on all sides. Negroes would attend better schools. The Negro relief recipient would get his fair share of the dole. The Negro market for gray flannel suits would be enhanced. Jobs would be shared and in time the Negro unemployment rate would be lowered to that of the national average. An elite would be created within the Negro pressure group to seek its own ends, sometimes at the expense of other Negroes. Something of that kind has already happened in the comparatively free Northern cities, with not a few middle-class Negroes staking out vested interests in the ghettos and retiring from the civil-rights fight with the feeling that all is well. In any event, the Negro racial bloc is going to persist for a long time to come and will inevitably function as a pressure center. The temptation to preserve and enhance that function will be great, with the conservatives of the middle class pulling in that direction; they are experts in the art of pressure and can be expected to hold fast to a familiar tactic. The gaping wounds of racial conflict can be healed within that context and Negroes have been forced to think in terms of race so long that it will be hard for them to lift their sights.

If, however, civil-rights victory is regarded as only a beginning and a means, and the end envisaged is that of reforms that will cure the social, economic and political malfunctioning in our society that results in poverty, old-age insecurity, disemployment, lack of educational opportunity and other social plagues, the long-term yield to Negroes will be enlarged—provided, of course, that those ends can be attained. Freedom Now will be a more desirable prize if the model's freedom approaches completeness. Fair housing and fair-employment laws will become more meaningful if housing is in complete supply and within common economic reach, and if there is job security for all. In short, the enrichment of American life promises added rewards to all who are permitted to share in it. The Negro's quest for civil rights has always been two-pronged: The human desire to be treated as a man and the economic drive to get his fair share of what the nation has had to offer.

Ben Roth Agency

There is a ferment at work within the Negro community, North as well as South, which pretty well precludes the possibility that Negroes will stop short with civil-rights victory. The new militants who are emergent in terms of leadership are in revolt against the old in the Negro community as well as the old in white society. They are equalitarian in outlook and philosophy and where they now, correctly, see race as the prime inhibiting factor, they will learn soon enough that their civil-rights victory will not be complete without lowering of other barriers that produce inequities and inequalities. And as in the case of Alexander, the young always yearn for new worlds to conquer.

Perception on the part of Negroes that attainment of civil rights must be regarded as a means rather than an end will not solve the problem that confronts the nation. Whites must grasp and apply that lesson as well, but they must do it with their eyes wide open to the fact that Negroes have had their bellies full of paternalism and will have no more of it and that the Negro take-over of the civil-rights movement, no matter what shape it assumes, is permanent and will not be relinquished. However, whites must take the initiative in an offer of alliance and must have more to offer than is presently visible. At the moment, the American scene is singularly devoid of movements calculated to quicken the pulse of the bold and imaginative youngsters who triggered the national upheaval against racial discrimination and pulled the props from under the segregation system. Communism is a deservedly dead letter. Barry Goldwater's invitation for a retreat to the 1920s holds no allure and the cautious pragmatism of the New Frontier smacks too much of an application of gradualism to be attractive. The bogged-down labor movement has lost the verve that set Negroes flocking to its standard in the New Deal era. Who then shall sound the certain trumpet? The answer is that nobody knows. What is certain is that civil-rights victory will release a determined band of restless and eager Negro youth whose energies ought to be channeled constructively.

That constructive purpose can best be served by a broad political movement, in the widest sense of that term, comprehensive of pressing domestic and international issues. Whether such a movement can function within the formalism of our present two-party system is not clear. That will have to be determined on a trial-and-error basis. Negro militants who must be enlisted if such a movement is to succeed are understandably chary about political action at the moment. Their success has been won outside of politics and they are cynical about political action in light of the manner in which civil rights has been used as a football by both parties. But time itself will drive home the lesson that problems entailed in incorporating Negroes into our tremendously complicated social and economic structure are political in nature and will propel the new militants into political action. There is no other road to reform in a political democracy.

Obviously, the nation can, and should, use the imagination that conceived the sit-ins, the pray-ins, the wade-ins and the Freedom Rides for application to other social purposes. And it needs to conserve and utilize the boldness and courage that led to the confrontations in hostile Southern cities. We can ill afford to waste these talents at a time when we desperately need new and creative approaches to both domestic and international issues. Incorporated and utilized to the fullest in a political movement of broad scope and purpose, they can hasten needed reforms; isolated in a racial pressure bloc, they may only broaden old schisms. That the nation needs to make full and effective use of these new potentials for social progress is not open to debate.

We are back where we began. The nation has been given a second chance to solve the problem that Abraham Lincoln proclaimed with Emancipation a hundred years ago: that of constructing a social order to replace an old one swept away when Negroes burst out of isolation and sought admission to the American body politic. We muffed the first chance and consigned Negroes to a new, and in some ways more galling, isolation, and in the process shackled the nation to the hobbled Negro. That first failure has haunted us ever since. Its consequences have become intolerable. We will achieve only half-success this time if we settle back and accept civil-rights victory as an end in itself. Foresight and planning can transmute that victory into a means for construction of a commonwealth as good as imperfect humans can build.

Truth in Packaging . . . . . Senator Philip A. Hart

Almost every new law passed by Congress reflects—however tardily—some change in American culture, population or economic structure. The Truth in Packaging bill (S387), which I have introduced in the Senate and on which hearings have been concluded only recently, deals with the remarkable changes in the market place that began when pushcarts started to outnumber grocers.

Basically, the bill is designed to permit rational purchases in the supermarket aisle and it is written as an amendment to the Clayton Act—that venerable antitrust law that has now nearly reached its fiftieth birthday.

Unamended, the Clayton Act is like last year's trousers on a growing boy. It still serves to cover and protect certain sensitive parts of the nation's anatomy, but there is a wealth of bare ankle showing beneath the cuffs. The act assumes, for example, that if two competitive products are equal in service and quality, then the only remaining competitive factor is price. It makes no allowances for the new areas of non-price competition that have developed in the market place. And, certainly, packaging is one of them.

Senator Philip A. Hart (D., Mich.) is a member of the Commerce and Judiciary Committees of the U.S. Senate.

This can best be explained by tracing the evolution of the corner grocery into modern supermarkets so remarkably efficient that they can offer the housewife significant savings while simultaneously picking her pocket.

At this point, there invariably bobs into my mind (and usually into my narrative) the grocery store only a block from the house where I grew up. The owner's name—Mr. Edie—I remember quite clearly, though his face has been refracted by time and glimmers only dimly from the depth of thirty-five years. My mother chose Mr. Edie only after several weeks of tentative dealing, during which she carefully took the temperature of his integrity and price policy. That having been established, even I could be trusted to make the store trips.

Besides cash, all that was necessary to the purchase was a brown paper bag and the assurance that Mr. Edie would be there the next day in case an orange was missing or a clay bean turned up in the soup. The relationship, in short, was a very personal one. Mr. Edie provided both sales and service. Most of the packages you took home were ones that Mr. Edie had filled himself out of his bins of sugar, beans and cookies. There was no nonsense about weight or volume, either. Products came in pints, pounds or pecks. There were no fractional ounces, no "giant half-quarts," and you could tell at a glance how prices compared with those in the store down the street.

This, admittedly, is nostalgic, but believe me it is not wistful. The neighborhood grocery has given way to the supermarket for some very sound economic reasons.

First of all, the supermarket principle of fast turnover has grown hand in hand with the practice of pre-packaging. And the factory-built package has permitted mass distribution with resultant lowered costs.

Of course, pre-packaging has a number of disadvantages, too:

1. It deprives the consumer of an opportunity to examine the product.
2. It makes price and product comparisons difficult.
3. It makes it virtually impossible for the retailer to guarantee the product on any personal basis.
4. It tends to conceal price increases by encouraging manufacturers to "cut weight" instead of "hiking price" and invites competitive use of non-standard and sometimes deceptive package shapes.
5. It encourages the "cents-off" deals that are often fictitious.

In fact, the whole operative

R & R Rel

6/29/63

John Junior

Not long ago I heard a public speaker declare, in elegant language and diction, that the Negro's equality would be coming in due time if only he'd be satisfied for now with the separate-but-equal doctrine. He went on to say that Southern white people were being maligned when, actually, they love the Negro and want to see him happy (in different schools, colleges, movie palaces, restaurants, churches and rest rooms). The gentleman spoke in the semi-hypnotic tone of an evangelist in possession of a final, unalterable truth. And I must concede his adroitness in the use of ringing phrases: Time Honored Custom, Paternal Love, Sovereign Rights and Equality-through-Evolution. There may have been more; if so, I missed it because I was thinking about John Junior.

John Junior and I were teenagers together in the late '30s when his father, Big John, worked for my father as a straw boss and loader of oranges into railroad cars. John Junior often came to the packing plant, as any youngster does, to be near his Daddy. Sometimes he brought a book with him and read it while perched on the loading platform dangling his legs over a side track of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company.

Occasionally I talked with John Junior; or, rather, I tried to. He, after all, was the straw boss's boy, I the son of the white bossman. I went to the white high school, he to the colored one across town. Each of us liked football but cheered different teams, he the all-colored Trojans, I the all-white Yellow Jackets. We had in common not one teacher, one pal, one neighbor, one pastor; not even a shared enemy. We swapped, at best, friendly half-embarrassed signals – a smile, a platitude or two. The one topic John Junior and I actually did share was the weather; somehow the Almighty had overlooked providing separate-but-equal rains, temperatures or lightning bolts.

A quarter-century ago, in 1938, I went away to college and learned, on coming home for the first vacation, that John Junior was making a fine school record and wanted to go on to college. It was something very few colored boys in Florida dared hope for in those days. But the boy's daddy, Big John, was more than a straw boss and boxcar loader; he was a preacher, too. The extra earnings might, just might, give John Junior that chance if he made up his mind to work hard and earn some of the money, too. Knowing John Junior's fondness for writing, I saved and passed along to him my college textbooks in English and journalism. The books were sent to him through Big John, because there still was between John Junior and me a barrier as real as a brick wall: notaingness in common. We were a mile or so apart, bounded, then and now, by a frontier known as Canal Street, whites to the west, coloreds to the east; two nations which didn't communicate and seemed not to know how. So I sent the books across the frontier by Big John. Handing them personally to John Junior would have been painful. The gift was from the white boss's son, a boy who had built-in status, assured by the pigmentation of his skin. Try to be friendly and I'd seem only patronizing; at least, that's how I felt.

That was the time, so I believe now, when a tiny spark of something-or-other lodged itself in my psyche. Maybe it was what the public speaker was calling True Social Conscience. The System was there, consecrated by custom and seemingly cemented by common acceptance, but that something-or-other kept whispering that the System wasn't what it ought to be. Even so, I had in those days matters of real importance to consider, such as my 1928 Essex coach, girls, baseball, parties and vacation. Sure I liked John Junior, and I think he liked me, and it was too damned bad the way things were. But since things were that way, why brood? Especially when the brakes of my car had sprung an oil leak that I had somehow to get fixed. He and I remained friends at the precise distance the System decreed.

John Junior might well be a patchwork character, pieced together from fragments of many Negro young people I knew in those separate-but-equal days of growing up. But he's not. He's Dr. John Rembert Jr., president of Gibbs College in St. Petersburg, Florida, with a doctorate and about all the other educational honors that could come his way.

Today, it would seem, the barrier ought to come crashing down, at least as far as we are concerned. John Junior and I are equals now, except that, in some fields, he is equaller than I am. Certainly we could meet and talk as equals, only there still isn't much to talk about. Canal Street has been widened and resurfaced and dotted with new buildings, but it is still there. The signs are up, White Men, Colored Men, White Women, Colored Women, The Management Reserves the Right. . . . Two nations, neither hostile nor friendly, coexist side by side, still without a common language. So I must continue to exchange with him the same despairing signals, knowing deep down that John Junior and I have in common only the weather, which the Almighty sees fit to administer on a non-segregated basis, very much as He did in 1938. The public speaker must have had somebody in mind when he painted his word-picture of love, harmony and equality-to-come. But he wasn't talking about anybody I know, on either side of Canal Street.

EMMETT PETER, JR.

BEST COPY AVAILABLE

R & R Relations

CURRENT JUNE-1963

RACISM IN THE UNITED STATES

In the spring of 1963, man's relations to man, when the men were of different color, became increasingly strained throughout the United States and especially in its South. Organized Negro nonviolent action became more militant; the threat of uncontrolled violent action grew stronger. Violence could be temporarily suppressed by sending the U.S. Army into the states where it erupted; but the frustrations of the search for long-term solutions were emphasized by the U.S. Civil Rights Commission which proposed consideration of withdrawal of federal funds from Mississippi.

HOW ARE NEGROES RESPONDING?

The leader of the nonviolent movement:

Martin Luther King, Jr.

"Three simple words can describe the nature of the social revolution that is taking place and what Negroes really want. They are the words 'all,' 'now,' and 'here.'" (New York Herald Tribune, May 2, 1963)

A roundup in a weekly newsmagazine:

Newsweek

"In Greenwood, Miss., an NAACP executive from New York brought the message to a cheering voter-registration rally in red-brick Turner's Chapel: 'Any time one of these white men tries to insinuate that he's superior to you, stand up on your hind legs and spit in his face.'

"In New York, a young Negro student leader, on furlough from the civil rights battlegrounds of the South, smiled fleetingly at a white acquaintance. 'Sure I love my white brother,' he said. 'But I watch him.'

"In Detroit, a Negro newspaperman worried aloud: 'That look-how-much-we've-gained-in-the-last-fifty-years stuff—that sours on the young Negro's stomach . . . We're going to see violence.'

"On a sprawling Mississippi cotton plantation, a hollow-eyed Negro fieldhand sat under a naked lightbulb in his four-room shack and catalogued his assets: $1 in his jeans, no more than $10 coming on payday, only three beds for his eleven children, a diet so spare that the youngsters get milk only at school. Given one wish, what would he ask? His quick reply: 'Freedom.'

"Across the nation, such voices were abroad—the voices of the increasingly restless and militant mood of the American Negro. To many white Americans, the face was unfamiliar—disquietingly so. But the shift in temper had been long in the making, bound up historically with World War II, the Supreme Court desegregation ruling of 1954, and the emergence of Black Africa. Negro leaders, who tuned in long ago, smile at the discovery of yet another 'New Negro.' One said: 'You never asked us.' Now, the Negro no longer waits to be asked. Increasingly, he says out loud what he has been whispering in the family for years.

"The Negro's message:

"He is impatient—'fed up with Jim Crow,' says James Farmer, executive secretary of the Congress of Racial Equality, 'and fed up with waiting.' Ironically, every inch of progress has intensified his hunger for a yard more. 'There has been more progress since 1954 than in the previous fifty years,' Howard Zinn, a white professor at Atlanta's Negro Spelman College, says. 'But, while progress doubled, expectation increased fifty times.'

"He is more aggressive in his fight for equality. He will march against police dogs and cops and the certainty of jail in Greenwood, Miss., or Birmingham, Ala. For such abstractions as the ballot, he is willing in increasing numbers to gamble his livelihood and even his life. One leader said: 'He simply doesn't give a damn what happens any more.'

"He has shown new stirring of racial pride, spurred partly by his own achievements at home, partly by the rise of the new African nations. The chauvinist Black Muslims have encouraged him, but so have militant integrationists. 'For too long, we have been ashamed of our flat lips and broad nose,' says James Forman, executive secretary of the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee (and himself a pecan-hued man with almost Caucasian features). 'I like [the word] black. I like to use it. It's an attempt to have some identity. It . . . [tells] the white man, "what you used to call me is no longer a symbol of inferiority." To do this is to have an inner security.'

"He is ambivalent about whites, sometimes hopeful, sometimes doubtful, sometimes resentful, sometimes openly hostile. The view that white men are devils is neither a Muslim creation nor a Muslim monopoly. James Baldwin, the Negro essayist and novelist who is the intellectual voice of his generation, found the war years a turning point among Negroes. 'To put it briefly, and somewhat too simply,' he writes, 'a certain hope died, a certain respect for white Americans faded. One began to pity them, or to hate them.'

"His mood is freighted with dynamite. His leaders worry about the durability of his commitment to nonviolent action. 'The danger is,' a white Atlanta civil rights worker says, 'that Negroes may conclude that there is nothing so persuasive as a mouthful of knuckles.'

" 'There go my people,' Gandhi said in a remark much cherished by his American disciple, Martin Luther King, Jr. 'I must catch them, for I am their leader.' Negro leaders have indeed been forced to keep up with this shift in mood. But they have also found the increasing militancy a useful talking point. On fund-raising missions to corporate boards, Whitney Young, Jr., executive director of the National Urban League, poses these alternatives: invest in positive assistance—or risk hostility and growing strength for the Muslims, along with rising crime rates and higher welfare costs. 'We were able to increase our budget,' said Young, 'from $270,000 in 1961 to $722,000 last year.'

The rise of xenophobia

"The shift also has injected a tougher and sometimes more nationalistic tone into the civil rights debate, stiffening the Negro leader's posture—and, sadly, constricting his lines of communication with whites as well. Rep. Adam Clayton Powell, the longtime political lightning rod of Harlem, spoke in just such tones for a purge of whites from top executive positions in the NAACP. Negroes, he argued, must wage their own fight: 'We are prisoners. How can we expect our jailkeeper to give us freedom?' The NAACP has, in fact, been venturing more and more out of its accustomed arena—the courts—into direct action campaigns in the South. Nonetheless, it felt constrained to answer Powell in a pamphlet defending its own credentials and questioning Powell's in a title borrowed from Genesis 3:9: 'And the Lord God called unto Adam, and said unto him, Where art thou?' [Available through Readers Service]

"In the new atmosphere of militance, orthodox civil rights leaders no longer dismiss the Muslims, whom they regarded little more than a year ago as not quite respectable. They are hardly friends, but they have found some points of contact. Few Negro leaders will quarrel with the Muslim assessment of the Negro's lot in the U.S. Walking away from a debate with Muslim leader Malcolm X in Durham, N. C., Negro civil rights lawyer Floyd McKissick said: 'It didn't make much sense for me to stand up there and defend the white man when I know he's wrong.' Some value the Muslims as a gadfly. 'They are disabusing whites of the paternalistic notion that Negroes are basically happy and want a little civil rights on the side,' says Negro writer Louis Lomax. 'Whites should know that when Negroes are kicked, they react.'

"Criticism centers instead on Muslim theology, Muslim chauvinism, and the Muslim program to acquire part of the U.S. for a separate black nation. 'You cannot integrate the Negroes and the whites without bloodshed,' the lean, coffee-colored Malcolm X said last week. 'The only peaceful way is for the Negroes and whites to separate.' But the Negro remains committed to equality within white America; the Muslims are still outside the mainstream with only 5,500 to 6,000 hard-core members. Even so, the currents that produced them remain. 'They're Islamic, while most Negroes are Baptists or Methodists,' says one Negro leader. 'If they changed to Black Nazarenes, they might sweep the country.'

Nonviolence as a tactic

"Most of all, the restive mood has added new problems to old for Martin Luther King himself. . . . He is troubled by the portents about him. 'I'm running into more and more bitterness because things haven't moved fast enough,' he told Newsweek's Karl Fleming. 'The Negro in the South can now be nonviolent as a stratagem, but he can't include loving the white man. . . . Nonviolence has become a military tactical approach.'

"Like others in his leadership generation, King banks less on the help of white moderates who will trade token integration for peace. 'We are moving toward a sort of tokenism that is now becoming institutionalized . . . a tranquilizer that removes the stress just for the moment.' He worries, as well, that the Albany-Greenwood-Birmingham police tactic of breaking up demonstrations is depriving Negroes of a channel for 'letting a lot of bitterness out in a creative way.' He adds: 'The Negro is shedding himself of fear, and my real worry is how we will keep this fearlessness from rising to violent proportions.'

"Beyond King, a new wave of leaders has sprung up—the young, tough, and highly pragmatic apostles of the 'student movement.' Starting with some spontaneous sit-ins in North Carolina three years ago, the student activists have flourished and earned their combat stripes in Albany, Greenwood, and other battlegrounds. They have borrowed King's nonviolent technique, but not his texts (they read Camus and Sartre more than the Bible and Gandhi) or his faith in the power of love. They find the church useful, if nothing else as a place to hold meetings and brace up their followers with prayer and song.

"They find the Muslims useful, too. 'We invited them to speak at a mass meeting we held in Albany,' says SNCC chairman Charles McDew, a square-built Brandeis University senior. 'Did the people like it? Man, you better believe it.' Some have even questioned whether integration is a Good Thing if it means accepting the values of white society. 'We are working for desegregation, not integration,' McDew says. 'We want an open society without restriction based on color.'

"If at last nonviolence fails, Negro leaders see peril ahead. Professionally, at least, they are optimistic about change. But they are fatalistic, too, about the cost of change. Many feel the battle will be tougher and more dangerous in the North than in the South, where both apartheid and the steps of progress against it are more visible. In the Northern ghetto, Whitney Young says, 'the old signs and symbols are gone. The want ads don't say "white only" any more. That the Negro could fight. But it's frustrating when the gap in housing, education, employment gets wider instead of narrower. . . . Unless we do something, the Negro in the future will no longer react with resignation but with bitterness and hostility.'

"And those are the ingredients of trouble. 'We're liable to get some real violence—in Chicago, in Detroit, in New York,' Young predicts gloomily. 'And it will be tragic. But historically this is the only time America tries to do something. When the bridge breaks, they'll try to repair it.'" ("I Like The Word Black," Newsweek, May 6, 1963)

Mr. Dunbar is the executive director of the Southern Regional Council, an interracial organization of Southern leaders, with headquarters in Atlanta, Ga., devoted to equal rights for all. In an address to the Annual Conference of the National Civil Liberties Clearing House, Mr. Dunbar assesses the tendency to oversimplification in the discussions of attitudes of Negroes and whites toward each other.

Leslie W. Dunbar

"One of the things we can still be happy about in our race relations is the fact that Negro Americans exhibit as many varieties of human nature, and self-interest, and intellectual bent as do the rest of us. I remember a conversation I had a year or so ago with a young white girl, who, with all zeal flying, was working with the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee. There had been a mass meeting the night before, and she was giving me an indignant, a horrified account of some skeptical comments made during the meeting by a local Negro banker. When she finished her tale I said that it didn't seem so much to me, that the gentleman had spoken just as I would expect a banker to speak. My young friend almost burst, in shouting back, 'But he's a Negro!'

"I may be mistaken, but there seems to me more than one way to create a stereotype. It also seems to me perniciously illiberal to insist that all Negroes must think and act according to the notion someone else may have as to how Negroes think and feel. . . .

"I have these last two years or so read an awful lot of writing . . . about the Negro mood, Negro thinking, the Negroes' 'self-image,' and the Negroes' opinion of white people. . . . But I have yet to read an analysis which fitted all Negroes, and I have encountered no generalization—except one—which seems to me to cover all the cases. . . .

"[The one] generalization about the Negro mood which is accurate and generally applicable . . . is suggested—but only suggested—by the word 'impatient'. . . . We can say with complete assurance that a major fraction of Negro Americans will no longer acquiesce in segregation whether by law, custom, or contrivance, and that that fraction is steadily growing larger. This means, of course, that segregation will end. You simply cannot have a segregated society without the acquiescence of the minority race. As soon as Negroes stop acquiescing, the country has but two choices. One is force, in the manner of South African apartheid [see page 21]. The other is desegregation. Jim Crow cannot live without Uncle Tom, and Uncle Tom is dying fast.

"Despite all the rich and wonderful variety and individualism among Negroes we can note, however, that there is probably more unity of interest and of political values among Negroes than exists within any other group of contemporary American society. No other group, not labor, not business, and not farmers, has the same high degree of consensus about what its interests are and where they lie. I believe that every civil rights victory has intensified this unity, [and] that every new victory for yet a while will add to it further. . . .

"[A serious threat, however,] to the unity of the Negro movement . . . is the self-adulation engaged in by some of the more vocal Negroes, especially those who identify themselves with the so-called 'direct' movement, and by their psalmists. I suppose that to complain about this stamps me conclusively as not only a white man, but as one who is insensitive to old wrongs and new rights. Recognizing full well that my credentials as a critic will not themselves be recognized, I shall still remark that the Negro movement is capable of breeding its own diseases, and that the virus it needs to beware of just now is that of intolerance, an intellectual and moral intolerance of white people. . . .

"The areas of disagreement between whites and Negroes are . . . probably going to increase. If so, it will be a normal development, and not a cause for questioning the nerve or the goodwill of white liberals. In the 1930's and 1940's, liberals pretty much always supported whatever labor demanded; this is no longer so, and the earlier situation when liberals identified with farmers has been gone so long as to be all but forgotten.

Who should set the pace?

"The probable areas of disagreement are, chiefly, two: matters of timing and the singleness of Negro aims. As to the former, I decided for myself a couple of years ago to put my sense of timing on the shelf. I believe that the Negroes of our country have absolute right and privilege to press on any front whenever they decide that they should. I believe that whenever white liberals or government officials seek by either persuasion or maneuver to postpone Negro pressure for some legitimate objective, they —and not the Negroes—are guilty of the subsequent and inevitable estrangement. Because on any ground that I can conceive of—morality, politics, strategy, or even mental health—the pace of integration should be set by Negroes, not by white liberals and certainly not by white moderates and not by the Department of Justice. . . .

"Nevertheless, we need a clear-headed perspective. . . . Commonplace as it may sound, there is no more important truth for us to grasp today than an active understanding that we have come a long way these last few years, but have a long way to go. It seems to me crucially important that we all recognize this: If Negroes lose sight of how far we have come since, say, 1945, they will lose sight also of the fact that their own efforts have demonstrated that American political and legal processes can be made to work in the cause of freedom. If white people lose sight of how very much there still is to do they will consign the country straight to a holiday in hell. . . .

"[Finally,] I believe we have given disproportionate attention to studies, both literary and scholarly, of what Negroes think and feel and say. I think our scholars and our literary lights have given too little attention to what Negroes do. When I read the essays or the latest outcropping of social science research I get a feeling of the desperateness of the Negro mood. When I look around, though, I don't see Negroes acting desperately. I see them acting as though they thought it worthwhile to fight, as if they believed they were going to win. I see them using the established processes and institutions of our political democracy as if they believed in them. I see them acting as though they thought American society was worth integrating with." ("The Impatient One-Tenth," Address, Annual Conference of the National Civil Liberties Clearing House, Mar. 29, 1963)

HOW ARE MODERATE MEN RESPONDING?

The U.S. Civil Rights Commission consists of six members, three of them Southerners, and was set up by act of Congress to advise the President. In a unanimous report to the President on April 16, 1963, the Commission urged consideration of withdrawal of federal funds from Mississippi.

John A. Hannah, chairman of the Commission, is president of Michigan State University. Robert G. Storey of Texas, vice chairman, is vice chairman of the Southwestern Legal Foundation. The Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh is president of Notre Dame University, Indiana. Robert S. Rankin is chairman of the political science department of Duke University, North Carolina. Spottswood W. Robinson III is dean of Howard University Law School, Washington, D.C., and Erwin N. Griswold is dean of Harvard Law School, Massachusetts. The full text of the interim report follows:

United States Commission on Civil Rights

"Pursuant to its statutory duty to submit reports to the President and to Congress at such times as either the Commission or the President shall deem desirable, the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights submits the following special report with respect to the status of equal protection of the laws in the State of Mississippi:

"Since October 1962, the open and flagrant violation of constitutional guarantees in Mississippi has precipitated serious conflict which, on several occasions, has reached the point of crisis. The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights has become increasingly alarmed at this defiance of the Constitution. Each week brings fresh evidence of the danger of a complete breakdown of law and order.

"Citizens of the United States have been shot, set upon by vicious dogs, beaten, and otherwise terrorized because they sought to vote. Since October, students have been fired upon, ministers have been assaulted, and the home of the vice chairman of the State Advisory Committee to this Commission has been bombed. Another member and his wife were jailed on trumped-up charges after their home had been defiled. Even children, at the brink of starvation, have been deprived of assistance by the callous and discriminatory acts of Mississippi officials administering federal funds.

"All this affronts the conscience of the nation.

"The Commission is fully aware that the Administration has followed developments in Mississippi closely, that it has taken strong and vigorous action in assuring that violators of federal law are prosecuted, and that court orders are enforced. Despite the diligent and aggressive handling of each case as it has arisen, the nation must be concerned that the pattern of unlawful activity shows no sign of abating. Moreover, nine years after the Supreme Court unanimously decided that segregation in public elementary and secondary schools violates the equal protection clause of the Constitution, Mississippi has taken no step to comply with the law of the land.

"Since its organization, the Commission has been deeply concerned with developments in Mississippi. Its hearing scheduled for October 1962 in that State was first postponed at the request of the Attorney General of the United States, and finally canceled. On March 26, the Attorney General, after referring to the Barnett case, stated that:

" 'While this case is pending, I continue to hold the view that a public hearing in Mississippi by the Civil Rights Commission would not be appropriate. In the meantime, I hope that the work of the Commission staff can continue as in the past on the question of the operation of federal programs in Mississippi as elsewhere.'

"Since October the Commission has received more than 100 complaints from Mississippi alleging denials of constitutional rights. Investigation of these complaints, reports of our State Advisory Committee and other evidence confirm the conclusion of the Commission that prompt and firm action is now required. The Commission has concluded unanimously that only further steps by the Federal Government can arrest the subversion of the Constitution in Mississippi.

"The Commission notes the action taken by the President of the United States in employing the force necessary to assure compliance with the court decrees in the University of Mississippi case. It is mindful of the unequivocal public statements of the President expressing his belief that discriminatory practices are morally wrong. The Commission, nevertheless, believes that the President should, consistent with his constitutional and statutory authority, employ to the fullest the legal and moral powers of his office to the end that American citizenship will not continue to be degraded in Mississippi. We urgently request that:

What the Commission proposed

"1) The President formally reiterate his concern over the Mississippi situation by requesting all persons in that state to join in protecting the rights of U.S. citizens, and, in accordance with his duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, by directing them to comply with the Constitution and laws of the United States;

"2) The President continue and strengthen his Administration's efforts to suppress existing lawlessness and provide federal protection to citizens in the exercise of their basic constitutional rights; and

"3) The Congress and the President consider seriously whether legislation is appropriate and desirable to assure that federal funds contributed by citizens of all states not be made available to any state which continues to refuse to abide by the Constitution and laws of the United States; and, further, that the President explore the legal authority he possesses as Chief Executive to withhold federal funds from the State of Mississippi, until the State of Mississippi demonstrates its compliance with the Constitution and laws of the United States.

"The people of Mississippi and of the other States should know that according to information available to the Commission in fiscal year 1962, the Federal Government received from all sources in Mississippi $270 million. During the same period, payments from the Federal Government to the state, counties, municipalities, and individuals exceeded $650 million for grant-in-aid programs, U.S. Corps of Engineers construction contracts, military prime contracts, and direct civilian and military payrolls. Examples of additional federal programs benefitting Mississippi include area redevelopment loans and grants, small business loans, accelerated public works projects, and Federal Aviation Agency grants.

"Massive assistance to the economy of Mississippi has continued past the time when the state placed itself in direct defiance of the Constitution and federal court orders. For example, the National Aeronautics and Space Agency is proceeding with plans to build a $400 million moon rocket engine test center in Pearl River and Hancock Counties, Miss.

"Taking into account the need to comply with statutory requirements which limit the discretion of the executive branch, and recognizing that the location of large federal installations must reflect national needs, the Commission believes there is an overriding constitutional obligation to make certain that federal funds are expended in a manner which will benefit all citizens without distinction. The Federal Aviation Agency failed to take cognizance of such an obligation when it granted $2,180,000 for the construction of a jet airport to serve Jackson, Miss., without questioning the airport's plan to build separate eating and restroom facilities.

"The financial benefits accruing to Mississippi and its citizens as a result of federal programs are necessarily financed by American citizens throughout the nation. The Commission deems it appropriate and desirable that the legislative and executive branches of the Federal Government inquire into the moral and legal considerations arising out of a situation where, in large measure, the lawless conduct and defiance of the Constitution by certain elements in one state are being subsidized by the other states.

"The Commission does not want the people of Mississippi, either Negro or white, to lose benefits available to citizens of other states. Rather, its goal is that all citizens in the United States be assured the full enjoyment of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution. It is upon adherence to that great charter with its powerful moral premises that our survival as a free society depends." (Interim Report of the United States Commission on Civil Rights, Apr. 16, 1963)

The Commission's proposal was unanimously supported by the nine Mississippians (five whites and four Negroes) on its state advisory committee.

Mississippi Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights

We are gratified by the Commission's proposal that Mr. Kennedy consider a moratorium on federal spending in Mississippi, although we acknowledge the necessity for it with deep regret.

"We find that the existing conditions under which our Negro citizens must live are in the main intolerable, with a continuing deprivation of rights, and an ever-present threat of police brutality and economic reprisal against any citizen who attempts to break the established patterns of segregation. . . .

"[Mississippi] has brazenly espoused racist mythology as official policy, thus serving notice on some 42 per cent of the population that they are inferior in the eyes of the state. . . . It has encouraged the people of Mississippi to disregard laws and judicial decisions of the United States, and to place state loyalty above national loyalty.

"It has fostered a spirit of enmity toward our duly constituted National Government, based on false ideas of federal-state relationships in our American system of government. . . .

"Unless the Federal Government, too, is derelict in the fulfillment of its constitutional duties, it cannot forever ignore such gross irresponsibility, not to say subversion, on the part of the state government." (Statement by the Mississippi Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, Apr. 17, 1963)

An editorial on the meaning of the report:

The New Republic

"The Commission's recommendation carries the signature of the dean of Harvard Law School, the chairman of the political science department of Duke University, the vice chairman of the Southwestern Legal Foundation, the president of Notre Dame, the president of Michigan State University, and the dean of Howard University Law School. What seems to us an indiscriminate prescription for progress is thus written by men whose names call up images of the deliberate, the moderate. What direct sense of outrage must arise just from living closer than the rest of us, as they have, to the situation in Mississippi?

"That is the real point of their complaint. They have in effect put forward for our serious consideration an act of banishment which goes against the habits of their lives, because they know no other way to contain the contempt for law they have found. They are, as we all are, frustrated by Mississippi. But they are also frustrated and maddened by what they plainly conceive to be the moral reticence of their government and their nation. That must be why they feel compelled to remind the President that the Attorney General has, despite the President's own go-ahead signal, four times asked the Civil Rights Commission to postpone public hearings in Mississippi. . . . It is natural that the Commissioners should think that this request represents equivocation; but it was also natural for the Attorney General to be cautious about anything that might further charge an atmosphere already hostile enough for the prosecution's cause. The Attorney General made, we think, the wrong balance between his professional necessities and the needs which not only the Commissioners but the Negroes of Mississippi have waited so long to see satisfied. He made, we think, the same wrong balance when he served Senators Eastland and Talmadge with the appointment of federal judges who had been committed, resistant segregationists. But we do not think of Robert Kennedy as an indifferent man; nor can the Civil Rights Commissioners believe they are the only men in this government who care. Still, they must have begun to wonder.

"The President may refuse what they ask, but none of us can refuse the urgency which has impelled them to ask it. The President has a proper distrust of fanatics; but he will be in peril to his duty to all Americans if he dismisses as fanatic any group of moderate men whom the sight of reality has driven to immoderation." (The New Republic, Apr. 27, 1963)

WOULD ECONOMIC SANCTIONS BE LEGAL?

The President says no:

John F. Kennedy

"I don't have the power to cut off the aid in a general way, as was proposed by the Civil Rights Commission, and I think it would probably be unwise to give the President of the United States that kind of power, because it could start in one state and for one reason or another it might be moved to another state which was not measuring up as the President would like to see it measure up in one way or another. I don't think that we should extend federal programs in a way which encourages or really permits discrimination. That's very clear. But what was suggested was something else. And that was a general, wholesale cutoff of federal expenditures, regardless of the purpose for which they were being spent, as a disciplinary action on the State of Mississippi. I think that that's another question and I'm not—I couldn't accept that view." (Transcript of the President's Press Conference, The New York Times, Apr. 20, 1963)

The senior Republican Senator from New York says yes:

Jacob K. Javits

"For years I have attempted to amend appropriation bills on the floor of the Senate to deny the use of federal funds for discriminatory use, on the same theory adverted to by the Commission report: funds contributed by citizens of all states, and I would add, of all shades of color, should not under the Constitution be restricted to citizens of only one color. As far back as its 1959 report the Commission found that nondiscrimination could validly be required as a condition of the receipt of federal aid, and in connection with the field of housing, it found that this could be done either by Congress or by the President by Executive Order. Again in its comprehensive 1961 reports the Commission repeated this principle, stating that 'federal financial support should be withheld from programs which are so administered as to discriminate on racial grounds.'

"The legal authority for this principle is clear beyond reasonable doubt." I think that the report of the New York County Lawyers' Association [see below] makes that clear. The Civil Rights Commission's present recommendation goes beyond their report "only insofar as it recommends withholding of federal funds for all purposes in Mississippi until the state demonstrates its compliance with the Constitution and laws of the United States. I see no legal difficulty with this application of the principle: since the entire governmental machinery of the state seemingly is arrayed against enforcement of constitutional rights. . . .

"The question has now been put squarely up to the President of the United States. I believe it is his duty to do the following. It is not sufficient for us merely to ask or demand that the President instruct the government departments appropriately. I think our attitude must be more specific than that. I think it is now the duty of the President of the United States, if he feels that he needs legislation, to send us a message and ask for it. It is my judgment that he does not need such legislation, even to withhold funds. As a President can withhold funds appropriated by the Congress for the construction of bombers—which President Truman, President Eisenhower and President Kennedy have done—so a President can, it seems to me, withhold other appropriated funds including those from a state which is directly violating the Constitution of the United States. But if the President feels that he needs legislation, it is his duty to ask for it by special message to the Congress. . . .

"Secondly and very importantly, even if the President feels he does not need legislation and even if the Attorney General advises him that he does not need legislation, the President may himself be reluctant to make so critical and important a decision as this, in view of the statements of colleagues from the South that to cut off federal funds to Mississippi would be one of the most horrendous violations of the Constitution of which they know, then the President ought to do what was done, for example, by President Eisenhower in the case of sending the Marines into Lebanon, and ask the Congress for a concurrent resolution aligning itself with him on the question of policy which is here involved. . . .

"I believe the President has the necessary power. If he does not have it, he should ask the Congress for legislation. If he has—and I think he has—then he may desire the comfort of Congressional concurrence in an action which would be a drastic one, but which in my opinion the situation calls upon him to take. . . .

"The country cannot tolerate lawlessness. That is what it comes down to." (Address, U. S. Senate, Apr. 18, 1963)

In a report on President Kennedy's Executive Order to end discrimination in housing (see Current, March 1963, page 48), the Civil Rights Committee of the New York County Lawyers' Association reviews the legal grounds for executive action in general.

New York County Lawyers' Association

"The Constitution of the United States prohibits racial and religious discrimination by both the Federal Government and the states and their subdivisions. The due process clause of the Fifth Amendment contains the clear implication that the Federal Government may not deny any person the equal protection of the laws. . . . Similarly, the Fourteenth Amendment bars any state or state agency from denying any person the equal protection of the laws. . . . Under these provisions, any federal or state action which discriminates against any person because of race, color, or creed is violative of the Constitution, and it necessarily follows that this applies equally to federal and state officials who carry out functions pursuant to federal housing statutes.

"The Constitution also imposes on the President the duty to 'take care that the laws be faithfully executed' (Article II, Section 3), and the Supreme Court has held that this obligation includes the protection of rights, duties, and obligations growing out of the Constitution itself. . . .

"In addition, while the Fourteenth Amendment does not operate against purely private conduct . . . the Supreme Court has held in many cases, that the purview of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments extends to situations in which private individuals take on quasi-governmental responsibilities or accept public funds or other assistance in carrying on private functions. . . .

"Clearly, when the government itself sells or rents housing, it cannot discriminate or segregate. When it makes housing available through others, the same principle necessarily operates, for if it did not, the spirit and words of the Constitution would be a nullity for all practical purposes.

"It is not necessary that the statute under which the governmental assistance is granted contain such a prohibition, because the Constitution runs through the text of every statute which is enacted. . . .

"There is also a second ground which was apparently relied on by the President in support of the Executive Order. That is the government's power to insert reasonable conditions for the public good in contracts entered into between the United States and other parties. This approach is basic to the Executive Order. . . . Such a contractual clause would be in line with the public policy of the United States under the various cases previously mentioned. Similar federal authority has for some time been exercised with respect to employment under other government contracts in procurement for defense and other governmental purposes. . . .

"The following are the committee's conclusions:

"1) The Executive Order against discrimination in housing issued by the President on November 20, 1962, is based on sound and well-established constitutional grounds, and is well within the authority of the President —and his duty—to enforce the Constitution of the United States.

"2) The Executive Order does not establish any new rights which did not heretofore exist, but does establish procedures and directives for agency enforcement of such rights. . . .

"[We also conclude that] the power of the President to enforce the Constitution extends substantially beyond the scope of this Executive Order, and the executive power to implement public policy through the inclusion of contract provisions extends even further." ("Report on the President's Executive Order on Equal Opportunity in Housing," Committee on Civil Rights, New York County Lawyers' Association, Apr. 14, 1963, quoted in the Congressional Record, Apr. 18, 1963)

WOULD ECONOMIC SANCTIONS DO ANY GOOD?

The chief of the Washington bureau of The New York Times suggests that Mississippi might be treated as an underdeveloped foreign nation and given more, not less, aid.

James Reston

"Mississippi is in trouble today partly because it is so isolated in mind and spirit from the rest of the nation, and partly because it is so poor. The effect of the Commission's proposals, if accepted by the Congress, would probably not be to bring the state to heel, but merely to increase both its poverty and its isolation and to deepen the tragedy even more. . . .

"As a matter of fact, there is much to be said for the opposite of the Commission's punitive recommendations, not to reward Mississippi for its rebellious spirit, but to bring her closer into the prevailing discussion and economic well-being of the nation as a whole.

"Ironically, Washington has a policy for most of the underdeveloped areas of the world except her own. The way to bring along the 'underdeveloped nations,' this government believes, is to provide them with 'development grants' and 'technical assistance,' and 'investment guarantees,' and a cataract of teachers, technicians and industrialists.

"We preach 'interdependence' and 'partnership' among the Atlantic nations. We have a 'Peace Corps' composed of many of our finest young teachers and technicians all over the world and an Alliance for Progress in Latin America.

"Our fellow-countrymen in Mississippi will not thank us for the analogy, but many of their problems in both the hills and the delta are similar to the problems of the underdeveloped nations.

"Maybe the Commission is right, that persuasion has failed and only punitive power will prevail. But maybe not. It could be in the end that we need an Alliance for Progress in Mississippi, a people-to-people program, more student exchanges, more technicians bringing the new scientific revolution to the state, more interdependence, more 'partnership,' and more 'technical assistance.'

"After all, we have tried 'military assistance' without much effect." (The New York Times, Apr. 19, 1963)

The executive secretary of the National Sharecroppers Fund agrees with Mr. Reston's notion, but questions whether it could be carried out.

Fay Bennett

"As we have discovered in our foreign aid programs, it is not enough to pour funds into impoverished nations if their officials are corrupt or if the social, economic and political systems keep the aid from being used to provide basic help to the poor.

"The same applies to Mississippi and to other areas in our country where semi-feudal patterns still prevail. An example of how federal aid was proffered but then lost because of local resistance to using it for those who need it most is the tractor driver training program in the Mississippi Delta which was to have been financed by Area Redevelopment Administration funds over a year ago. This project would have provided training to upgrade skills and job opportunities for 1,200 unemployed and underemployed farm workers (about 90 per cent Negro). The farmers wanted the program but political pressures brought about its cancellation at the last minute.

"On the other hand, I understand that federal training funds through the Manpower Development and Training Act are now being used in Jackson, Miss., but on a segregated and completely unequal basis. At last report there were only two programs set up for Negroes, and those only in woodwork, while many more programs, available to 'whites only,' were teaching auto mechanics and other skilled and up-to-date crafts.

"I would ask Mr. Reston how we can insure the proper use of federal funds for local programs so that taxpayers' money is not used to perpetuate undemocratic practices and unequal opportunity. Perhaps the Federal Government should look into the possibility of installing special overseers in the same way that international unions do when they find a local union guilty of misuse of funds. In Mississippi the issue is not merely misuse of funds but the very development of human personality and fulfilling of human needs, to say nothing of the constitutional rights of free citizens." (Letter to the Editor, The New York Times, May 8, 1963)

A former member of the Civil Rights Division of the United States Department of Justice feels that federal aid can be "a powerful instrument for promoting civil rights" in the South.

Harrison J. Goldin

"The Mississippi Gulf Coast is illustrative. The nonsegregated atmosphere of the military installation there spills over into the surrounding civilian communities, contributing to the relative decency with which local Negroes are treated. One might be persuaded that the Negroes in a county like Pearl River (of Mack Charles Parker fame) would well benefit from the planned erection of a NASA moon rocket test center.

"Indeed, the thousands of non-Southerners who would populate such a facility and its environs, and overwhelm by sheer numbers bigoted local whites, might achieve in a fortnight the kind of civil rights revolution that the Commission would welcome." (Letter to the Editor, The New York Times, Apr. 26, 1963)

A New York Post columnist supports the Commission's proposal.

William V. Shannon

"The Civil Rights Commission's recommendation to President Kennedy that he consider withholding federal funds from Mississippi until it stops defying the Constitution and the laws has not received a favorable reception in the nation's press.

"The New York Post has endorsed it, but other major newspapers, including The Washington Post and The New York Times, which strongly support desegregation, have editorially condemned the proposal as the wrong way to achieve a good objective, nor is the Kennedy Administration responsive, because cutting off the flow of federal funds to Mississippi would go counter to the approach it prefers to use in dealing with the recalcitrant sections of the South.

"But the proposal should not be allowed to die, for it has much to commend it and deserves serious consideration.

"It has been argued that since Mississippi is an economically underdeveloped and culturally backward area, what it needs is not less federal money but more.

"With the lowest per capita income in the nation Mississippi needs the kind of assistance which Point Four, the Peace Corps and foreign aid give to underdeveloped countries overseas. As far as it goes, this argument is undeniable. But we have to bear in mind that Mississippi has made enormous economic progress in the past thirty years without moving forward one inch in its treatment of Negroes. . . .

"In fiscal year 1962 Mississippi received $650,000,000 from the Federal Government and contributed in taxes only $270,000,000, a net gain of nearly $400,000,000. Undoubtedly if the nation continues subsidizing the state on this scale for another thirty years, some progress on racial discrimination may be made, but not necessarily. The correlation between economic development and enlightenment on racial matters is far from exact.

"Birmingham, Ala., is far more prosperous than Mississippi, but racial conditions are no better. Moreover, the students who have been making life miserable for James Meredith at the University of Mississippi come from the state's middle-class families. They may suffer from cultural poverty, but they are not economically badly off.

"The crux of the issue in Mississippi today is economic and political power. The white businessmen, farmers and lawyers who run the state know that if they let the Negroes vote, they will lose their present monopoly of power. When I visited Mississippi three years ago, a rich farmer in a county that was almost half Negro said to me: 'Do you think I want to live in a county where the sheriff and the judge are niggers?'

"No matter how rich this farmer and his fellow members of the white ruling class become, they are not going to surrender political control to the Negroes if they can possibly help it. After all, if Negroes can win political office, they may become even more 'uppity' and demand higher wages or better terms on the loan from the bank or a full accounting of their share of the cotton crop at the end of the season. It is a blunt fact of political life that no ruling class yields power willingly to another group.

"The Federal Government is promoting a revolution in power relationships inside Mississippi. The question which the Civil Rights Commission really poses is this: Should not the Federal Government bring all its strength to bear in this struggle?

"The argument has been that the Commission's proposal would hit the state's poorest citizens the hardest. There is no need, however, to cut off humanitarian assistance such as federal aid to crippled children or the Hill-Burton program for building hospitals. The Administration could be selective in applying this financial squeeze. . . .

"The President and his subordinates in the executive departments do not need any legislation and do not have to invoke any novel constitutional doctrine to withhold money for these projects or shift them elsewhere. It is also well within their administrative discretion to slow down and hold back on Small Business Administration loans, area redevelopment loans and grants and military prime contracts.

"Economic pressure on Mississippi's businessmen would give them an incentive they do not now have to use their influence on the side of political progress.

"It is an old rule in politics to reward one's friends and punish one's enemies. If the Federal Government intends to be the Negro's friend, it should not go on rewarding his reactionary white enemies. The Civil Rights Commission has done nothing novel or unique in commending this ancient wisdom to the President." (New York Post, Apr. 21, 1963)

From an editorial:

The New York Times

"The cutting off of federal funds, as a coercive device, is not only wrong in principle but it would bear most onerously on the state's poorest citizens, including the very Negroes it is designed to protect." (The New York Times, Apr. 19, 1963)

The executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the chairman of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, both of which support the Commission's proposal, disagrees:

Roy Wilkins

"The Times' concern lest poverty-stricken Negroes suffer if federal funds are withdrawn is not well founded. They get so little of these funds by way of services or wages that they will not miss their withdrawal." (Letter to the Editor, The New York Times, Apr. 29, 1963)

The editor of a bi-weekly Washington newsletter:

I. F. Stone

"Suppose it was not the rights of Negroes but the rights of property which were menaced in Mississippi. . . . Suppose that when property owners tried to demonstrate, police dogs were set upon them. Suppose that when they tried to appeal to the Civil Rights Commission in Washington, the Mississippi legislature passed special laws . . . making it a crime punishable by five years in jail to make false statements to any federal investigator, providing that in such prosecutions the two-witness rule for perjury would be suspended and one witness would be enough. . . . Suppose bombs had been thrown, not into some poor NAACP or CORE office, but into (forgive the expression) A BANK. Suppose the Civil Rights Commission in desperation had then called on the President and the Congress to suspend all federal aid to Mississippi until it agreed to safeguard fundamental rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. Q. Would this suggestion evoke a shush-shush of legalistic horror from the liberal pundits of the great newspapers? Or would the U.S. Army take over Mississippi tomorrow?" ("Suppose Not Negroes but Men of Property Were Being Beaten in Mississippi?," I. F. Stone's Bi-Weekly, Apr. 29, 1963)

A suggestion from Simple, a literary friend of a Negro poet and playwright:

Langston Hughes

" 'I would tell Mr. Kennedy to send not less government money to Mississippi and such like states, but more. The government should not be stingy with them states at all. They need more schools to get educated, more vitamins to get vitimated and more light to get illuminated. They need the four-hour day and the three-day week, with less time to work and more time to play. They need things to play with, too, to take their minds off of race. Mississippi should be declared one big national park, a national Coney Island or Freedomland like New York has, with all kinds of rides and slides and shows and dancehalls and shoot-the-shoots and merry-go-rounds.

" 'But it should be all free—Dixie Disneyland subsidized by the U. S. A. with free Confederate caps for the children, free rootbeers and free popcorn for all, with dancing every day but Sunday. Sundays they should have free revival meetings with Reverend Billy Graham, Deacon Billie Sol Estes, Reverend Adam Powell, Rabbi Goldstein, Bishop Sheen and Brother Brodie in the pulpits, with Mahalia Jackson, Burl Ives and Tennessee Ernie Ford singing hymns, also Clara Ward and the Ward Singers from Las Vegas on the late watch and the Mormon Temple Tabernacle Choir from Salt Lake for Sunrise Services. All this would keep them white folks in Mississippi so happy, they would not have time to go chasing after Negroes with police dogs, or teasing Meredith.

" 'I would also send the best jazz bands in the country to Mississippi—Duke Ellington, Louis Armstrong, Art Blakey, Benny Goodman, swinging Jimmy Smith at the organ, Mongo Santamaria, also Watusi to add a Latin beat—all this free, mind you, plus the best rock and roll singers in the world to entertain between sets. The Kennedys like art, they tell me. Mr. Kennedy, send a little of it to Mississippi! Send Dinah Washington and Peggy Lee. Also Pearl Bailey. Let them peoples down there have a little fun in life, so's they will not be so grouchy. Let the government pay for it. Don't cut off them poor white peoples. Be generous—kill them with kindness—make it 4th of July every day in the week.' " ("For Fun," New York Post, May 10, 1963)

Commentary June 1963
Race & Race Relations

"MY NEGRO PROBLEM"—III

To the Editor of Commentary:

Whatever my disagreement with Norman Podhoretz's article "My Negro Problem—and Ours," I believe that Commentary is to be commended for publishing it and thereby helping to open up areas for discussion that have been closed too long.

Like Mr. Podhoretz's ideas or not, approve them or dispute them, subject him and his article to the analyst's couch, the important thing is not the way he rationalizes his experiences or the conclusions he comes to, but the fact that he brings into the open emotionally based prejudices that exist despite intellectual convictions. All people have emotional reactions often hidden and often inconsistent with their verbalizations. Is it possible that we shall ever attain full and satisfying integration without acknowledging—not accepting—them?

This would seem to be the point of this article and I regret that Mr. Podhoretz instead of writing simply of his own personal experiences proceeded to draw from them highly questionable generalizations and by such intellectualization to obscure the validity of this point.

I regret even more profoundly some of the attacks upon Mr. Podhoretz and Commentary for publishing the article. I understand passionate conviction and deep loyalties, but when righteous indignation veers on demagogy it must be deplored. I refer particularly to those who assail Mr. Podhoretz for questioning whether Jewish survival was worth six million innocent lives. A man can be committed to the survival of the Jewish community yet ask the question that Job asks: Is it worth it at such a price? (Incidentally, a question that was never asked of 6,000,000 victims.) High moral rhetoric will not answer the very real problem the article poses. Nor will silence eliminate discrimination and prejudice. . . .

By writing the article, Mr. Podhoretz has afforded us not only the opportunity to evaluate his attitudes critically, but the even greater opportunity of questioning ourselves and the contradictions that may exist between our own utterances and actions. Such self-exploration could be extremely productive. It might even help us to understand why discrimination, however subtle, is practiced today by so many articulate defenders of integration.

Joseph Willen

New York City

To the Editor of Commentary:

In the dark all cats are gray. So now in the light should all cats be white? You are saying the only hope for a Negro is to become white. It is cruel and insulting to wish a black man white. Think of pale hordes who risk skin cancer and other afflictions to achieve the "stigma" you would wish out of existence. Wish instead, Mr. Podhoretz, that the black man accept with delight the irony of having no choice.

(Mrs.) Zöe R. Sherwood

Poughkeepsie, New York

To the Editor of Commentary:

. . . Mr. Podhoretz's experience would seem to be neither very exceptional nor profitable—to himself or to others. It reveals nothing new about the "love" or "hate" content of the racial nightmare except perhaps that the use of these emotive words can only confuse and obfuscate any reasoned attempt to "solve" the black-white problem.

I was born in a small upstate New York town, and on the right side of the railroad tracks. That did not save me from being beaten up regularly on my way to school by a bigger Negro boy who finally solved my Negro problem for me by teaching me how to win by not fighting fair. Twenty-five years later my son, who had organized the first-graders in defense of the Scottsboro boys (he believed that they were first-graders, too) was similarly educated and emancipated by an equally tough and unscrupulous Negro roughneck in the school yard of the Newton, New Jersey high school.

Neither of us hates Negroes as a result of these experiences, nor thinks that as a race they are congenitally dirty fighters. But neither do we love them, nor they us, although we both continue to aid the struggle for equal Negro rights. I don't love any of the many Negro leaders I have worked with, although it has been my good fortune to like and be liked by most of them.

Again, neither love nor hate will serve to exorcise the racial nightmare, whereas reason and good will can do, have done, a great deal, even in dealing with hate phenomena like the Black Muslims. The latter are unlikely to determine the future of black-white relations, precisely because they base themselves on the Hitlerian mystique of inter-racial "hatred."

. . . Negroes can fight for the right to be full citizens and whites can help or hinder them, preferably without the emotional complications of love or hatred. The dirtiness, the violence of that fight then becomes largely a matter of tactics, a clear, cold word which can be reasonably argued about.

JAMES RORTY

Columbia, New Jersey

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

The article by Norman Podhoretz deserves no less than all the acclaim it has aroused. How wonderful it is that via this article we can "speak from the heart." The only hope for moving out of darkness is to bring light to the dark places within us. Congratulations.

(RABBI) BERNARD KLIGFELD

Long Beach, New York

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

Norman Podhoretz's article . . . is probably the most honest, straightforward personal examination of the roots of hate and prejudice that I have ever seen. He puts the psychological realities into perspective by juxtaposing them with his own personal experience. He substitutes truth for glibness, honesty for cant, and his soul for the illogical logic of rationalization. And he is right about the solution; the only way to destroy a barrier is indeed to destroy it. This is a classic essay which will have poignant meaning for generations to come.

(DR.) HARRY LEVINSON

Topeka, Kansas

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

. . . Whatever may be true of Mr. Podhoretz's problem, our Negro problem, so called, is one of justice and injustice, to gain for Negroes in law and practice truly equal rights. This has nothing to do with likes or personal feelings. . . .

I have worked for equal rights for Negroes all my life. When I am asked if I like Negroes I answer "No." I add, of course, that I don't like whites either. I like some Negroes and some whites, but it never occurs to me to put my efforts at racial justice on the basis of personal likes and dislikes. Would members of the American Civil Liberties Union, for example, put their efforts on the basis of whether they like Communists or members of the John Birch Society?

ALFRED BAKER LEWIS

New York City

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

I was enormously impressed by "My Negro Problem—And Ours." It is the first time that I have seen an article by a white person that was frank, open, and expressed the concern and upset within the mind of a liberal. I think the tremendous sensitivity that Mr. Podhoretz shows and his analysis of the problem will prove of great value to people working in the field of human relations. . . .

O. BERNARD LEIBMAN

Queens College
Flushing, New York

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

Mr. Podhoretz deserves much credit for having the courage to be blunt and honest. His insight into the mechanism of prejudice that it is "a two way street" should add to our understanding of the issue. That envy as an emotion may take hold of the privileged is a truth often ignored. This is coming to the surface in the relief welfare issue. Also his remarks about the white middle-class liberals are painfully true. . . . And finally, it was refreshing to find an absence of the usual phrases that were applicable in the 19th century. The status of the Negro is changing from day to day. This is news to our sociologists.

The utopian solution Mr. Podhoretz suggests is not going to do us or our children much good. I do not have a better one. What troubles me in the confrontation is that the values and standards of our culture are being further diluted. This is happening, first, because our Jewish intellectuals are not grounded in our own heritage. And, secondly, the Negro leadership is politically oriented for short-term integration rather than cultural elevation and assimilation. Were they to emphasize the latter course it would not eliminate prejudice but would lift a cloud from our cultural and economic horizon.

Concerning Jewish survival Mr. Podhoretz says that there was "a memory of past glory." However, in the beginning there was slavery, as we proclaim on Passover night. It is the glory that followed a period of slavery that is unique and might serve as an inspiration to the Negro people.

(Dr.) Menahem Steinberg
Chicago, Illinois

To the Editor of Commentary:

To my mind, Mr. Podhoretz's article is a beautiful explication of what has been for too long lethargically taken for granted or left unsaid, if not avoided. My thanks for his insight and honesty and courage. . . .

Jon Aaronson
Civil Rights Club
Harpur College
Binghamton, New York

To the Editor of Commentary:

The intellectual agony, the personal courage, and the moral integrity evidenced in the article by Norman Podhoretz in your February edition have rarely been witnessed by this reader anywhere in the annals of American opinion and journalism. The will and the capability to show that popular panaceas may not be panaceas at all, and that our social problems may in fact have no solutions—all of this runs wholly contrary to the purposive optimism of American liberalism. But Mr. Podhoretz, a distinguished editor whose own credentials as a liberal are not subject to question, has not hesitated to take a look without the rose-colored glasses at a critical American problem. . . .

In one respect, however, the situation may not be so dark as Mr. Podhoretz reports, although in a more comprehensive sense it may be even darker. . . . From my own years in the South I think it accurate to report that in that region hatred is not the essence of racial differences. On the contrary, the typical white Southerner characteristically feels a form of love for Negroes, whom he has known long and well, but it is similar to the love that an adult feels for a small child. . . . The Southern white loves the Negro but feels that he is in some way inherently inferior and thus is not qualified to join white society on unrestricted terms. The analogy is not perfect, of course, because the adult expects that the child eventually will grow up whereas the Southern white characteristically questions whether the Negro will ever develop sufficiently to be fit for unlimited access to white society. Yet, the analogy holds even here, to some extent. . . . The hope in this situation is that once the Negro has forcefully persuaded his white Southern neighbor that he is not an inferior subhuman creature, something approximating the old love relationship will reassert itself just as it does between parent and child after the child himself has attained adulthood. . . .

The aspect of the situation which is perhaps far more somber than even Mr. Podhoretz suggested is to be discerned by taking a longer historical perspective. In virtually all societies of which we have any record there are patterns of discrimination no less odious than those which we now discern in our own society. Whether the substance of the discrimination be founded on racial distinctions, other visible physical differentiations, economic differences or whatever, it is apparently true that peoples everywhere have felt a need to regard themselves as inherently superior to some other peoples. . . . The conclusion is that even if we followed Mr. Podhoretz's prescription of intermarriage, and even if this eventually resulted in only a single worldwide racial type, people would presumably still find grounds on which to regard other people as inferior and thus to be discriminated against.

If there is a bright spot in this otherwise somber conclusion, at least with respect to America, it may be found in a continuing commitment to democratic values and a continuing effort to improve the practice of those values. Even hatred, fortunately, is an emotion which is not necessarily incompatible with democratic procedures, as long as the hatred is weaker than the commitment to these procedures. . . .

Vincent Davis
Department of International Relations University of Denver
Denver, Colorado

To the Editor of Commentary:

Mr. Podhoretz's article seemed to me to speak out honestly and clearly on an important part of the problem of racial conflicts and misunderstandings. I plan to use this article in a workshop discussion program of which I am chairman, because it so definitely reveals the individual and personal problems, and avoids the generalization and the stereotype. . . .

I am grateful that he had the courage to express his thoughts where restraint has so often been suggested as the safer course. I hope this action leads to a more meaningful approach to our whole intergroup problem in these United States.

DAVID ARONSON
Upper Montclair, New Jersey

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

I suspect that the Negro problem of Mr. Podhoretz (and ours) is really one of weariness. One senses a feeling of exhaustion and frustration among Negro leaders, who—at least in the courts and official sympathy—keep winning and winning, at what must be a fearful emotional cost, and yet have won so little compared to what must eventually be won. Historically, many great social and political upheavals have been preceded by corrective improvements. There is no denying that the status of Negroes has improved in every respect. The difficulty is, simply, that having a glimpse of what life can and should be like for them, Negroes (understandably) have lost the power to move gradually and prefer "deliberate speed."

Some great issues are never resolved. They may be modified or cease to matter. . . . To imply—as does Mr. Podhoretz—that we must now all face and resolve our individual ambivalences is to shirk the questions of the day. . . . The struggle to assist Negroes, in one way or another, to achieve more or less equal minority status is the only viable one. Any redirection in emphasis, however prophetic, may prove to be a luxury pursued at the cost of all the gains so far achieved. The question is obviously not that of equal minority status or miscegenation. The former is enough to think about and the continued struggle for it can be relied upon to produce its share of unanticipated, related agonies without musing on hypothetical issues which are best left to a future and, hopefully, more enlightened and less scarred generation. . . .

LLOYD KAYE
New York City

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

If Mr. Podhoretz had spelled out his basic outlook in "My Negro Problem—And Ours," his conclusions would have been less shocking than dull. His social ideal is a monolithic national culture achieved by a thoroughgoing assimilation. . . . This is but one step short of cosmopolitanism. To solve the Negro problem the Marxist cosmopolite proposes the classless society. Mr. Podhoretz recommends a monochromatic nation. . . .

The situation of the American Negro is that he is black in a predominantly white and hostile society. His background, neglected by the history books, is one in which he can take at least a little pride. And, if need be, he can weave a concept of "négritude" which includes Mr. Podhoretz's contributions of physical grace and vitality. The authentic Negro, like the authentic Jew, does not seek to disappear. They both rest their hopes on integration in a genuinely pluralist society, where the overwhelming majority will regard their neighbors' differences with equanimity, with understanding, and with approval.

NATHAN LEARNER
Quincy, Massachusetts

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

Norman Podhoretz's solution of the Negro question—and the Jewish, it would seem—has all the weaknesses of utopianism. Before miscegenation can be seriously encouraged, a revolution in values must take place. Otherwise, like so much in utopianism, it is cruel, not at all humane. And to encourage—I should say sacrifice—one's own child is a kind of sublimated infanticide, with the right mixture of pleasure and pain for the parent. I would find Mr. Podhoretz more persuasive, incidentally, if he would lead the way. All this does not mean that Southerners are right in saying that before we propose integration we had better see that its logic leads to the question: "Would you want your sister to marry a Negro?" Certainly disturbing, the question may be easier to answer than we think. Like Mr. Podhoretz's proposal, the question is raised in a social vacuum. Only when miscegenation is normal will the question really pertain to actuality; and then it will no longer have any force or meaning. . . .

ISADORE TRASCHEN
Troy, New York

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

What a fine—yes, great—article that was on your/our Negro problem. Mr. Podhoretz is doing for the conscience and unconscious of "our persuasion" what Baldwin has been doing for his.

GERALD WALKER
Past President
Society of Magazine Writers
New York City

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

Mr. Podhoretz has written of the relationship between the white man and the Negro with deep sensitivity and unusual candor. . . . The cathartic effects of such candid soul-searching can serve to contribute a measure of progress in the troubled sphere of race relations. . . .

In spite of this, however, I feel moved to register a sense of uneasiness which the article has provoked in me. True, Mr. Podhoretz has honestly exposed a cancer, an operation which no doubt caused him, as well as many of his readers, considerable pain. But after so skillfully cutting through to the root of the trouble, having sighted it, he abruptly drops his instruments, as it were, and gives in to a terrible paralysis of movement, or at best a strong desire to escape from the scene of the operation. For in his concluding paragraphs. . . . Mr. Podhoretz has . . . called for total assimilation, for the disappearance of color differences through intermarriage. He has also invoked the terrible fate of six million innocent Jews—victims of German massacres—as an example of what awaits a group which insists on survival as a distinct entity; and he has questioned whether the centuries-long effort at perseverance was worth such a horrible price. . . . Without presuming to be "God himself" I would suggest to Mr. Podhoretz that survival, on a group level no less than on an individual one, can be a basic desire, and need hardly be justified. The sacrifice of so many lives toward that end is justification enough. . . .

MENAHEM DUNSKY

Montreal, Canada

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

Mr. Podhoretz has made a moving confession of his early experience with Negroes but he went over the cliff when he said that in the culture of the streets when we were kids, there was an irreconcilable difference between us whites and the Negroes. I contend that not as many as he thinks shared his social trauma.

I grew up in the Harlem of the 1920's, and in my 7th Avenue Arrow A.C. there were Negroes and Spaniards as well as Jews. Our loyalty was to 7th Avenue, not to our color or religion. If I feared and hated any group it was the Irish of 8th Avenue. . . .

In my non-liberal Orthodox Jewish home, I would have been sharply scolded had I expressed any Jim Crow sentiments. . . . There was prejudice in my youth but it was against the goyim. It came from religious-survival motives having to do with intermarriage and from the bad dreams of pogroms. It came from an American Christian world which ignored us and tried to keep us in our place. . . .

I recall these fragments of the past to oppose them to Mr. Podhoretz's memories and to remind him and Mr. Baldwin, whose article in the New Yorker he refers to, that they have forgotten the lessons of the Jewish drama in America. . . .

Mr. Baldwin . . . says the Negro is sick and tired of the sin of gradualism. But gradualism is a sin only when history is permitted to move at the speed set for it by the majority culture. We Jews have forced history to move faster. Not by assimilating, but by becoming more Jewish; by accepting our identity, not our place; by learning who we were and who we are and letting America know it. Indeed, that is what Mr. Baldwin has so successfully done as a Negro.

There is a failure of communication here. But the fault is the Negro's as well as ours. He has only begun to tell us who he is, where he came from, what he wants. Equal rights are fine, but equal rights for whom? Why aren't there courses in Negro history in our schools? White bias is only half the reason: Negro weakness of will is also responsible.

Assimilation is as bad as extreme nationalism. . . . Mr. Podhoretz has a theory which, if pursued, would deprive the American of African descent and the American of other descents of the growth inherent in the marriage of cultures, not necessarily of blood. . . .

MICHAEL BLANKFORT

Los Angeles, California

TO THE EDITOR OF COMMENTARY:

I would like to add my voice to what I am sure is the outcry raised by Norman Podhoretz's article. I can readily understand why Mr. Podhoretz thought of the child he was when he read Mr. Baldwin's piece; Mr. Baldwin's evident and fierce honesty tempts us all to emulation. All the same, there is a radical difference between Mr. Baldwin's "Letter" and Mr. Podhoretz's "Problem": Mr. Baldwin's piece is interesting in itself, Mr. Podhoretz's only as a memoir. . . .

Baldwin's solution seems to me wrong, but his right to express that solution undeniable. Podhoretz's solution, evidently an official recognition of the miscegenation practiced in this country since Negroes were first brought here, seems simple enough and satisfactory. What's wrong, then, with his "Problem"?

In the first place, it is a pseudo-problem. Mr. Podhoretz's Negro problem is his, rather than ours. His solution, furthermore, is inadequate. Assimilation is not a substitute for social pluralism. Also, it smacks of the conformity we all think we deplore, and suggests that the only way to protect ourselves from one another is to hide in one another. In this connection, let me answer Mr. Podhoretz to say that . . . the ovens of Auschwitz did not discriminate between assimilated and non-assimilated Jews, did not even insist upon consuming only Jewish bodies. Auschwitz was a terrible but inadequate attempt to solve the problem of minorities, in the crudest and most desperate way. White solutions to what white men choose to call "the Negro problem" have not yet reached that degree of crudity and desperation, but the nature of white exploitation of the Negro is obvious. . . .

My other objection to Mr. Podhoretz's article is the standard liberal objection, at which lately we have been learning to sneer. Whites have simply lost the franchise to express hatred of the Negro. We have, one way or another, hated the Negro long enough; even if we have not individually hated the Negro, we have behaved as if we did. Our job is certainly to understand our feelings about Negroes, as Mr. Podhoretz has earnestly tried to do; but we are no longer free to luxuriate in them. . . . There may come a time—soon, I hope—when Mr. Baldwin will lose his franchise to express Negro hatred of the whites, or when the social situation is so changed that private feelings, even of James Baldwin, are irrelevant and unimportant. . . .

R. L. Colie

Department of History
Wesleyan University
Middletown, Connecticut

To the Editor of Commentary:

I do hope Norman Podhoretz feels better now. If public confession in a compote of sociology, psychology, and philosophy doesn't help, what will?

Oddly enough, I know of a Jew (me) who didn't suffer the emotional and practical disadvantage of growing up in a racially mixed neighborhood. I didn't grow up thinking all Jews were rich either. . . .

Where I lived there were none other than Jewish boys to chase me home and beat me up. I never won a medal for track (which is why I was so consistently caught, I guess), but a kid named Goldstein did once shake me down for six marbles.

So there I was, a victim of Jewish cruelty. Some of those cruel Jewish boys were also pretty fast with carefree Jewish girls and aroused erotic notions within me. Some skipped school, too, and didn't wear scratchy coats and earmuffs in winter. . . . I don't mean to brag, but I'm sure I logged as many childhood hours cowering as did Mr. Podhoretz.

Mr. Podhoretz has come to the conclusion that the genuine, lasting answer to the Negro problem is (I'm not gutsy enough to use the brave word he did) assimilation. I hear tell some Jews have considered that road as their solution, too. But I do wonder if the Negroes are prepared to wait that long. I suspect many Jews aren't. . . .

Mr. Podhoretz is concerned that the integrated Negro of tomorrow may run aground on empty, middle-class values. If I were a Negro I would say that is my problem, not his. . . .

I'm going to go way out on a limb and guess that Mr. Podhoretz's traumas notwithstanding, millions of American Negroes are going to continue to press forward for equality—in jobs, in schools, in neighborhoods, in unions, in every place and everything. No one, least of all Mr. Podhoretz, has suggested anything better for them to do. And when that equality is achieved no one is going to be more surprised than Mr. Podhoretz, for then he will understand what Negroes have been after all this time. . . .

Gene Brook

Huntington Woods, Michigan

To the Editor of Commentary:

. . . Norman Podhoretz's piece will, I think, give rise to much bitter laughter since it fails in so many ways as a solution (even as an examination) of one of our sorest problems. It fails, I believe, because: (1) it offers only an account of an experience strictly limited in time and space; (2) it does not take into account the hundred or so years of harsh white supremacy that resulted in the Negro viewing all whites—Jew and gentile—as his omnipresent nemesis; and (3) it overlooks the value of a pluralistic society, seeing, instead, the only solution as lying in intermarriage. . . .

Elliott Gross

Monsey, New York

To the Editor of Commentary:

After reading and re-reading "My Negro Problem—And Ours" I am convinced that this essay too will serve as a landmark in the social essay along with Baldwin's. I was very moved by Norman Podhoretz's piece. And not simply intellectually. . . .

Why envy the Negro his grace, his physical skills? Why not ask what it is that prevents grace and physical skill from becoming a general property of the young? Mr. Podhoretz speaks of middle-class, white respectability—what does this mean but being cut off from the labor process, the work process, the creative process, as such? The solution is thus not the direct liquidation of the color line, through the liquidation of color; but rather through a greater physical connectedness of the whites; and a greater intellective connectedness of the blacks. . . .

IRVING LOUIS HOROWITZ
Chairman

Department of Sociology
Hobart and William Smith Colleges
Geneva, New York

July 1, '63
R+R Rel.

RACE TROUBLE— IS IT THE SAME THE WORLD OVER?

Race conflicts in the U. S. are drawing a wave of criticism from abroad. White treatment of Negroes is widely denounced as a horrible example to mankind.

But is this primarily an "American problem"? A check around the world shows that oppression, segregation, color bars are common in most countries. In many, racial antagonism is far worse than anything in America—and it's still growing.

Look the world over and you quickly discover that race is a problem in almost every place where color differences exist.

Africa's blacks have the whites on the run in the Congo and Kenya—at a time of outcry against white rule in South Africa and Portuguese Angola.

Chinese are seeking to rally colored races of the world to their side in their battle with Russia for leadership of the world Communist movement.

Russia, on her part, is holding down the yellow races in her population. Negro students from Africa have been attacked by whites in the Soviet bloc.

Great Britain, after race riots, has cut down drastically on immigration of black and brown people.

Mulattoes, the propertied people of Haiti, are being oppressed by a Negro-supported dictatorship. In British Guiana, British troops are trying to prevent civil war between Negroes and persons whose ancestors came from India.

India, itself, is deeply divided by caste in which differing color often plays a role.

Many countries practice discrimination on other grounds besides race.

Ceylon has denied citizenship to hundreds of thousands of persons whose ancestors came from India within the last century. Christians, in Egypt, find themselves at a disadvantage in getting jobs. Arabs, in Israel, feel left out.

Yet the world, moralizing, tends whenever possible to point the finger of blame at the U. S. and its race problem.

To find whether other nations, too, have trouble in integrating, "U. S. News & World Report" asked its correspondents abroad for on-the-ground reports.

BRITAIN: Race Feeling Runs High

LONDON

The British are using "Commonwealth segregation" to avert explosive race problems.

Race riots in British cities caused Parliament to end free entry of people from other Commonwealth countries.

What had become a flood of black people from the Caribbean is reduced to a trickle. Negroes who had been coming in at the rate of 5,000 a month are permitted to enter now at a rate below 500.

Only 50 Pakistanis are coming monthly, compared with more than 4,000 before the gates were closed. Immigration from India is down from 3,000 a month to about 600.

In Britain, the ratio of colored to white is about 1 in 100—compared with 1 in 9 in the U. S. In all of Britain there are about 500,000 Negroes. Yet race feelings run high.

Negroes are discriminated against in housing, jobs, restaurants and in pubs. Upper-class Negroes making hotel reservations often find no rooms available when they show up. Newspaper advertisements offering apartments frequently stipulate "Europeans only" or "no coloreds."

Mixed marriages are increasing, though. White girls with black men are a fairly common sight in London. Racial mixing, socially, is widespread in universities and does not seem to be frowned upon. There is no segregation in state-run schools, where the Negro proportion usually is not large.

Segregation, however, is extensive in industry.

Government-operated employment exchanges frequently are instructed by employers to send "no coloreds, Irish or Jews." In factories that do not ban colored workers, there is usually an unofficial "quota" for nonwhites. A majority of colored persons take the jobs that whites don't want.

Legislation to outlaw racial discrimination—similar to that President Kennedy is submitting to Congress—has been introduced in Parliament in each of the past five years but has been defeated repeatedly.

AFRICA: Intense Hatred of Whites

LEOPOLDVILLE

Race feeling is strong here in the Congo and elsewhere in black Africa where hatred of whites is intense.

As a result, the white man's future on this continent appears to be anything but promising.

Travel through many of the newly independent countries of Africa and you find that, where the African once was treated as inferior to the white "colonialist," the situation today is reversed. It is the black man who is becoming entitled to jobs and property, to the exclusion of the white man. Furthermore, one tribe discriminates against another—in fact, slavery is not unknown.

Kenya offers an example of the new twist to the race problem in Africa.

Kenya is to achieve full independence at the end of this year. Among the 7 million Africans is a white minority of 60,000—largely landowners—and an Indian minority of 165,000.

Kenya's black leaders say there will be no discrimination on the basis of race. Yet discrimination actually has begun. A white civil servant, who may have been born in Kenya and spent his entire life there, is likely as not to find his job taken over by an African of black skin. Idea is to "Africanize" the Government.

Thousands of white settlers, fearing what lies ahead, already have left. Value of rich farms, built up by whites, has been in a drastic decline.

Indians in Kenya live completely apart from both whites and blacks. There is little, if any, social mixing.

There is, moreover, little mixing among Kenya's 50 or more black tribes. Many fear domination by the Kikuyu tribe with its 1.5 million members. One tribe, the Masai, is of Nilo-Hamitic origin rather than Negro. It completely disdains association with other tribes and believes races should be kept completely separate. The Somalis of Northern Kenya want to secede and join their brethren in Somalia.

The Sudan, biggest country in Africa, practices both religious and racial segregation. The African tribes of the Southern Sudan, many of them Christian or pagan, are regarded as inferior by Arabs, who are Moslem. Few blacks, especially if they are Christians, can get jobs in the civil service. Intermarriage is infrequent.

In the Congo, the Lulua and Baluba tribes wage continual war. Around Leopoldville, the Bakongo tribe dreams of setting up a Bakongo nation. Many whites, since the end of Belgian rule, have been subjected to abuse, injury and even death by armed blacks.

The haughty desert tribe of Nigeria called the Fulani will not mix with the Hausas, who are of different stock. Fulanis consider themselves a superior race who ought naturally to be served by others.

Even in Liberia, discrimination is prevalent. "Americo-Liberians," descendants of U. S. slaves, run the country and do not mix easily with backward tribesmen.

"Integration" is not something that gets any real attention in black Africa.

ASIA: "Ghettos" and "Untouchables"

TOKYO

Nowhere in the great arc of East Asia, from Japan to India, is there a country free of racial antagonism or of discrimination against minorities.

Segregation is not sanctioned by law in any area. Yet "separateness" of minorities is enforced by popular attitudes far more severe than segregation in the U. S.

In Japan, for instance, Koreans who have spent all their lives in Japan live in "ghettos" because of economic and social pressures. They are scorned by the Japanese and are "second-class citizens" by any definition.

Another skeleton in Japan's closet consists of the Eta, the "untouchables" of Japan, who number an estimated 3 million. They are descendants of executioners, butchers, leather workers, potters, undertakers and umbrella makers.

In feudal times they could go outside their own villages only between sundown and sunrise. The class and segregated villages were abolished in 1871. Yet today there are at least 6,000 Japanese communities that are almost exclusively Eta, among the poorest in Japan.

Many firms unofficially discriminate against workers of Eta birth. Even now it is almost impossible for an Eta to marry outside the class. Each year, young couples commit

(continued on next page)

RACE TROUBLE—

IS IT THE SAME THE WORLD OVER?

[continued from preceding page]

suicide because one is Eta and parents refuse permission to marry. Vast increases in spending by the Government to upgrade the Eta have not changed popular attitudes.

Discrimination confronts Chinese living in practically every country of Southeast Asia.

In Indonesia, a presidential decree in 1959 prohibited alien traders—almost exclusively Chinese—from trading outside the main towns. An estimated 300,000 village shops closed their doors. Forty thousand Chinese, "encouraged" by the Government and unwilling to become Indonesian citizens, left the country for Red China.

Indonesia's remaining Chinese are subjected to periodic rioting by Indonesian students. Chinese homes and shops in many towns have been burned and looted recently.

Thailand, in the 1940s, declared 10 provinces and four urban areas "out of bounds" to Chinese. Twenty-seven occupations previously dominated by Chinese were reserved for Thai nationals. Chinese were forbidden to own land. The nationality law was amended in 1953 to provide that children born of Chinese mothers should not be Thai citizens.

South Vietnam, in 1956, ordered 500,000 locally born Chinese males to adopt Vietnamese names, pay taxes and register for military service. All other Chinese males were automatically classified as foreigners, barred from 11 trades and lines of business in which most were engaged at the time.

The Philippines, in 1954, forbade Chinese to start new retail enterprises or to pass along retail businesses to their heirs. Since then, the number of Chinese trade outlets in the Philippines has declined from 18,000 to 12,000. Last year, Chinese were banned from rice and corn-processing industries. They cannot own agricultural land.

Even in Malaya, where Chinese make up 43 per cent of the population, they are heavily discriminated against. State constitutions make certain types and areas of land available only to Malays. Quotas maintain a 4-to-1 ratio of Malays in government service and the armed forces. University scholarships generally go to Malays.

Red China, in its foreign propaganda, calls upon Africans and Asians to throw off "the white man's yoke." Recently, in its quarrel with the Soviet leadership over Red doctrine, it has claimed to speak for the colored races—and has identified Moscow, more and more, with the white race.

At home, however, China's Reds are intent on wiping out the identity of minorities in the thinly populated plains of Mongolia and the mountains of Tibet and southwest China.

Inner Mongolia was given "autonomy," but the area was expanded to include large chunks of territory inhabited by Chinese. In Tibet and Sinkiang, Chinese settlers were brought in from the outside. Chinese got most of the Government posts and Chinese was made a compulsory second language in the schools. Land reform and a succession of purges stripped minorities of jobs, animals and land.

Racial, tribal and religious hostilities abound in Asia. Indonesia's Javanese majority has troubles with the Sumatrans,

(continued on page 36)

—Black Star Photo

Negroes in Britain are discriminated against in jobs, restaurants and housing. Race riots in cities have led Parliament to limit immigration of nonwhites from Commonwealth.

Communist countries preach brotherhood of races but often practice discrimination. Negro students from Africa were beaten by Soviet youths for dancing with Russian girls.

—Sovfoto

—Pix Photo

British Guiana proves whites aren't necessary to provoke a racial conflict. Trouble there pits Negroes against descendants of laborers brought from India. General strikes and ill feeling between two races fuel explosive situation.

—Pix Photo

Teeming India is plagued by the world's most persistent example of segregation. The caste system, although abolished by law, survives. Many light-skinned Indians look down on those with darker skins.

RACE TROUBLE—

IS IT THE SAME THE WORLD OVER?

[continued from page 34]

and South Vietnam's Catholic-dominated Government takes time off from its war of survival against the Reds to crack down on Buddhist priests representing the religious views of a large majority of the people. In Laos, as well as South Vietnam, discrimination is practiced against mountain tribesmen.

Yet everywhere in Asia, one hears biting criticism of racial discrimination in the U. S. Nowhere is that criticism stronger than in India—itself plagued by the world's most spectacular example of segregation.

This segregation is based on caste, an integral part of orthodox Hinduism. It divides Hindus into four main castes ranging downward from Brahmans, who provide the core of Indian cultural and political leadership.

Each caste, in turn, has hundreds of subcastes based on clan, region or occupation. Outside the caste system are perhaps 60 million "untouchables."

From ancient times on, "untouchables" have been condemned to menial tasks such as cleaning latrines. They were forbidden use of certain temples, and could use only a special entrance of their own into the house of a caste Hindu where they were employed. In some extreme instances they could not let their shadow fall across a Brahman.

Race plays a role in the caste system. History indicates that caste was imposed by light-skinned Aryan invaders against dark-skinned inhabitants of India thousands of years ago. Color lines, since, have blurred. Even today, however, a light-skinned Brahman from the North is considered socially above a dark-skinned Brahman of Southern India.

Modern India has abolished "untouchability" by law. Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru and others decry segregation by caste. But thousands of "untouchable" villages still exist in India near villages reserved for caste Hindus. In the Gujarat area near Bombay, a survey not long ago showed 1,732 villages where "untouchables" still could not draw water from public wells.

Despite some breakdown of caste barriers among educated Hindus, marriage advertisements still specify caste in most cases—and often mention a "fair complexion."

Even Christians and Moslems of "untouchable" ancestry still find themselves cleaning latrines of caste Hindus. Some Christian churches in South India seat persons according to caste origins. It will be generations, informed Indians admit, before the world's harshest segregation is abolished in fact as well as law.

LATIN AMERICA: Indians Are "Cattle"

MEXICO CITY

Latin America, in the past, often has been pictured as having little racial trouble. But Latin Americans, more and more, are becoming aware of race.

Bitter racial conflict is developing in British Guiana, on the northeast corner of South America. Guiana shows that it doesn't take a white man to make a race problem.

(continued on page 38)

—United Nations Photo

Latin America has a wide and growing variety of racial problems. In Peru, millions of Indians are treated almost as serfs and are referred to by whites as "cattle." In Mexico and other countries, persons of lighter skins tend to dominate the ruling classes. In Haiti, blacks now prevail.

—USN&WR Photo

Black Africa is in the midst of an upheaval that finds the black man gaining power and treating the white man as an inferior. In Kenya, nearing independence, Masai tribe scorns association with other tribes. A sizable Indian minority lives completely apart from both blacks and whites.

—Claude Jacoby Photo

South Vietnam practices discrimination against mountain tribesmen. Government also deals harshly with Buddhist priests, who represent views of a large majority of the people. Just about everywhere in Southeast Asia, Chinese are victims of racial bars and regulations that often mean loss of jobs, property and rights.

—Annan Photo

Indians in Canada bump into many barriers in housing, jobs, recreation. French Canadians complain bitterly they are treated as "second-class citizens" by the majority whose background is English. Negroes also run into discrimination.

White settlers in Africa, fearful of a possible "blood bath" as blacks take over, are pulling out. Discrimination in Kenya has been reversed as Africans move into civil-service jobs held by whites.

—Black Star Photo

In Indonesia, discrimination against Chinese has full Government approval. Chinese traders are severely restricted and are subjected to periodic attacks by Indonesian students. Tribal hostilities also are the cause of flare-ups between the Javanese and Sumatrans.

—Wide World Photo

RACE TROUBLE—

IS IT THE SAME THE WORLD OVER?

[continued from page 36]

There, whites account for only 13,000 out of 560,000, as the country approaches independence. Negroes, and descendants of laborers brought from India, are almost equal in numbers—and racial trouble centers on them.

East Indians dominate the ruling party, and an East Indian, Cheddi Jagan, is Prime Minister. Since he came to power in 1961, however, there have been two serious riots involving Government and Negro-dominated labor unions.

A general strike, which began in late April, has heightened ill feeling between the two races and the situation now is considered explosive.

Elsewhere, it is the American Indian who often is discriminated against. In Peru, for example, millions of Indians are almost serfs and referred to by whites as "cattle."

Mexico and Brazil are held up as examples of countries where racial tolerance is the rule. Yet even in those countries, persons of lighter skins tend to dominate the ruling classes. In El Salvador, the social secretary of the country's leading hotel was fired when she allowed her skin to become too suntanned. Costa Rica, where 85 to 90 per cent of the population is white, looks dubiously on integration with other Central American countries which are predominantly Indian and of mixed blood.

In Haiti, the story is somewhat different. There, mulatto aristocrats who once were the country's coffee dealers and merchants have been imprisoned and killed, and their property has been stolen. President François Duvalier bases his power on the country's 90 per cent Negro majority, and employs street gangs and militia with a black-racist ideology.

RUSSIA: Negroes Beaten Up

VIENNA

In the Soviet empire, segregation is not officially practiced. Communist doctrine preaches brotherhood of races and condemns racism as a capitalist product.

The actual picture, however, is rather different.

Largest nonwhite group in Russia is that of yellow-skinned Moslems, constituting 10 per cent of the total population. They are found in Soviet Central Asia and along the Volga River. Large numbers of Russians have been brought into those areas to reduce the predominance of Moslems. Most important positions in government, business and the armed forces are held by Russians.

Since 1957, there has not been a Jew on the Communist Party's ruling Presidium. Only one Jew is found in a leading Government post.

Friction between white and black now is developing.

Negro students from Africa have complained that they were beaten up by Russian youths after dancing with Russian girls. Africans also complain of harassment on trolley cars, on streets and elsewhere.

Similar trouble is developing in satellite nations.

Last February, most of the 350 African students in Bulgaria decided to leave the country when authorities banned the Pan-African Students Union. Bulgarian students, the Africans said, "were not even willing to sit next to us, and they called us 'black apes.'"

In Czechoslovakia, reports told of a springtime brawl in Prague during which a crowd of 300 young Czechs beat an African student for 15 minutes. That evening, two African students were beaten up, and an African diplomat found all four of the tires slashed on his automobile.

These and similar stories are disillusioning to Africans who once saw the promise of racial equality under Communism.

CANADA: "Intolerance Is Widespread"

OTTAWA

In Canada, the "wrong" color, race or religion can be a severe handicap. By law there is no discrimination based upon either race or color. But a leading newspaper in Toronto recently noted that "intolerance is already widespread in Canada—directed not only at the Jews but at many other racial and religious groups."

French Canadians complain bitterly that they are "second-class citizens" dominated by Canadians of English background.

In Quebec Province, French Canadians have unleashed a campaign of terror to back up demands for secession from the other nine provinces.

Rigid quotas limit immigration of colored races from the West Indies and Asia. Canada's 32,000 Negroes often encounter discrimination in seeking jobs, meals in restaurants, or living accommodations.

A Negro couple in Halifax answered 60 advertisements of apartments without success. Negro tourists from the U. S. are sometimes turned away from resorts despite advance reservations and deposits.

Officially, Canada's 210,000 Indians are equal in every respect to other Canadians. Unofficially, they are often treated as pariahs, avoided whenever possible, and stereotyped as "dirty, drunken, shiftless Indians."

For example, an attempt to establish an Indian hostel in Winnipeg sparked emotional protests—even though the site was in a slum area.

In another Manitoba city, a survey revealed almost two thirds of the residents were prejudiced against Indians and halfbreeds.

Three out of four Canadian Indians still live on reservations—unable or unwilling to overcome prejudice and compete for jobs, housing and social acceptance on the "outside." One angry chief complained his band was suffering from lack of education, drastic unemployment, no medical care, unfair labor practices and indifferent federal officials. Here, as in the U. S., the problem of Indians—who once owned the country—tends to be overshadowed by that of Negroes and other minority groups.

Eskimos, numbering only a few thousand and seldom seen in urban centers, stir more curiosity than hostility. Even so, a Canadian white recently lost his job because he married an airline stewardess who is an Eskimo.

What turns up in Canada is just another version of the same story to be found in any part of the world which has differing races.

Mass murder on the scale practiced by Adolf Hitler in Germany against the Jews in the 1930s and 1940s is not countenanced by any government in the world today. But segregation or discrimination on a wide variety of grounds is being practiced wherever large minorities exist.

Even in countries where racial minorities are relatively small, you learn, there is racial antagonism. Often that antagonism is most violent in those countries which now profess horror at America's handling of its racial problem.

Related articles on pages 30, 39, 58, 61 and 62.

The New Leader
7/8/63

R+R Rel.

THINKING ALOUD

The Tightrope of Color

By Daniel Bell

MR. WILLIAM F. BUCKLEY JR. is of the "radical right"—not in the political sense of an extremist who would disrupt constitutional processes, but in the original literal paradox of the term. He seeks to go to the root of the matter (as a radical does) and (as is the conservative habit) always comes up with the same answer: "You can't change human nature."

This is Buckley's finding, in a recent issue of the National Review, concerning the color question. Reflecting on James Baldwin's essay, The Fire Next Time, Buckley says that what the Negro wants is an "evanescence of color" and that this is an impossible demand. He cites two instances of Balwin's humiliations—the first involving an Irish policeman who yelled at him as a child, "Go back to Harlem where the Niggers belong"; and the second, which occurred more recently, involving a bartender at a Chicago airport who refused him a drink on the disingenuous ground that he was under 21. Then Buckley asks: "How can such meanness be cured by legislation?" . . . "What shall we do in the new order to that policeman and that bartender? Shoot them? It is more to the point to shoot human nature, whence the troubles really come. . . ." And in his far-out fashion, Buckley concludes: "Pass a law that forbids bartenders from being rude to Negroes and you have passed a law forbidding human beings from being human beings. . . ."

The trouble with this reasoning is that it elides a basic distinction between prejudice and discrimination. Prejudice is an "attitude" which is not easily changed, whereas discrimination is an "act" which can be barred. If a policeman is brutal to an individual, one can strip him of his badge; true, it may not stop him from being sadistic, but it restricts his opportunities for being so. Similarly, one can say that a teacher who is mean to a child is not fit to be a teacher. The answer, though, is not to shoot him (which is what a Russian has seriously proposed) but to fire him. By penalizing discrimination, one is asserting the moral judgment of the community against these wrongdoers.

The problem of discrimination is a problem of law because it involves the cardinal principle of the "rule of law"—the principle of generality. In a public place, or a place open to the public, every individual should be treated equally. So while one does not "cure" meanness by legislation, one certainly can penalize those who are guilty of it, just as one penalizes any act of cruelty.

A different kind of "radical right" (with apologies to Mr. Buckley) is the Black Muslim movement. It is an index of the fever pitch of the color issue that few Negro spokesmen are now willing openly to condemn the Black Muslims, although they were six months ago. Last winter, Kenneth Clark, the Negro psychologist of the City College of New York, opposed Malcolm X, the Black Muslim leader, on a television program. Today, Professor Clark is quiet. James Baldwin has expressed some sympathy for the Black Muslim movement; so has Gordon Parks in a recent article in Life. And Adam Clayton Powell, that political chameleon, has openly allied himself with the Black Muslims.

Ideologically, Black Muslimism is a form of "chiliastic racism." To the Black Muslims, as C. Eric Lincoln has pointed out in his book, The Black Muslim in America, "every white man is a devil—the personification of evil. . . . In Muslim mythology, Black Man—'the Original Man'—was created by Allah, the one true God. The white man, however, is a 'made thing,' a beast, a synthetic man called into being by Yakub, the evil principle. . . . Since the white man is the son of the devil, the white man himself is a devil by nature and incapable of doing good."

In a paper he delivered to the Society for the Psychological Study of Social Issues, Lincoln cites press reports of Malcolm X's reaction last June to the news that 120 people from Atlanta, Georgia were killed in a crash on a flight out of Paris. Speaking to a gathering of Black Muslims in Los Angeles, Malcolm X declared:

"I would like to announce a very beautiful thing that has happened. . . . I got a wire from God today [laughter]. Wait, all right, well somebody came and told me that he really had answered our prayers in France. He dropped an airplane out of the sky with over 120 white people on it because the Muslims believe in an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. But thanks to God, or Jehovah, or Allah, we will continue to pray and we hope that every day another plane falls out of the sky."

In this respect, like every form of lower-class millenarianism, Black Muslimism's twisted hate creates an elan for its followers by an inverted form of superiority. It promises to its adherents a new order which will arise after the spilling of blood.

For the moment, the Black Muslims are in an enviable position. They preach a rhetorical militancy, but at no risk to themselves, since they will not engage in sit-downs, or demonstrate for jobs or voting rights, or conduct any other "integrationist" activity. Yet the movement constitutes a latent danger that could prove far more serious because it preaches a "righteous violence": When one can harness anger and aggression that derive from deep frustrations and resentment with an ideology that erases any guilt for murderous acts, one has all the passion of a jehad, or holy war. By lending respectability to such a movement the Negro intelligentsia is badly compromising itself.

WHEN ONE searches for the answer to the relevant question about the Negro agitation—why at this time and not before?—it becomes apparent that several elements have conjoined to precipitate racial tensions.

• The context is economic. For more than 15 years—during the period of relatively high employment from 1943 until roughly 1959—the Negro had begun to make economic gains, which were reflected in the increasing stability of Negro working-class family life. There was a new sense of expectation among Negroes for the education and advancement of their children, particularly as more Negroes came North. But the continuing high Negro unemployment rate of the last five years, which no one has wanted to notice until recently, has eroded these gains and increased the anxieties of the Negro community.

• The political promise made to Negroes has not been realized. The movement North has increased the Negro's political weight. In six states, the Negro vote is a virtual balance of power. The Kennedy victory (due in no small part to the rigged balloting in Chicago's colored South Side, which gave the Illinois electoral votes to the Democrats) gave the Negro leadership entree to the new Administration, but then they were told that civil rights would have to take a back seat to other political reforms.

• The new states of sub-Sahara Africa have heightened the color consciousness and pride of the American Negro. He has felt a new—and perhaps ominous—sense of the changeability of history, with the color issue coming to the fore on the world political scene. America's ardent courtship of the new African bloc at the United Nations could only, after all, increase the sense of discrepancy between the actions of the Government abroad and at home.

• Finally, there has been a new competition for leadership among the various Negro organizations. The Urban League had staked its claim to leadership on the grounds of increasing economic opportunity; the NAACP had taken the leadership in pressing for legal redress of Negro rights. But economic opportunities are increasingly difficult to find and legal progress has been slow, and both organizations have been unwilling, until recently, to mobilize the restive Negro community. In Martin Luther King Jr. and his theory of nonviolent resistance the Negroes found a new symbol and a new method of effective combat. In the dramatic action of the Freedom Riders and such revivifying organizations as CORE, the Negroes have found new leadership.

The present Negro mood has been compared to a revolutionary situation. Such comparisons are inexact. Revolutions usually occur when governmental authority has broken down, either because of corruption, an inability or unwillingness to act, or loss of support from the people. None of these conditions are true of the United States today. Unfortunately, what is true about protest movements, such as the Negro civil rights movement, is that when legitimate demands are thwarted and long overdue reforms that have been morally sanctioned are not made, then extremist elements take over. The failure of Congress to act can only compromise the moderate elements (already they fear the label!) among the Negro leadership.

With President Kennedy's speech on civil rights, the issue has shuffled back from the streets to the "legislative halls." And the issue has been joined not only politically—and sociologically as Mr. Buckley failed to see in his elision of prejudice and discrimination—but philosophically as well.

In a subtle sense, and not for the first time, the "right" is learning the old lesson that democracy is always a choice between relative rights. When the President proposed that all private establishments catering to the public be forced to serve all comers, Senators Goldwater and Dirksen raised the question of "infringement" upon property rights, and therefore of "freedom." In their litany, property rights is an absolute and freedom is an abstract noun. But can they be?

Is there not in this instance the rival claim of human personality not to be degraded by considerations (of race, color and class) which negate a person's right to be treated as an individual? Telling a storekeeper that he must serve everyone is an infringement on his use of property. But how ludicrous an infringement when weighed against the rival claim of equal treatment in a place of commerce!

Today, different rights are restricting the exercise of older, established property rights. This is not an abridgement of freedom; it is an abridgement of property. But the change has come about through free debate and through democratic consensus, and the legislative means of redress are still open. What we have, then, is not a loss of freedom, for we are being asked to choose freely between two rights.

JUL 15 1963

R&R Rel-

AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS

STEPHEN WISE CONGRESS HOUSE • 15 EAST 84TH STREET • NEW YORK 28, N.Y. • TRAFALGAR 9-4500

COMMISSION ON LAW AND SOCIAL ACTION

EPHRAIM S. LONDON, Chairman
HOWARD M. SQUADRON, Vice Chairman
ADRIAN M. UNGER, Vice Chairman

CHARLES ABRAMS
ALBERT E. ARENT
MORRIS BERICK
SAMUEL L. BRENNG[illegible]
JAMES M. BU[illegible]
ROBE[illegible] CARR
[illegible]NUEL CELLER
BENJAMIN V. COHEN
ROBERT E. CUSHMAN
NORMAN DORSEN
MELVIN DUBINSKY
JULIUS C. C. EDELSTEIN
ERWIN B. ELLMANN
THOMAS I. EMERSON
EDWARD J. ENNIS
IRVING JAY FAIN
DAVID FELLMAN
THOMAS K. FINLETTER
ABE FORTAS
OSMOND K. FRAENKEL
LAWRENCE H. FUCHS
HORTENSE W. GABEL
ELMER GERTZ
MARCUS GINSBURG
NATHAN GLAZER
HAROLD K. GOLDSTEIN
MURRAY A. GORDON
JACK GREENBERG
DONALD HARRINGTON
JEROME R. HELLERSTEIN
MARK DeWOLFE HOWE
ALFRED J. KAHN
HARRY KALVEN, JR.
MILTON R. KONVITZ
WILLIAM M. KUNSTLER
JAMES M. LANDIS
ALFRED McCLUNG LEE
A. LEO LEVIN
LOUIS E. LEVINTHAL
LEONARD W. LEVY
STANLEY H. LOWELL
JOHN A. MACKAY
ROBERT B. McKAY
BERNARD S. MEYER
BYRON S. MILLER
ROBERT R. NATHAN NATHANIEL NATHANSON
KENNETH OKA
G. BROMLEY OXNAM
ISAAC PACHT
CHARLES C. PARLIN
JUSTINE WISE POLIER
SHAD POLIER
LOUIS H. POLLACK
GEORGE POSTEL
EMANUEL RACKMAN
JOSEPH L. RAUH, JR.
NORMAN REDLICH
ARNOLD M. ROSE
EDWARD S. SILVER
JACK WASSERMAN
JACK B. WEINSTEIN
JACOB J. WEINSTEIN
LEWIS H. WEINSTEIN
RUTH G. WEINTRAUB
ALAN F. WESTIN
ROY WILKINS
A. L. WIRIN

July 10, 1963

LEO PFEFFER, Director
JOSEPH B. ROBISON, Assistant Director

Dear Friend:

Some Further Reflections Upon the Revolution of Our Times.

During recent weeks it has become almost commonplace to describe as revolutionary the forward thrust of the Negro community in the United States toward the achievement of equal status and the elimination of barriers of discrimination and segregation. What seems to me to be overlooked is that the revolutionary character of the situation arises not only out of the immediacy and breadth of their demands. Its character derives equally from the nature of the response of the white community. That response, with some exceptions, has been resistant, grudging or inadequate.

It is a sad commentary upon our times that even the proposed "Civil Rights Act of 1963" sponsored by President Kennedy reflects a basic misconception of the role which the Federal Government should and must play in the vital areas of school desegration and the elimination of discrimination in places of public accommodation such as hotels, restaurants, theatres, bowling alleys and retail stores. Moreover, at this moment there are few, if any, voices that have been raised in protest against these halfway measures. On the contrary, even these palliatives are likely to be seriously challenged as the legislation undergoes debate in Congress.

The gap between what the Administration's bill proposes and what is urgently needed is perhaps most easily seen in connection with the issue of school desegregation. Since the decision of the Supreme Court in 1954 it has been settled law that segregation in public schools violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Even before 1954 it was clear that segregation in public colleges and universities was invalid under that constitutional provision. Yet the fact is that today in the deep South less than 2% of the Negro public school population are attending desegregated schools. Unlike the situation in other parts of the country - about which more later - only a small part of this continued segregation can be accounted for or explained as a result of de facto housing segregation and the application of the traditional principle of

NATIONAL OFFICERS

JOACHIM PRINZ, President
SHAD POLIER, Chairman Governing Council
JULIAN FREEMAN, Co-Chairman Governing Council
SOLOMON N. PETCHERS, Treasurer
JACOB LEICHTMAN, Co-Treasurer
THEODORE J. KOLISH, Secretary
WILL MASLOW, Executive Director

Vice-Presidents:
FRANK ABRAMS, New York
PAUL G. ANNES, Chicago
WILLIAM S. COHEN, St. Louis
MAX DOFT, New York
MAX A. KOPSTEIN, Chicago
LEON KRONISH, Miami Beach
STANLEY H. LOWELL, New York
HOWARD M. METZENBAUM, Cleveland
I. H. PRINZMETAL, Beverly Hills
THELMA RICHMAN, Philadelphia
IRVING ROSENBLATT, JR., San Francisco
HARRY E. SCHACTER, New York
HOWARD M. SQUADRON, New York
GUS J. SOLOMON, Portland
LILLIAN STEINBERG, New York
SIDNEY STONEMAN, Boston
ADRIAN UNGER, New Jersey

Honorary President
ISRAEL GOLDSTEIN, Jerusalem

Honorary Vice-Presidents:
SIGMUND W. DAVID, Chicago
SIDNEY HOLLANDER, Baltimore
HORACE M. KALLEN, New York
JAMES N. ROSENBERG, New York
ISIDOR TEITELBAUM, New York

fixing school district lines so as to preserve neighborhood schools. Furthermore, at the college and university level so few Negroes have been admitted to formerly all-white institutions in the South that it would be an exaggeration to describe the present condition as one of token integration. The proverbial Man from Mars might wonder that after almost a decade such a disparity could exist between the constitutionally guaranteed right to desegregated education and the almost complete nullification of that right in practice.

The answer, it seems to me, lies in the fact that until now the role of the Federal government has, in effect, been limited to providing a judicial system to which Negroes could resort for the purpose of securing the enforcement of their rights and, in particularly critical situations, to employing the Armed Forces to secure compliance with court orders. Otherwise, the Federal government has, by and large, remained indifferent, albeit the Department of Justice has repeatedly filed briefs amicus curiae in the Federal courts in support of the position of Negro plaintiffs and has intervened on occasions to institute contempt proceedings against defiant school and other public authorities. Otherwise - with the exception of several suits brought by the Department in the name of the United States to bar segregation in schools located in "impacted" areas built and sustained with Federal funds - the Federal government has left to the Negro community the burden of converting its constitutional rights into realities.

This situation in my judgment utterly misconceives what should be the role of the Federal government. In the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960 it was recognized that the burden could no longer be left upon the Negro community to enforce its constitutionally guaranteed right to register and to vote. It had become obvious that reliance on the right of the Negro to resort to the courts on his own behalf was unrealistic. In my opinion it is no less unrealistic to expect that private suits can achieve desegregation in public educational institutions. The time has come, therefore, to recognize that it is no less vital to the national interest that there be an effective means of implementing the right to desegregated education and it is essential in this area as well that the burden be assumed by the Federal government.

To be viewed against this background are the limited proposals that are contained in the Administration's bill authorizing the Attorney General, upon written complaint by aggrieved persons, to institute suits in the Federal courts against public schools, colleges and universities practicing segregation. Before instituting a suit the Attorney General must certify that the complainant is "unable to initiate and maintain appropriate legal proceedings." Such certification requires a further finding that either (1) the complainant cannot bear the expense of litigation or obtain a lawyer "directly or through other interested persons or organizations:" or (2) there is reason to believe that bringing a suit would jeopardize complainant's economic standing or result in injury or economic damage to himself or his family.

The first of these two conditions would, in effect, impose a "means test" upon persons seeking the aid of the Federal government for the purpose of securing the implementation of a Federal right. Obviously, such a test cannot be justified on the ground that it would result in avoiding unnecessary or unwarranted expenditure of public moneys. The entire cost of an all-out use of the Department of Justice to secure the right of desegregated education would amount to a mere pittance in the total Federal budget. Moreover, the national interest in assuring to every child that he will not be segregated in his education for life is of such great social value that it is ridiculous to weigh the matter in terms of additional cost to the Federal government.

The means test is further objectionable in that it does not even measure the financial responsibility of Negro parents in terms of their personal resources. It would, in effect, require such organizations as the NAACP Defense Fund to certify that they were unable to obtain sufficient charitable contributions to cover the expenses of legal proceedings. That the Government of the United States should assume such a posture seems to me to be both fantastic and indecent.

The alternative condition which the bill would impose as a prerequisite to suit being brought by the Department of Justice is less obnoxious but hardly less sound. The time has certainly passed when the danger of economic and physical injury to Negro families should be a consideration in determining whether they, rather than the Federal government, should bring suit to secure desegregated education. Like the first condition, it misconceives the interests involved. It regards the interest as being solely that of the Negroes seeking desegregated education. The interest is that of the entire nation.

What has been said above with respect to segregated education is, in my judgment, even more clearly true with respect to the provisions of the bill which would enact a Federal statute prohibiting discrimination in places of public accommodation. Undoubtedly, Congress has plenary power to adopt such a law in the exercise of the power granted by the Constitution to "regulate commerce among the several States," quite apart from its power to implement the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment prohibiting the states from denying any person the equal protection of the laws. While thus far the debate before Congressional committees has largely been concerned with whether Congress should rest this part of the bill on the Commerce Clause or the Equal Protection Clause, that discussion misses the heart of the matter. Also quite beside the mark is the Congressional debate over "interference with property rights." Obviously, property rights will have to be curbed if human rights are to be protected.

What so far has not occupied the attention either of Congress or the press, is the fact that the enforcement of the proposed Federal rights with respect to public accommodations without discrimination would be, in effect, left to enforcement by private suits brought by aggrieved persons. True, the Attorney General would be authorized to bring suit upon written complaint, but only under the same restrictions as would apply to the institution of suits to secure desegregated education. All of the criticism levelled above against such restrictions upon the Department of Justice are applicable with respect to the public accommodation provisions of the bill. In fact they are here even more pertinent.

It is nothing short of absurd to expect that the Negro community will - or should - cease their demonstrations to achieve the right of enjoyment of places of public accommodation and turn instead to suits in the Federal courts on a case-by-case basis against each individual place of public accommodation. To expect the Negro community to yield its demand for equality now in exchange for the opportunity to carry on litigation seems quite fatuous thinking. Plainly, what is required is that the Federal government directly assume the responsibility for the implementation in the courts of the public accommodation provisions of the bill.

It would be a grave mistake to conceive of the revolutionary crisis of our times as a Southern phenomenon. Sit-ins and other demonstrations in Northern cities these past few weeks should be sufficient to disabuse anyone of such a thought. Indeed, what is happening in Northern cities should teach that the situation which the nation faces requires an entirely new approach even where there is an absence of state or local policies of discrimination or segregation, and even where there are commissions charged with barring such practices in employment, housing and public accommodations.

Thus, the Negro community in the North is no longer willing to tolerate segregated education on the excuse that it is the inevitable consequence of de facto housing segregation and can not be remedied until the Negro emerges from the ghettoes. This increasingly sharp struggle against segregated education in the public schools of the North reflects to a considerable extent the fact that schools in Negro neighborhoods have provided not only separate but unequal education. They have been not only overcrowded and understaffed but, all too often, staffed by the least qualified teachers. Little account has been taken and less has been done to provide in such public schools for the additional educational aids which children coming from culturally deprived and economically depressed homes require in order to realize their potentials as human beings.

Demonstrations by Negroes seeking employment on construction projects and demanding job quotas and sit-ins in apartment houses and real estate developments reflect, it seems to me, a basic lack of confidence in commissions as an instrumentality for remedying the accrued injuries of past decades. We are, it may be ventured, facing the consequence of limiting commissions to dealing with discrimination on the basis of individual complaints and on a case-by-case basis.

There has long been a failure to provide the Negro community with adequate social services. Instead the general community has thought in terms of "relief" to the destitute - and the Negro is no longer willing to accept that status. Even in such a prosaic matter as garbage collection, services have not taken account of the greater needs of crowded slum areas.

In large measure these shortcomings of Northern cities reflect indifference and apathy toward the poor in general. However, since the Negro makes up so large a part of our poor he has, in practice, been the principal victim. This has been especially true since he has been confined to the slums with little opportunity for escape from such surroundings.

In his struggle for decency and equality the Negro community is fighting a battle whose fruits will be enjoyed by all of the disadvantaged. It is paradoxical that the Negro, the least advantaged, should in his revolutionary struggle become the vanguard in the clash between the haves and the haves-not in American society.

We do, indeed, live in a revolutionary period. It behooves all Americans to apply themselves to the end that the revolution will succeed and that it will not degenerate into civil war.

Sincerely yours,

Shad Polier

Shad Polier

RACE RIOTS OF THE PAST: A WORRY FOR THE FUTURE

Look at U. S. race riots of the past, and you see why alarm is growing about the danger today.

Scores died and hundreds were hurt in such riots as those in Chicago and Washington, D. C., in 1919, and in Detroit in 1943.

Now race tension rises again.

Americans once again are hearing worried talk about the possibility of race riots.

What's causing such talk at this time is the spread of mass demonstrations as a Negro strategy in their campaign for civil rights, and the repeated outbursts of violence that have grown out of those demonstrations.

Several times in recent months, large-scale race riots have been averted only narrowly as crowds of angry Negroes came face to face with crowds of angry white people.

To see what people are worried about now, one need only look at some of the race riots that have occurred in this country in the past.

Detroit, 1943. Of big race riots in the U. S., the most recent took place in Detroit, Mich., in June, 1943. In that riot, 34 persons were killed.

The causes behind Detroit's riot were similar to situations that exist in many big Northern cities today.

Some 50,000 Negroes had swarmed into Detroit during the early years of World War II to work in booming war plants.

Housing was short, especially for Negroes, and thousands of Negroes found themselves jammed into an area known as Paradise Valley. There was competition between whites and Negroes for jobs and promotions. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People was demanding equal treatment for the newly arrived Negroes. Racial tension mounted steadily.

On June 20, 1943, a Negro and a white man got into a fist fight on Detroit's Belle Isle Bridge. It was Sunday evening and the bridge was crowded with slow-moving traffic. It was hot, and tempers were short. The fist fighting spread. Soon hundreds of whites and Negroes were swinging at each other. Sailors based nearby charged into the melee. Within an hour, it had turned into a full-scale race riot.

Rumors fanned the flames. One rumor, originating in a Negro night club, was that whites had killed a Negro mother and baby.

Whites were told that Negroes had attacked white women.

Negroes began charging through the streets, beating and stabbing whites. Groups of whites began attacking Negroes. Guns were brought into play. An attempt by whites to march into the Negro district was halted by police.

On Monday, as rioting continued, President Franklin D. Roosevelt proclaimed a state of emergency and sent 6,000 U. S. troops into the city. It took them two days to restore order.

When the fighting ended on June 23, there were 25 Negroes and 9 white persons dead, at least 700 persons injured. Property valued at several hundred thousand dollars had been destroyed.

Washington, 1919. The year of 1919 was the worst for race riots in U. S. history. There were riots in at least 25 cities scattered across the nation.

One of the worst was in Washington, D. C., the nation's capital. It began on July 19. It was touched off, apparently, by newspaper stories alleging a wave of assaults by Negroes upon white women. White soldiers, sailors and marines began beating up Negroes.

Fighting spread. On the third day of sporadic violence, a mob of whites tried to invade a Negro section of the city. Negroes turned out in large numbers to fight off the invaders.

Finally, federal troops were ordered

DETROIT SAW VIOLENCE EXPLODE 20 YEARS AGO

—Wide World Photo

Whites pursuing a Negro, extreme right, swarm across Detroit's main thoroughfare in one of series of disturbances that left 34 dead, 700 injured in 1943.

—Detroit "Free Press" Photo

DETROIT TODAY. More than 120,000 demonstrators jammed streets in a peaceful protest against segregation.

into action and, with the help of a heavy rainstorm, they managed to suppress the rioting.

Several persons were reported killed and scores were injured in this riot.

Negroes at that time numbered only about one fourth of the capital's population. Today it is estimated that more than 57 per cent of Washington's residents are Negroes.

Chicago, 1919. A week after the Washington riot, an even worse riot began in Chicago, Ill.

Chicago, then as now, was being inundated by waves of Negro immigrants from the South, seeking jobs and an escape from segregation. In less than a decade, Chicago's Negro population had more than doubled. There was racial friction over jobs, over housing and over recreation areas.

As Negroes spread into white neighborhoods, whites began bombing Negro homes. In June, two Negroes were killed.

On July 27, at a Lake Michigan beach, a young Negro swimmer drifted into water customarily used only by whites. Some whites threw stones to drive him away. When the Negro sank and drowned, Negroes accused the whites of murdering him.

Fighting broke out between whites and Negroes in various parts of the city. Mobs formed. Negroes were pulled off streetcars and whipped. Several whites were stabbed.

On the fourth day of the riot, the militia was called out. But still the rioting went on. It lasted 13 days.

Final toll of Chicago's riot: 38 persons killed—15 whites and 23 Negroes; 537 injured—178 whites, 342 Negroes and 17 of unrecorded race. More than 1,000 families, mostly Negroes, were left without homes by burning and other forms of destruction.

During the next two months of 1919, riots broke out in other cities, among them Knoxville, Tenn., and Omaha, Nebr.

Two years later, in June of 1921, there were nine whites and 21 Negroes killed and several hundred people injured in a race riot in Tulsa, Okla.

For a decade after World War II, the nation got by with almost no racial violence. Then, with the U. S. Supreme Court ruling against segregated schools in 1954, the race issue began heating up again. Violence has accompanied integration attempts in many places.

So far, race war on the scale of 1919 and 1943 has been avoided.

Now, as mass demonstrations spread and violence erupts in one city after another, the worry grows: Is the U. S. in danger of another outbreak of killing in race riots?

CHICAGO ERUPTED IN RIOTS IN 1919

Photos: UPI, Brown Brothers

Crowds leave beach after incident that set off rioting. A Negro boy had swum in area used by whites. He had been stoned, then sank and drowned.

Whites hurl stones at a Negro. In 13 days of terror after the drowning, mobs formed, Negroes were whipped, whites stabbed.

The militia was called out on fourth day in a futile attempt to quell the disturbances going on all over Chicago. In a year marked by riots, this was worst.

Negroes are escorted by police to a safety zone. Friction in city had been building for months as Negroes moved in from South.

Fire left thousands homeless. This was typical scene in the immigrant sections.

Look
7/16/63
R & A Rel.

The coming showdown in the race crisis

BY HARRY S. ASHMORE

Former editor, Arkansas Gazette. Winner of the Pulitzer Prize and the Sidney Hillman Award.

IN THE FIRST capitol of the old Confederacy, a little backcountry politician leaned across a big desk and barked defiance at the United States of America. The law according to Gov. George C. Wallace provides that the Negroes of Alabama shall have only those rights the white majority sees fit to give them; any effort to change this condition of servitude, by Federal court order or peaceful demonstration, will be resisted, even though blood may flow.

In New York City, a slender Negro author emerged from a conference with the Attorney General of the United States and charged the nation's leaders with naïve inability to recognize that massive racial violence impends not only in Alabama, but all across the land. The prophecy according to James Baldwin warns of a consuming fire, kindled by the white man's guilt, that could lay waste the whole of Western civilization.

These are the poles of an emotional charge that periodically shocks a complacent nation. They mark the new limits of an old issue. Somewhere in between lies the reality of the stubborn, complex social problem most Americans do not yet understand and can no longer avoid.

Governor Wallace can cause trouble, but he cannot prevail. The feudal system he seeks to maintain has been falling apart under its own weight for more than a generation. Now, he has been deserted by the responsible Alabamians who permitted, if they did not encourage, the intervention of his blue-helmeted troopers in Birmingham. Those whose power is recognized in the title Big

continued

ite-Negro relations in the U. S.?

PHOTOGRAPHED BY BOB ADELMAN

Negroes join hands to keep from being knocked down by water from the fire hoses used in Birmingham. "Responsible"

Mules are still balky, but they have decided to get back to making money.

Mr. Baldwin can lend momentum to the drive for Negro rights, but he can produce neither the millennium nor the holocaust. His tortured eloquence flutters the intellectual, and his revolutionary words thrill the alienated of all complexions. The mass of American Negroes do not reject the existing social order, but seek only to share fully in its bourgeois blessings.

This does not mean that there is no prospect of a wholesale collision between whites and Negroes that could produce the first full-scale race riot in a generation. The spark of violence glows in every major city, and in most it is being systematically fanned. Yet, after nine years of rising tension in the wake of the Supreme Court's landmark school-desegregation decision, the great struggle so far has produced only the number of corpses normally handled by a metropolitan police morgue on a hot Saturday night.

This is hardly a statistic to be cited with pride. But, even if angry events were to revise the figure upward, the record would still stand as a significant measure of the gap between the rhetoric and reality of the crusade for Negro rights.

Actual, organized violence is in fact an unthinkable weapon for the Negro leaders. But the threat of violence is presently their most valuable tool, made doubly so, ironically, because it was first fashioned by their declared enemies in the embattled fiefs of Dixie.

In the beginning of the current struggle, doom-saying was used as effectively to inhibit Negro progress as it is now being used to promote it. John Bartlow Martin, returning from a tour of the region in 1957, entitled his report: The Deep South Says "Never!" He had reported what he had heard, and most of those with whom he talked believed what they told him—that the white folks would rise up en masse if a colored man set foot across the existing boundaries of segregation. The Eisenhower Administration held a similar view of the Southern temper and, in the critical early years, neither took action to implement the Supreme Court decisions nor uttered a forceful word.

The premise met its first real challenge in Little Rock, when Gov. Orval Faubus employed state troops to turn back nine Negro children from Central High School. The subsequent melodrama tended to obscure a revealing fact: Even with the Governor's strongly implied blessing, considerable effort was required to assemble a mob sufficient to overwhelm a small force of dispirited local policemen. Most of the leaders and much of the rank and file came from outside the city, and many were from out of state. The Arkansas mob had about as much spontaneity as the regiment of U. S. airborne infantry that arrived to clear the streets in a brisk action of 15 minutes' duration.

DESPITE THE miles of shocking television film, and the handful of demonstrators, U. S. marshals and reporters who have been blooded, this has been the basic pattern of every Southern encounter since. The Citizens Councils still attempt to nurture the delusion that the white people of the South are ready to resume the Civil War, and they continue to encourage mob action by predicting it. Most politicians and too many newspaper editors follow the line. Overtly or covertly, the bullyboys are urged to assemble wherever there is an impending showdown. But in New Orleans, the front line was reduced to snarling women, and their weapon was spittle. At Oxford, Miss., a rallying cry was sounded by a tragic ex-soldier from Texas. There was a stirring moment when Gen. Edward Walker mounted a Confederate monument to harangue the crowd. But the thousands he had urged to march on Oxford didn't appear; it was a thin line that finally went against the tear gas of the marshals.

Superior Federal force and a demonstrated willingness to employ it obviously are controlling factors. But perhaps more significant is the absence of adverse mass reaction to such intervention. The psychological-warfare experts among the architects of massive resistance calculated that occupying Federal troops would solidify their support by stirring atavistic memories among the sons and daughters of the Lost Cause. Orators still cry out in the tone of Confederate bugles, but in fact the arrival of the Army has been greeted everywhere with a general feeling of relief that the situation is once again in hand.

There is not, in the end, any symbolic difference between a U. S. marshal's badge and a soldier's uniform. What counts is that every Southerner now must assume that sustained strife will bring in armed agents of the Federal Government, that they mean business and that there are more where they came from. Even when the resistance leaders fall back to the last resort of terror in the night, as the wilder ones usually do, they can no longer rely on sympathetic law-enforcement officers who look the other way. The ubiquitous FBI can't be reached or intimidated, and may have as many informers inside the Ku Klux Klan as it has in the Communist party. Little Rock's dynamiters were identified before the dust had settled and were in jail before the debris had been cleared.

The South's traditional capacity for unreality is such that these lessons could be taught only by demonstration. It has required a continuing assault to break down the elaborate Southern mythology that rested upon the assumption Negroes were really content with their lot and could be stirred to protest only by meddling Yankees. This belief served to ease consciences pricked by the unavoidable evidence of casual cruelty and pervasive inequity. On the practical level, it was used to support the argument of the old-time peace officers that a tough line was all that was required to put down any incipient unrest in "niggertown." The formula was simple, and had been effective in the past: Rap a few skulls, throw the ringleaders in jail and run the agitators out of town. Eugene (Bull) Connor fashioned a considerable political career out of Birmingham's misplaced faith in force. But despite the dogs and fire hoses and overflowing jail cells, the Negroes kept coming, and it was Bull who had to go.

Alabamians no longer back Governor Wallace in such action, the author says.

The tragedy of the era lay in the emotional refusal of the Southern white people to recognize that times had changed, and so had the quality, the aspirations and the capacity of the Negro community. Those leaders who pointed to the evidence and pleaded for rational adjustment of the moribund social system were accused of treason and for the most part fell silent. Thus, by a process of elimination, the hard-core states elevated to power men who were ignorant or blinded by prejudice, or both. For ten years now, Southern legislatures, city councils and school boards have been largely engaged in the enactment of laws that were calculated exercises in bad faith. Lawyers of standing have grown rich manipulating legal technicalities in briefs that could succeed only if they were endorsed by an exchange of sly winks between judge and counsel.

This sort of moral corruption cannot be confined to the single issue of race, and there are signs of spreading rot at every level of government. In these terms, as well as in lost economic opportunity, Southerners are finding the price of maintaining segregation intolerable.

The Southern experience with the racial problem is unique only in detail and degree. The American dilemma had its focus in the region until recent years, and in important ways Southerners have been specially conditioned by their tragic history and their comparative poverty. Yet as the Negro population has spread across the nation and concentrated in big-city ghettoes, white Americans everywhere have displayed a comparable inability to come to grips with the moral issue and the practical problems posed by these second-class citizens. Wherever circumstances and geography have permitted, there has been a white retreat before the Negro invasion, and the Southern mythology, with its overtones of white supremacy and its unfounded obsession with miscegenation, has gained general currency in white suburbia. Where contact has been inescapable, there usually has appeared a familiar pattern of economic and social discrimination, calculated degradation and, at the extreme, hysteria.

It is against this background that Negroes have moved, in less than a generation, from the passive role of supplicants to active participation in a mass crusade against the form and substance of inequality. To this point, the tide of history has run with them, and they have been supported by the national conscience. Even in the South, the devotion of most whites to the status quo has been countered by a sense of personal guilt. At the ethical operating level, the United States Supreme Court has systematically translated the Constitution's libertarian spirit into the law of the land. Having won every critical test before the bar, Negroes can now carry their protest onto the sidewalks of the Deep South with the full protection of the Federal presence.

The parallel between Southern white resistance and the Negro crusade is striking and significant. One begot the other, and, substituting black for white, the language, the symbols, even the characteristics of the most conspicuous leaders and organizations are interchangeable.

At the far limits are the Ku Klux Klan and the Black Muslims—both ostensibly committed to the same declared aim, absolute segregation of the races. Both are secret societies that indulge in mystical, quasi-religious activities and rig up the faithful in uniforms. Both are ardent dues collectors. Both have a great fondness for parades and rallies and unbounded faith in their ability to intimidate their enemies. Both preach unbridled racial hatred and covertly encourage violence. Many of the past national leaders of the Klan have wound up in prison, usually on fraud charges, and Malcolm X., the most active of the Muslim apostles, is a former jailbird.

Or consider General Walker and James Baldwin. Both are men of education and attainment, fully endowed with the status symbols of their respective trades. Both came late to the racial battlefield, and have long been isolated from the rank and file for whom they now profess to speak—General Walker in the course of a distinguished military career, Baldwin in the years of literary exile that brought him deserved recognition as a writer. General Walker is unable to turn his back completely on his red-necked followers, or Baldwin on the Black Muslims, although both are obviously socially discomfited. Both deal with the race problem in stirring terms of personal, apocalyptic visions: General Walker sees the Visigoths of communism already over the walls, and Baldwin thinks a dark-skinned host has assembled at Armageddon. These revelations give each an exclusive patent on the verities. General Walker finds even so stalwart an anti-Communist as Sen. Thomas Dodd "blind" on home-grown subversion, and Baldwin believes Martin Luther King has reached the end of his rope.

The most notable political leaders also pair out neatly. Orval Faubus of Arkansas and Adam Clayton Powell of Harlem are wily old professionals who have found in the race issue the key to

continued

A Negro woman who was knocked down during a Birmingham demonstration is led away by friends.

"Orval Faubus and Adam

what appears to be permanent office. When he needs to be reelected, Governor Faubus simply hollers, "Nigger!" When Congressman Powell faces similar necessities, he cries, "Discrimination!" If this tends to cut them off from their political colleagues, who can't afford to say so, but with reason consider each a liability to his cause, it has its compensations. Powell is able to travel at public expense, and Faubus has the pleasure of operating the most comprehensive state political machine since the late Huey Long's.

THESE and men like them have made most of the headlines that mark the steady progress of the Negro crusade. They are eternally ready to provide reporters with a harsh word and a dire prediction. They are in fact prime figures in the action and reaction, and the history of the period doubtless would have been different without them. Yet they are symbols, not leaders. They have been able to unleash powerful emotions, but the task of controlling the resulting force for coherent purpose has been left to others. For the white Southern leadership, the failure is clear and final; segregation cannot endure. For the Negro leadership, the test is only beginning.

It is at least possible that recovery from the emotional excesses of the recent past will serve to further reduce the incidence and virulence of Southern bigotry. In the period of convalescence ahead, white Southerners will be required to form new institutions and arrangements to replace those they can no longer doubt are unacceptable to their Negro neighbors. They have no real choice except to examine the possibility that they have nothing to lose and much to gain by seeing to it that Negroes reach their declared goals of increased economic opportunity and unlimited access to the facilities and amenities of the community. Not the least of the benefits could be the restoration of the bonds of genuine affection between whites and Negroes that enriched the older Southern tradition.

An increasing share of the burden of creating the necessary conditions for this development in the South, and for maintaining them in the North, is passing to the Negro leadership. The process that has contained the manifestations of white bigotry has encouraged the expression of Negro bigotry—and this has had inevitable response among a people whose grievances are real.

There has emerged a set of Negro myths as dangerous and as debilitating as their white Southern counterparts. The basic proposition here is that no white man can really understand how a Negro feels. This, in effect, accepts the argument of white racists that Negroes are inherently different. Since Negroes can hardly be expected to equate racial difference with inferiority, the result is the spurious doctrine of black supremacy long preached on the street corners of Harlem and now heard in more respectable precincts.

At its crudest, the Negro mythology has produced the Black Muslims and their effort to exploit the emotional response of American Negroes to the racial unrest that doomed colonialism in Africa and Asia. The identification of the Black Muslims with the true sons of Allah is about as valid as the Ku Klux Klan's claim to the traditions of the Scottish Highlands. Negroes have been in this country as long as any other Americans, and there has been no mass immigration since the slave trade was banned more than a century ago. The historic relationship of American Negroes to Africa is now devoid of cultural or religious significance. It is purely a matter of pigmentation, and this, as they discover at every point of contact with genuine African nationalists, is of minor consequence.

Clayton Powell both see the race issue as the key to permanent office."

At a more sophisticated level, it is argued that the unique Negro experience under slavery and enforced segregation has had a purifying effect on those who suffered it. Baldwin, who occasionally seems to confuse himself with Job, gives the proposition a religious cast, contending that the black man represents a kind of original white sin, which, by means never made entirely clear, must be purged. Norman Mailer, Jack Kerouac and other avant-garde white novelists have attempted to distill out of the jazz, marijuana and uninhibited sex of the Negro Bohemian fringe the thesis that only alienation reveals ultimate truth.

THESE FANTASIES have led to public seizures of emotional segregation and have produced an outright attack on the older heroes of the Negro movement. Roy Wilkins of the NAACP is accused of selling his people down the river because there are white members on his board of directors. Adam Clayton Powell proclaims that Negroes cannot support any interracial organization that has white leadership. Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, who with considerable effect has devoted virtually his full time to service as advocate and negotiator for the Negro cause, is treated to derisive laughter simply because he is white. William Worthy, Jr., the controversial Negro journalist, has reached the remarkable conclusion that no white man can support the American Negro unless he also supports Fidel Castro. Here, as in the white South, passionate irrationality precludes effective discussion of the issue and of the practical means of resolving it. A leading Negro entertainer, shaken by the excesses of his peers, has privately confessed that he nevertheless has found it necessary to remain silent in order to avoid the dread epithet, "Uncle Tom."

The Negro mythology, like the white, constitutes a mirror image of reality. The degradation of the slums has crushed far more spirits than it has purified. Only the strongest members of any race emerge without crippling scars from a lifetime of deprivation, callous mistreatment and scornful abuse. That such individuals have now appeared in significant number to lead the marching columns of protest is a tribute to the older generation of white and colored leaders they have impatiently shouldered aside. It was the lonely battlers of the Urban League, the NAACP, the New Deal and the labor movement who brought about the reforms that freed many of the new generation from the ghetto and unshackled their militant spirit.

These dedicated young men and women, armed with pride and dignity, will find, if they look back, that they are still a minority among their own people. For most Negroes, the weight of oppression has eroded away the will and the capacity to seize the new opportunities and face the new risks. A high proportion have slipped irrevocably into the sloth and crime of slum life and constitute a social problem that is not affected by the argument that the fault is the community's, not theirs.

The Negro crusade, like any other, is fueled by emotion and does not welcome the dampening strictures of logic. As the only domestic social movement of current consequence, it has magnetic attraction for the sort of radicals and reformers who gave vent to their general protest against society by supporting the labor movement before the unions went flabby with success and affluence. For these, proud in their moral fervor, thrilled by vicarious martyrdom and comfortably removed from the scene of battle, the outcome of a given engagement is of little consequence. The situation is somewhat different for the tacticians in the field.

The most successful of these by far is the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. Upon the solid base of the legal successes won by the now-eclipsed NAACP, he has promoted the mass demonstrations that have penetrated Southern resistance even in the final redoubts of Alabama and Mississippi. For the front-line leaders, it has been, and will continue to be, a delicate balancing act.

Dr. King needs the emotional voltage, and the financial support, generated by the firebrands at the great rallies in the North and West. But he also needs an open line, usually routed through the Department of Justice, to the white men who must issue the orders to desegregate. He can hardly file a public dissent when Prof. Kenneth Clark of City College of New York takes issue with Attorney General Kennedy and proclaims that the Negro people are no longer going to beg favors from the white power structure. But Dr. King is in Birmingham, and Professor Clark isn't, and it is Dr. King who in the end will sit down and negotiate the compromise settlement that will mark another step forward for the Negro people.

Considerations of strategy as well as his Christian devotion to nonviolence sent Dr. King into the poolhalls of Birmingham to remind the boys in the back rooms that switchblade knives provide no answer to the dynamite of white hoodlums. So long as violence is directed against Negro demonstrators, elemental standards of justice and Federal guns automatically are on their side. Let Negroes initiate the attack, or even reply in kind, and the balance will shift—and without this essential support, Negroes again will be a helpless minority in an aroused white community.

Martin Luther King not only subscribes to, but has given real meaning to, the battle cry of the movement: No white man has a right to ask a Negro to wait any longer for equality. But, as a practicing Christian, Dr. King also has to recognize that every white man has a right to insist that the quest for equality not be marked by a trail of blood.

It is on this critical point that Dr. King has had to part company with a good many of those who have lately swung aboard the freedom train. He speaks for justice. They cry out for vengeance. There was a moving, simple eloquence in the statement Dr. King's followers issued after a truce had been worked out in Birmingham: "The city of Birmingham has reached an accord with its conscience." All his adult life, Dr. King has preached and practiced in the service of a mission to unite a national community put asunder by the inhumanity of slavery and segregation. He could no more accept the mad design of the Muslims for a separate Negro state, or the admonition of the intellectuals who urge that bitterness be nurtured in the ghettoes of the mind, than he could join forces with George Wallace, Ross Barnett and Orval Faubus.

These are the surface elements of a racial crisis moving inexorably toward a showdown. All are the product of the tragic American failure to resolve the great moral issue that has tainted the nation's free institutions and truncated its ideals —the failure that once before led to fratricide.

It is, as Gunnar Myrdal has said, a peculiarly American dilemma. The Negro crusade has the sound of revolution, and many frightened whites and a few loquacious Negroes see it as such. Yet its goal is the opposite of that set by dark-skinned revolutionaries abroad, who seek to drive out their white rulers and shape their destiny on their own terms. Here, Negroes are demanding only admission to a closed white society that has imposed its standards while callously denying full access to its protections and benefits.

The demand is made as a matter of right, not as a device to create a new social order. It cannot be rejected, or further postponed, without still more damage to our diminished libertarian tradition and to our tarnished religious ethic. The high price the South has paid for intransigence is now being levied against the nation as a whole. The white community's effective abdication of moral purpose has produced a paralyzing failure of will on the part of the political leadership. Only now is there recognition that we can't get on with the nation's urgent business until we have begun, at least, to take care of the Negro's needs.

The Supreme Court, in splendid isolation, has discharged its responsibilities. The Court has defined the national policy forbidding racial discrimination and laid down the ground rules for its implementation. This should have brought Congress to the necessary business of fashioning new laws to replace those that have been swept off the statute books. Tangled in its antiquated rules, intimidated by the uncertain temper of its constituency, Congress has indulged instead in a fruitless decade of angry recrimination.

EISENHOWER hoped until the end of his term that the race problem somehow would go away. Kennedy has understood that it will not, but he has given it low priority—and only now has he brought himself to use the full weight of his office to force the issue upon the lawmakers. If he succeeds, even if he only tries, we may be approaching the end of the long, costly season of default.

It is true that the ultimate solution will not be found in laws, but in the dark places of men's minds and hearts. But it is also true that laws are the manifest of the national purpose, and when government is unwilling, or unable, to provide them, there is no standard to which the wise and just may repair.

It is argued that the moderates have failed, and this is so. But it does not follow that moderation as a policy has failed. The fact is that it has not yet been tried. White, and now Negro, extremists have successfully blocked the scattered efforts to bring the leaderless mass of Americans to the kind of accommodations that will achieve harmony as well as justice. Yet this, surely, is the minimum essential, since Negroes and whites somehow must fashion the future on terms acceptable to both.

History and the peculiarities of our political system provide explanations, and even excuses, for our failure to live up to the moral imperative we have never denied. And the realities of the depressed Negro community make it clear that there will be no neat and orderly solution to social problems compounded by racial prejudice on both sides. But we have run out of options. The restoration of domestic tranquility demands nothing less than a renewed national commitment to the guarantees of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, this time without reservations. END

Church in Venezuela that it is doing much to meet these many opportunities. In José Humberto Cardinal Quintero, Archbishop of Caracas, she has the inspiring example of a man of humble origin, sound training, love for his fellow man, complete dedication of self in service to his Lord. Unnumbered priests and nuns labor to alleviate the needs of body, mind and soul. Such schools as those operated under the Fe y Alegria (Faith and Joy) program are providing education for 10,000 children in some of the worst blighted areas of the country. Evangelistic campaigns, encouraging family participation in spiritual experiences, are introducing a stabilizing factor. Implementing the new approach to understanding the nature of the universal church encouraged by the late Pope John XXIII, a move is under way to devote more time and energy to strengthening the total witness of the church rather than fighting "heretical" offshoots.

The threats which the Roman church faces in Venezuela are to some extent those that face any servant of Christ in a secular, materialistic, godless society; widespread indifference and apathy in spiritual matters provide much stony ground for the seed of the gospel to fall upon. However, certain deterrents face the church and its work here which may stem from her own particular make-up. Her financial strength is too often dissipated in erection of unnecessarily large and ornately furnished churches. Her political stands identify her too closely with certain political parties and issues, thus making winning votes for men seem more important than winning men for God. The centering of power in the priesthood discourages an effective lay witness. Desire to enlarge the church statistically has sometimes resulted in application of a thin veneer of Christianity over a basically pagan way of life. Internal divisions, rivalry between orders, petty jealousies among members of the hierarchy—all can lead to detraction from the working of the Spirit. Permitting resort to the ways of the world in winning support for programs (conducting lotteries as a means of fund-raising, for instance) does not deepen a sense of personal responsibility and sacrificial involvement in the Lord's work.

Challenges, opportunities and threats face the Roman Catholic Church in Venezuela today. Nevertheless, because of the richness of her spiritual tradition, her political influence, her economic power and her highly developed organization, she has a chance to utilize her position as a channel of God's grace to the utmost. If she does so she will make one of the most significant contributions yet recorded in the history of the Western world to the preservation of spiritual values and of the principles of justice, freedom and individual dignity.

To be continued

The Christian Century 7/17/63 R+R Rel.

Racism: Effects, Origins, Remedies

The time for all-out, massive effort to eliminate racial discrimination is now.

J. OSCAR LEE

✦ IN ONE SENSE history is written in the color of a man's skin. As much as a man might like to ignore the fact of skin color, it nonetheless helps shape his earthly destiny. In the United States skin color to a great extent determines the boundaries of a person's world. Every American Negro, Indian and Oriental learns by hard experience that he is born into a race, lives and even dies as a member of that race. Race becomes a factor which takes precedence over a man's ability and the quality of his character. In the eyes of the discriminator, race is a more important factor than the essential worth that God gives to each man as a person. Racial discrimination is more than a moral fault in our society; it is a sin against both God and man, and a social vice which no nation can afford.

Racial discrimination and segregation are virulent forces pervading every aspect of our society. Racial discrimination exists in housing, employment, schools, churches, public accommodations—indeed, in almost every community activity and service. While it is important to realize that many individuals discriminate on the basis of race, it is far more important to realize that racial discrimination has a devastating effect on group behavior and on society's institutions.

Racial discrimination has innumerable social and economic effects. For many people it means lack of opportunity to acquire occupational skills or to use them if acquired. It often means low wages or none at all. It means a poor education in overcrowded schools or in segregated schools supposedly "separate but equal" but in most respects patently unequal. It means poor, often delapidated housing. For many who live in racial ghettos there is even a disparity in the availability of such services as sanitation, health facilities and police protection. Once I heard a prominent white citizen complaining about the filthy streets in "the Negro section" of his city. Actually, the sanitation department cleaned the streets and removed the refuse from what this man called "the Negro section" only twice a week, whereas the same services were available to other areas of the city five times a week.

The social and economic effects of racial discrimination are apparent. But who can gauge its spiritual and psychological effects? Who knows the meaning of its impact on family life and character development? Who can determine the significance of the disappointment that comes with the denial of opportunity to use one's abilities? Racial discrimination attempts to relegate men with dark skin to the periphery of society. Who can really describe the psychological damage that results from the insecurity of being forced to be a marginal man? How can one estimate the harm done when lack of opportunity as well as inadequate educational and vocational guidance causes many young people to be poorly motivated and to have low aspirations?

J. Oscar Lee is executive director of the National Council of Churches' department of racial and cultural relations.

No society can be healthy if it denies full opportunity to any part of its population. Because racial discrimination prevents the nation from making the most efficient use of its manpower resources, the entire society suffers incalculable social and economic loss. But this evil damages us in a far deeper way. Our democratic heritage rests on the proposition that each person has an essential worth and dignity which must be respected. We affirm that all men have inalienable rights—as a famous report on civil rights succinctly stated them, "the right to safety and security of the person, the right to citizenship and its privileges, the right to freedom of conscience, and the right to equality of opportunity." As a nation we are committed to creating a society which makes these rights secure for all men. Moreover, many of the characteristics which determine the spirit and form of American life are rooted in the Judeo-Christian tradition, which affirms that every man is of supreme worth because he is a child of God. The beliefs that are used to undergird racial discrimination are contradictory to both that tradition and the democratic heritage. We are caught in a moral conflict between our ideals, goals and affirmations on the one hand, and the beliefs and practices of racism on the other.

The Roots of the Problem

The foregoing diagnosis of the effects of racial discrimination leads naturally to the question of its causes. Discrimination is overt and covert behavior which unwarrantedly mistreats persons or groups; it is an act of exclusion which is prompted by prejudice—a rigid, inflexible attitude for or against certain ideas, persons or things. Prejudice is impervious to reason; the prejudiced person or group has a closed mind.

Prejudice, then, is a mental state which leads to, supports or justifies discrimination, and in order to understand discrimination one must consider the origins of prejudice—origins regarding which the social scientists themselves, we might note, have little real understanding. They are still unsure whether the factors they believe to be related to prejudice are causal or merely supportive. Let us look briefly at certain of these factors.

The most obvious is that prejudice creates social, economic and political advantages and benefits for prejudiced persons or groups. Many politicians, particularly in the south, have used the race issue as a means of getting elected to office. Negroes are denied the right to vote in some areas of the south in order that political power will remain in the hands of whites. Economic advantage based on race is a factor which looms large in the history of the domination of colored peoples by Western nations. Also, prestige or status advantages are often based on prejudice. In our society a premium is placed on living in a suburban area with people of the same background —i.e., of the same race and class. This is the foundation upon which all-white suburban communities have developed.

Ignorance is another factor that causes or supports prejudice. Ignorance may be mere absence of knowledge, or it may take the form of false information, such as stereotypes in which one individual's characteristics are applied to a whole group. Physical and/or social segregation tends to lead to ignorance, since it creates serious barriers to communication.

Another cause of prejudice is belief in race or group superiority, which stems from the erroneous notion that the ways in which the people of another race differ from one's own are indications of the other race's inferiority. Further, it is erroneously believed that these differences are due to biological heredity and that nothing can be done about them.

History and tradition are factors which must not be overlooked in ascertaining the roots of racism. The historical background of a particular group of people in a society, or of the society itself, can cause or support prejudice. The history of the relationships between whites and Negroes in this country has contributed to the development and maintenance of racial discrimination and segregation. Also, racial prejudice has been cast into what may be called traditional behavior which discriminates against people on the basis of color. Such behavior is taught by one generation to another and thus perpetuated; prejudice is an acquired trait.

It is doubtful that differences in such physical characteristics as skin pigmentation and hair texture are causes of prejudice. But one must recognize that such characteristics tend to support prejudice in that they clearly locate and define its object.

Prejudice is generally characterized by fear and anxiety, whether conscious or unconscious, concerning the group against which it is directed. Fear is often manifested as fear of loss of power or fear of retaliatory treatment. Anxiety often takes the form of guilt feelings toward the victimized group. These considerations suggest that prejudice serves as an outlet for frustration. One psychological explanation of prejudice, the scapegoat theory, holds that when an individual is prevented from doing what he wants to do, he is likely to strike out at something, and since he cannot or is afraid to hit back at what is really the source of his frustration, he seeks a substitute—such as minority racial groups.

This discussion of the effects and causes of racial discrimination leads to a consideration of what must be done to deal with the phenomenon. While it is true that racial discrimination permeates every aspect of our society, it is also true that many people recognize its dangers and desire to eliminate it forthwith. Pressure for its elimination has mounted considerably in the Negro community in recent months. Fortunately, the efforts of Negroes have in the main been nonviolent in nature. The key to the matter lies in how the white community responds. Will it permit its extremists to provoke violence, as has happened in so many places in the south? Or will it actively commit itself to creation of the kind of society in which justice and full opportunity exist for all people without regard to race?

What Must Be Done

The effort to eliminate racial discrimination must move forward on a wide front, with citizens and private organizations stepping up desegregation activities in such areas as housing, employment, community services and education. A great deal has been done to break down local laws requiring racial segregation, but the far more important task is to eliminate the customary practices of racial segregation. There are many organizations working toward this purpose, but a more massive attack is needed —one which will require greater cooperation among these agencies, as well as more extensive resources. The mass media of communication have made a notable contribution toward elimination of racial discrimination, but much more needs to be done to dispel fear, to inform the public about ways to achieve the goal of a nonsegregated society, and to stimulate efforts toward its achievement.

Our nation's public policy seeks to establish a society offering full opportunity for all. Court decisions invalidating laws requiring racial segregation and presidential orders eliminating discrimination in employment, housing and the armed forces are indications of movement in this direction. State laws and municipal ordinances eliminating discrimination in such areas as employment, housing and public accommodations are valuable aids in achieving the goal. Many states and cities do not yet have such laws and some states and cities which do have them need to strengthen their enforcement provisions in order to make them effective. Even more important, state laws and ordinances ought to be buttressed and supported by federal legislation. A good start has been made by the federal government, but it is only a start. Executive powers need to be used more aggressively in crisis situations and in elimination of discrimination in those areas of government which have not faced the problem squarely. The use of violence by those resisting desegregation indicates the urgent need to find ways effectively to employ police powers to uphold law and order as well as to protect the safety and security of all the nation's people.

The Role of Religion

Space permits only the briefest treatment of the role of religion in eliminating racial discrimination. That role centers on judgment, reconciliation and fellowship. Religious groups have been long on judgment; they have repeatedly said that racial discrimination and segregation are sinful. But more than words are needed. This is a time for action. Men must be reconciled to God and to each other, and racial discrimination prevents achievement of reconciliation. In the context of our nation, reconciliation means social action to create the kind of society in which men have full opportunity to participate as persons of worth.

But more than this is necessary, and religion has a distinctive role at this point. Religious groups must work to establish fellowship among people. Persons must be led to live together as peers and to share the depth of comradeship. People must discover that even though they may differ, they are drawn together by common aspirations, hopes, ideals, goals and interests. Thus fellowship can be the means of establishing human relationships of such quality that each person is able to realize the spiritual, moral, intellectual and physical potential with which God has endowed him. Such is the nature of true community.

Racial discrimination is a dangerous social vice which saps the strength and vigor of our way of life. If the nation is to be true to the democratic heritage and to its own genius, it must move forthrightly to eliminate this evil. To do so requires the massive and coordinated action of individuals, government and all the institutions of our society. Each person can contribute in his own sphere of human relationships. We must move from the moral and spiritual dilemma in which we find ourselves to the goal of full opportunity for every person on the basis of ability without regard to race, color or national origin. The time for action is now. We are challenged to achieve spiritual and moral integrity, which is the real basis of strength both today and tomorrow.

Attention, All Tourists

✦ DON'T lose the round-trip ticket
Angel-punched at birth;
You'll need it at a wicket
When taking off from earth.

ETHEL ROMIG FULLER.

State, the Mormons continue to exert a powerful and beneficial influence in Idaho and throughout the Nation. Many of Idaho's leaders in government, in business, and in community affairs are members of the Latter-day Saints Church. Nor is this characteristic only of Mormons in Idaho or Utah, for members of the Latter-day Saints faith all over the United States exercise similar influence in affairs of business and State.

Here in the U.S. Senate, three of our colleagues are members of the Church of Latter-day Saints. Members of the Latter-day Saints faith hold seats in the House of Representatives. Others are serving or have served as Secretary of Agriculture, Secretary of Interior, Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, Treasurer of the United States, and U.S. Commissioner of Education.

Mormons have also distinguished themselves in the arts, in the field of entertainment, and in the world of sports, as well as in many other facets of American life.

The Mormon church is almost unique among Christian bodies in that it maintains a nonpaid clergy, deriving its church officials from among its members. As the Bible urges all Christians to do, Mormons tithe, giving 10 percent of their income before taxes to the church. Mormons are equally active in missionary work, with many young men and women of the Latter-day Saints giving up 2 years for voluntary missionary work both in America and in other lands. The Latter-day Saints Church maintains a youth organization known as the Mutual Improvement Association. This offers Mormon young people a combination social organization and personal improvement group, teaching them to speak well, to deal with people, and to lead better lives.

Thus, 100 years after the founding of the Territory of Idaho, the people of Idaho pay tribute to the contributions of the Mormons to our State and to our Nation. One hundred and sixteen years ago, Brigham Young and his hardy little band of Mormon pioneers arrived at the Great Salt Lake. Little could those men and women have then known the influence they would wield, or the benefits they would bring, to the mountainous land to the north—to the State of Idaho.

RACE RELATIONS

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, the June 10 issue of the New Leader contains an article on the President's role in the crisis of race relations, entitled, "A Chance for Greatness," by Karl E. Meyer, of the Washington Post.

At the end of this article, Mr. Meyer says that "great business now beckons to President Kennedy." Earlier in the article, the point is made that "technology is not what differentiates America from the Soviet Union." Mr. Meyer adds:

> Indeed, the United States has fallen into a Soviet trap by letting ideological competition focus on gadgetry, and the Negro has given his country a chance to get out of the trap. The question that the racial revolt, North and South, poses is whether the majority of Americans can rededicate themselves to some purpose more ennobling than supremacy in supermarkets, superhighways, and superbombs.

I share this conviction, Mr. President, and I ask that the article to which I have referred be printed in full at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A CHANCE FOR GREATNESS

(By Karl E. Meyer)

WASHINGTON.—In a speech that was widely quoted in the Capital last week, Secretary of State Rusk spoke of the "deep injury" that racial injustice was inflicting on America's world standing. "Our voice is muted," he said, "our friends are embarrassed, and our enemies gleeful because we have not really put our hands fully and effectively to this problem at every level of our national life." Because of this, Rusk continued, American diplomats must conduct foreign policy as if they were in a foot race with one leg in a cast.

Yet as one reflects on the meaning of today's Negro revolt, it is possible to argue quite the reverse proposition. In the process of freeing himself, the American Negro may shake his own society out of the complacent torpor—indeed, the sleeping sickness—that is the pervasive national malady. If he can reawaken the dormant radical tradition in American life, the Negro could give a greater lift to national prestige than any conceivable feat in outer space. There are signs that a miracle of this magnitude might occur.

Not since the economic collapse of the 1930's has any domestic crisis so shaken the country. No longer the invisible man, the Negro has chased Cuba and Laos off the front page and forced his countrymen to confront an evil within remedial range. Magazines are thrusting deeper; not long ago, the New Yorker published James Baldwin's cry of despair—an essay on being black that has become the manifesto of a minority—and last month Life creditably ran a report by a Negro journalist on the Black Muslims that was free from the usual cliches.

It is difficult, too, to overstate the effect of television. The coaxial cable has made the country a single community and virtually every evening the news programs carry film footage that makes comment superfluous. An example was a report the other day on a sit-in demonstration in a Mississippi department store in which Negroes were dragged from a lunch counter and were stamped upon or had catsup squirted on their heads. This is a passion play with a hundred million witnesses—for once, one is grateful for television.

The word passion can be used in a double sense. No quality has been more absent from national politics, and in Washington one can feel the tingling of a long-sleeping limb. A fortnight ago, Attorney General Robert Kennedy had his now-famous encounter in a New York apartment with a group of Negroes rounded up by James Baldwin. The President's brother was shocked by the depth of passion. "He didn't get the point," Baldwin said afterward. "He was naive. He doesn't know paid. He just doesn't know."

The Kennedys are learning. The President is moving with a tide that may take him in directions hitherto uncongenial to his temper. This is the kind of problem that does not yield simply to adroit managerialism—and yet the White House has grounds for gratification. It has been the standing complaint that a lack of urgency in national opinion has tied the President's hands. There is now no lack of urgency; President Kennedy has come to a Finland Station in which the momentum of events can be influenced by his own leadership.

One path ahead, clearly, is legislative. Civil rights measures which a few months ago were considered unobtainable are now given chance of passage in Congress. The administration is belatedly presenting proposals that would broaden Federal authority in dealing with demonstrations against segregation in stores, theaters, hotels, and restaurants. This would finally ease the unfair burden placed on the courts, which, by virtue of political paralysis, have been forced to preside over a piecemeal social revolution and take the full brunt of the segregationist attack.

But a change of laws can only work if there is a change of heart, and here President Kennedy meets the more exacting test. He must be able to articulate the Negro cause in a way that makes change seem not only necessary but also wholly just. Thus far, he has dealt circumspectly with the race question, stressing the need for law and order and for community responsibility. Yet without being preachy, the President must surely use the pulpit of his office for a series of addresses modeled in the tradition of Lincoln (and not, for a change, of Churchill).

If Kennedy succeeds, his Presidency may prove more memorable than anyone dared to hope. One has the impression that a country sated with material wealth is ready for an appeal to the radical ideas of equality charted in the Declaration of Independence and sustained in a Civil War. A response to this appeal could be more decisive in foreign affairs than any grisly weapon the Pentagon could concoct. "In the final analysis," President Kennedy wisely observed before his election, "our foreign policy, our relations with other countries, will be most affected by what we do here in the United States. It was Franklin Roosevelt's compassionate actions here at home that built his great reputation abroad. What we are speaks much louder than what we say."

Hence one can argue that the Negro revolt in America is as much a national opportunity as a handicap. It opens a field for the compassionate action of a Roosevelt. A confirming statement comes from an unexpected source, Premier Sékou Touré, an African nationalist who is nobody's puppet. Asked in Ethiopia about the Birmingham riots, Premier Touré replied: "We cannot say that the American people are racists—racism exists everywhere, even in Guinea. We know that in the United States a fight is being organized by the government of President Kennedy. We approve without reserve of this policy by President Kennedy."

No American astronaut could elicit the same tribute; technology is not what differentiates America from the Soviet Union. Indeed, the United States has fallen into a Soviet trap by letting ideological competition focus on gadgetry—and the Negro has given his country a chance to get out of the trap. The question that the racial revolt, North and South, poses is whether the majority of Americans can rededicate themselves to some purpose more ennobling than supremacy in supermarkets, superhighways, and superbombs.

"We talk about ourselves these days," Walter Lippmann wrote a few years ago, "as if we were a completed society, one which has achieved its purposes and has no further great business to transact." Great business now beckons to President Kennedy, and Dean Rusk may yet bless the cast on his leg.

EDUCATIONAL OPPORTUNITIES GROSSLY UNEQUAL IN OUR COUNTRY

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, for more than a century the pride of America has been its fine system of public school education. It was founded on the premise that education is the heart trapped in institutions, that the habits of the past are dominating the present and future, that power is balancing power to the point of paralysis and that events are controlling men rather than the other way around."

I do not know whether it is too late for the problems I've talked about to be cleared up or the trend I mentioned to be reversed. But the effort would be well worth it.

And not, let me stress again, because of the concern on my part for the political future of any public figure.

I have laid this problem before you—and at the same time I have been laying it before the President—because the survival of the United States could well be affected by confidence or lack of confidence in the Presidency.

But the important thing will be whether the Nation recaptures a sense of motion, a dynamic that seems to have slipped away. The crisis of confidence, compounded of Cuba, of taxes, of "managed news," and of a general dead-center psychology simply must be overcome, as a matter not of politics but of sheer survival.

B&R Rel

Law To Prevent Racial Riots

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM M. TUCK

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 25, 1963

Mr. TUCK. Mr. Speaker, on June 27 I introduced in the House of Representatives a bill (H.R. 7329) that I regard as an effective instrument with which to put an end to the racial troubles now shaking the entire Nation. This proposed legislation would bar any person, irrespective of his race, creed, or color, from crossing a State line for the purpose of demonstrating in violation of law or otherwise fomenting lawlessness or inciting to riot.

I have been greatly encouraged by the fact that the response which has come to me with respect to this bill is highly favorable. Letters of endorsement have been received from all parts of the Nation. Of the many messages sent me, only one has expressed disapproval.

My bill has been referred to the Judiciary Committee, and I have respectfully requested the chairman of that committee to refer it to a subcommitee for study. So far no such action has been taken.

The country vitally needs this legislation and the public generally approves of it. I hope that my bill may be favorably considered in the Judiciary Committee, of which I am a member, and that it may be acted upon favorably at this session of Congress.

Although the President of the United States and his Attorney General brother may now be concerned over the current outbursts of law defiance and disorder in many places throughout the North and South, it seems to me that they display a strange blindness as to the essential causes of these riots and acts of law violation.

When I consider the disgraceful concerted defiance of law which has occurred in communities such as Danville, Va., in my own congressional district, it is perfectly obvious that the participants are responding to incitation from outsiders, people who are not Virginians, who do not know Virginia or her people, and who do not have the welfare of Virginians, black or white, at heart.

For various motives, these persons and organizations from afar have been stirring up the people to fever pitch and are working incalculable mischief. This situation is being reenacted in many places. In virtually every case the disobedience to law has been shown to have been methodically inculcated into what were ordinarily peaceful and peace-loving people. If we are to avoid a major tragedy on a national scale, these uprisings and organized floutings of law must stop.

The way to stop them is to prohibit outsiders from invading States where they have no business except to stir up disorder, or from conspiring to do so. The law I have in mind would have equal application to everyone. It would apply to the Ku Klux Klan and any kindred organizations; it would apply to the NAACP, or to CORE, or to the Communist Party. In short, it would apply to all persons who travel in interstate commerce for this sinister purpose. My bill is clearly within the purview and intent of the Constitution, and is something that is needed for the protection of the great bulk of our population, the law-abiding public that bears the responsibility of our industry, our government, and our religion.

There is nothing strange or novel about my bill when viewed against the background of existing law. Since 1910, when Congress adopted the Mann Act—18 United States Code 2421—this legislative body has enacted a substantial number of criminal laws to free interstate commerce of corruptive influence and to aid the States in law enforcement.

The Mann Act was aimed at the suppression of the white slave traffic. It prohibited the transportation of female persons across State lines for immoral purposes. Later, in 1919, Congress made it a Federal offense to transport stolen automobiles in interstate commerce—18 United States Code 2312—and this was later expanded to cover other kinds of stolen goods—18 United States Code 2314.

In 1934, Congress enacted the Fugitive Felon Act, prohibiting interstate travel to avoid prosecution for crime, and this enactment was expanded in 1960 and 1961—18 United States Code 1073, 1074. Clearly, if it is sensible to penalize interstate flight to avoid prosecution, it makes even better sense to prohibit interstate travel which is undertaken with the intent of violating the law. Such an enactment has the effect of deterring wrongdoing at its very inception.

Congress has seen the wisdom of this approach. In 1961 it enacted a law prohibiting travel in interstate commerce with the intent to carry on, or commit, any crime of violence to further any of a number of specified activities—18 United States Code 1952.

My bill merely carries this approach to its logical conclusion by penalizing travel across State lines with the intent to riot or violate State law.

The legislation I propose would have prevented some of the riots and community outbursts which have bothered the Nation at times for generations. Even the famous Hatfield-McCoy feud of the last century, with all its sadness and family suffering, might never have happened if such a law had been in existence.

Without exception, I feel that States are capable and desirous of enforcing the law on a local basis. This can be accomplished if they are protected from the vicious outside influence which snub our laws and ignore our comunity mores, resulting in the chaos prevalent among us today.

It is a sad day in America if our local and State officials are deprived of exercising their police power. This power historically rests with the localities and with the States.

I believe the law I propose is one that the right-thinking people of this Nation deserve. It will protect the sound, taxpaying, law-abiding element from the lawlessness and threat of riot and violence brought in by outside agitators.

The language of my bill is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) Congress finds that the recent and increasing practice of certain persons and organizations, with diverse ulterior motives, to enter States, territories, Commonwealths, or possessions of the United States, of which they are not residents, for the purpose of fomenting disobedience to their laws has led and leads to violent disorders gravely disrupting the peace and threatening the welfare of the entire Nation.

(b) It is hereby declared to be the policy of this Act to promote the general welfare and assure peace and order by prohibiting in interstate commerce, or from conspiring to do so, where the purpose of such travel is to incite to riot or to engage in the violation of any law.

SEC. 2 (a) Title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding after chapter 53 the following new chapter:

"Chapter 54.

Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Travel in for Unlawful Purposes.

"Whoever moves or travels in interstate or foreign commerce with the intent (1) to incite to riot or to commit any act or engage in any conduct which would tend to incite to riot, or (2) to violate any law of any State, Territory, Commonwealth, or possession of the United States shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"(b) If two or more persons conspire to violate subsection (a) of this section and one or more such persons do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, each of the parties to such conspiracy shall be punished as provided in said subsection (a).

"(c) Nothing in this section shall be construed in anywise to limit the exercise of jurisdiction by any such State, Territory, Commonwealth, or possession over any crime or offense committed therein or cognizable under the laws thereof."

THE CHANGING MOOD OF AMERICA

WHAT A NATIONWIDE SURVEY SHOWS

Move around the country, talk with people on the streets, in their offices and homes, on the farms, and you find new moods settling over the country.

A staff team for "U. S. News & World Report" has just made such a grass-roots survey in every section of the U. S. Here is what people say about Kennedy . . . race strife . . . Castro . . . spending . . . business—the whole range of national affairs.

The mood of the American people at this time is undergoing a sharp change.

War dangers no longer dominate thinking. Cuba remains a worry, but one that is slipping gradually into the background. People seem not as ready as they once were to risk a war over Cuba. Most still think Castro and Communism must be driven out, but they are baffled as to how this should be done.

Soviet Russia and Nikita Khrushchev are subjects that seldom are brought up in conversation these days.

Race issues, instead, have moved out front in people's thoughts. You find much sympathy for the Negroes in their drive for equal rights. Yet there is a widespread feeling—even outside the South—that Negroes may be pushing things too fast. There is a growing fear of a racial conflict.

President Kennedy, it's clear, is not as popular as he was a while back. Yet the President is obviously way out in front of any probable opponent at this stage.

No big trend has yet developed toward any one Republican as the 1964 nominee for President. Nelson Rockefeller, New York Governor, has slipped badly in popular support since his divorce and remarriage. Barry Goldwater, Arizona Senator, is popular in the South. He commands some support in the Midwest, but seems not to be widely known in many areas. Michigan's Governor George Romney is not yet making much of an impression outside of Michigan and Wisconsin.

People are worked up over taxes—often over State and local taxes. There's little talk or expectation of a cut in federal income taxes. Raised repeatedly is the question of how federal taxes can be cut in the face of continuing deficits in the federal budget—and a continuing rise in federal spending.

"Big Government," growing ever bigger and more powerful, is mentioned frequently as a cause for concern. Many people, including farmers, are irked by federal controls.

In general, it is local problems, not world affairs, that are concerning Americans most today.

All of these and other reflections of a changing mood are brought to light by a nationwide sampling of opinion made by staff members of "U. S. News & World Report." Hundreds of individuals were interviewed in big cities, in smaller communities and on farms all across the country.

It appears that those members of Congress who are inclined to go slow in pushing for broad new laws have their ears to the ground—in close touch with grass-roots sentiment.

Business, almost everywhere in the U. S., seems to be good. Unemployment may be a problem in spots, but it is not something which many people are talking much about. Even farmers are not grumbling any more than usual—if as much.

The American public, in fact, seems to be reasonably content—outside the South, where there is bitterness over the issue of race.

TOP WORRY: RACE PROBLEM

Sympathy for Negroes, but a feeling they're pushing too hard. Demonstrations feared, resented.

Almost everywhere you go this summer the subject that people are talking about the most is the race problem. This is true even in areas where there are few Negroes.

"There's coming to be recognition that this is a problem in the North as well as in the South," says a broker in Minneapolis, Minn.

"The vast Negro migration to the North has made people aware of the race problem, even though we don't have it up here," says a grocer in Lake Mills, Wis.

Fear of violence. Widespread and growing is a feeling of fear—fear that the mounting racial tension is going to erupt in serious violence.

"I think there's going to be a race war," says a Rockville, Md., house painter.

"There'll be a revolution in this country if present trends continue," says a Philadelphia stockbroker.

"With all these Negro marches," predicts a Chicago taxi driver, "there's going to be trouble and lots of it."

"I can see real danger of race trouble spreading all over the country," says a Huntington, N. Y., accountant.

In Old Greenwich, Conn., a real estate dealer reports that

Across U.S., you find this: Business good, most people well off . . . Kennedy losing ground but still widely popular . . . Rockefeller hurt, Republican choice up in the air . . . Cuba fading as an issue . . . War fears receding . . . Worry No. 1: Race problems

"people are badly scared about the way the racial problem is developing."

A banker in Cleveland, Ohio, says: "The attitude of people here can best be described as 'frightened.' There is real fear of physical violence—especially among our wives and children. For instance, the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra's 'pops' concerts in the summer are at the auditorium, and nobody wants to walk around there."

Sympathy for Negroes. Most people, especially in the North and West, express sympathy for the Negroes and a willingness to give them their full constitutional rights.

"It seems to me like Negroes ought to have the same rights as everybody else if they pay the same taxes," says a farmer near Burschville, Minn.

"I think it is time we did something about giving the Negroes their rights," says a Hays, Kans., housewife. "Just think what it would be like to be a Negro!"

"Negroes have waited a long, long time," says a student in the University of Minnesota. "Now they're on the move, and I think they've a right to be."

"Negroes are doing what I would do if I were a Negro," says an automobile dealer in Media, Pa.

"It's about time the Negro became a first-class citizen," declares a woman who runs a hotel gift shop in Philadelphia. "If Negroes didn't push they wouldn't get their rights."

A newspaper editor in Detroit thinks "people are unnecessarily concerned that the race problem might break out in another Civil War." He sees a shift in attitudes:

"Five years ago—maybe even a year ago—reaction was violent against Negroes. But all of a sudden there is a softening of language. People's consciences are beginning to gnaw at them."

A Birmingham, Mich., realtor puts it more simply:

"All of us are a little bit ashamed."

Negroes pushing too hard? Yet, even among people who say the Negro should have equal rights, you often find a feeling of resentment at the way the Negro campaign is being conducted.

There is criticism of Negro demonstrations. There is a widespread feeling that Negroes are pushing too hard, demanding too much too soon. Many warn that Negroes may be hurting their own cause by excessive militancy.

"The Negroes have not been dealt with fairly," says a college student in Lake Mills, Wis. "But these demonstrations just build up resentment."

A professor reports that "people at the University of Wisconsin are concerned by the growing violence attendant on integration demonstrations" and warns: "The violence may well recoil on the integrationists, making their cause less popular and their battle harder."

"The guilt complex of the white man has been worn very thin by the pushing for extreme integration," observes a freelance writer in New York City. He finds that "people whom I have always thought to be extremely liberal are against further action on civil-rights legislation at this time."

The idea is often expressed that integration might come faster if it is not forced. Typical comments:

"A lot of people who believe in civil rights don't want it crammed down their throats"—from an insurance supervisor in Wantagh, N. Y.

"I have no objection to natural integration but I am against forced integration"—a woman librarian in Baltimore.

"Race rights have got to come. But you can't force these things. It's like Prohibition. If you try to make me do this, I won't do it"—a Noroton, Conn., painter.

"People want to see Negroes get ahead, but don't like this forced integration. They think change should come gradually, not be imposed"—a Norfolk, Nebr., newspaperman.

More than equality? Some people feel that Negroes, in some of their demands, are demanding more than equality.

A woman in Santa Rosa, Calif., puts it this way:

"The Negroes' needs must be met. But when you put the

(continued on next page)

NEGRO DEMONSTRATIONS are arousing resentment and a fear of violence. Many people, although expressing sympathy for Negroes, suggest the marches may hurt their cause.

BUS TRANSPORTATION of Negro youngsters to schools in white neighborhoods is widely criticized as "artificial integration" and a threat to the neighborhood-school system.

WHEN NEGROES MOVE into a neighborhood, whites may move out. Many whites oppose laws that would forbid racial discrimination in the sale or rental of private housing.

—USN&WR ILLUSTRATIONS

Negro into a special and privileged position, you're not making him equal. You're giving him rights that even the whites don't have."

A farmer near Des Moines, Ia., says: "The way I read it, the Negroes are out for more than equality—they want supremacy. Nothing seems to satisfy them. They want more."

A New York publishing executive says he knows "for a fact" that "there is discrimination in reverse against whites" in at least one department of the New York City government. He cites this case: "A request was made in one bureau for additional white employes in order to maintain a racial balance. The request was denied, although it would have been granted had the situation been the other way around."

A civil engineer in Brooklyn, N. Y., charges: "In government employment there is discrimination now against the whites in favor of the Negroes. On the job where I'm working the Negroes are so lazy and incompetent they should be fired. But the bosses don't dare fire them."

A Cleveland businessman says: "I don't think Negroes or anybody else should get jobs on a quota basis."

Neighborhood schools. One Negro demand that meets widespread opposition is for the bus transportation of Negro pupils into schools in white neighborhoods—and the reverse transportation of white children into schools in Negro neighborhoods—for the purpose of achieving "racial balance" in school enrollments.

A Massapequa, N. Y., attorney calls that "discrimination in reverse." A Dallas, Tex., insurance adjustor calls it "artificial integration that does not get the result you want." A New York City housewife says: "It is foolish to spend money for bussing children to schools outside their neighborhoods when there is not enough money for books and other educational needs. Also, there is great need, especially in the cities, for children to maintain neighborhood ties. I know that, when my kids were in school, the school and the neighborhood were the center of their life and interest."

Nearly everybody outside the South agrees that nothing should be done to cause school segregation. But many agree with the idea expressed by a lawyer in Gastonia, N. C.:

"There's a lot of difference between ruling that Negroes are entitled to go to school with whites and decreeing that there must be mixing of the races."

Civil-rights legislation. Talking to people, you find considerable interest in the new civil-rights legislation proposed by President Kennedy—but a sharp division over whether new legislation is the answer to the problem.

Some people feel like the airline ticket agent in New York who said: "The U. S. is taking integration steps it should have taken the day after the Civil War ended." Or the New York book salesman who favors "giving the President all the power necessary to crack down on the South." However—

"You can't legislate human feelings," says the wife of a Wichita, Kans., rancher. "The solution lies in better education for the Negro and uplifting his economic status."

"Legislation will only bring out the old antagonisms and reverse the progress already made," warns a co-ed in Stanford University, Palo Alto, Calif.

"There is support around here for improving the education of the Negro and allowing him to vote," says a department-store manager in Waterloo, Ia., "but I doubt the wisdom of some of these other measures Kennedy is proposing. They seem to me to go too far."

"Legislating on this race problem is just going to make people feel more race conscious," says an Arizona housewife.

Public accommodations. Among the President's proposals, the one seeming to stir the most controversy in the South is the one to require that Negroes be served in business places that are open to the public, such as stores, theaters, hotels and restaurants.

"If that law on public accommodations is passed, there is going to be big trouble throughout the South," predicts a businessman in Columbia, S. C.

A Richmond, Va., newspaper editor gives this description of the result such a law would have in Virginia:

"The Kennedys' public-accommodations proposal would stir up enormous resentment if it became law. The hotel people and the big department stores and the big restaurants in Richmond wouldn't be affected much. They're desegregated anyway. But it would drive some of the smaller merchants out of business—small dress shops and milliners, for example. White women who keep those shops going just absolutely would not patronize a place where Negro women had been trying on dresses or hats. It may be regrettable, but it's a fact.

"The feeling against the public-accommodations bill isn't based solely on race. In this State, there is a strong constitutional feeling about property rights that transcends the civil-rights issue. Many businessmen who actually are indifferent to the race issue would bitterly resent federal invasion of their property rights."

This same Richmond editor predicts: "If the public-accommodations law passes, the political consequences to the Democratic Party will be appalling. It would generate mass desertions to the Republican Party, who could then elect Governors in at least two or three Southern States."

A barber in Columbia comments: "I am really shaken by Kennedy's proposal to let the Federal Government rule on the customers a man should serve. If that law ever passed, I would be out of business. I wouldn't have a white customer left if I had to open my shop to Negroes."

It's not only in the South that people are disturbed about the public-accommodations proposal. Many people in the North expressed ideas similar to this comment from a Baltimore, Md., car-parker: "I think if a man owns a business he ought to be able to say who he is going to serve."

A store owner in Media, Pa., relates: "A restaurant man here listened to a lot of people and let Negroes in. Now his white customers have all left and he's going broke."

Housing for Negroes. It is the idea of forced integration of housing that stirs most resentment in the North and West. A Petaluma, Calif., realtor declares:

"The right to dispose of a house is the owner's inalienable right—to sell or not to sell. If the right to invade a neighborhood is paramount, then it means the end of a lot of rights that people have to choose who they associate with. I'm excluded from a lot of groups that I can't join. We're all discriminated against in one way or another."

A vice president in a savings and loan company in Chicago reports "surprisingly little resistance" to pressure to hire more Negro workers but adds:

"The housing question brings on far greater emotions."

In San Mateo, Calif., an attorney says:

"I want the freedom to choose my own neighbors—not to be told whom I should buy from or sell to. But that applies to whites as well as Negroes. There are a lot of white types I wouldn't want to have next door."

Northerners are quick to point out instances where whites have moved out when Negroes moved into a white neighborhood. One man in Long Island City, N. Y., tells of a housing project in which half the space was rented to whites, half to Negroes. He says: "Three fourths of the white families moved out in about a year. The only whites left are those who can't afford to move out."

A minister in Madison, Wis., relates: "People pretend there is no racial discrimination here, but there is—of a subtle kind. The university has a hard time finding accommodations for Negro students. And it is harder to find them for American Negroes than for African Negroes.

"Recently a large corporation sent one of its executives to work in Madison. When the corporation called owners of houses advertised for sale or rent, the owners were delighted. But when they discovered the executive was Negro, then their property was always 'just rented.' People are full of righteous indignation about the way Negroes are treated in the South, or in Detroit or Washington, D. C. They're in favor of federal intervention for civil rights in the South—but not in Wisconsin."

Equal rights—equal responsibility. This idea is often expressed, in the North as in the South:

"The Negroes are in a tough position, but if they want equality, they should assume equal responsibility. They've got to have a chance, but to some extent they've got to earn equality."

Those words were spoken by a banker in Old Greenwich, Conn. Here are the ways some others put it:

"Negroes should improve themselves before they make so many demands for their 'rights' "—a Weston, Conn., banker.

"Negroes blame all their woes on the white people. They should correct some of their faults, such as delinquency and narcotics addiction, which can't be blamed on whites"—a print-shop owner in New York City.

SIZING UP THE PRESIDENT

Kennedy still popular, but disappointment in his performance . . . Will he win or lose a second term?

When you talk to people across the country about their feelings toward President Kennedy and their evaluation of the job he has done, a wide variety of opinions come to light. The general attitude, however, seems to be a slight disappointment, coupled with consideration of the enormous responsibilities that the President must shoulder.

A retired journalist and agricultural expert in St. Paul, Minn., sums up his views this way:

"President Kennedy's popularity has certainly declined, but you can't put a finger on any one reason. Every man has his own judgment. For one it may be disappointment that Kennedy didn't do something he promised to do. For another, it may be something the President has done. Because there is no election, there is no focus of dissatisfaction."

To a banker in West Orange, N. J., the President "is not the leader he led us to believe he was in the '60 campaign. He is much more middle-of-the-road than might have been expected from the kind of campaign he conducted."

But, in Birmingham, Mich., a real estate man reports that "people are relieved about Kennedy because he has turned out to be as conservative as he is." He adds: "I think he's done a pretty good job. He's done better at controlling the labor unions than a Republican could do. Businessmen can't feel that he's definitely against them."

Kennedy vs. the field. Almost every discussion of President Kennedy's record brings out comparisons with Republicans mentioned as possible candidates for the Presidency in 1964. There are references to New York's Governor Rockefeller, Michigan's Governor Romney, Arizona's Senator Goldwater and Pennsylvania's Governor Scranton.

"I think Kennedy can be had this time if the Republicans stick together," says the president of a bank in Frederick,

(continued on next page)

THE CHANGING MOOD OF AMERICA

continued

PRESIDENT KENNEDY has slipped a bit in popularity, particularly in the South. Still, many voters believe that he has done a satisfactory job and is a cinch for re-election.

REPUBLICANS are not committed to any one challenger for 1964. New York's Governor Rockefeller attracts "liberals," while "conservatives" favor Arizona's Senator Goldwater.

HOPE OF A TAX CUT is fading across the country. People question how federal taxes can be reduced at a time when spending is on the rise and budget deficits are the rule.

—USN&WR ILLUSTRATIONS

Md. "There's no better man in the country than Goldwater, but I don't think he can be elected. Probably the Republicans will have to come up with someone a little more liberal. People are lukewarm toward Rockefeller. His family life is not too good. But I'd vote for Rockefeller before Kennedy. I think Romney would be the best nominee. And he could be elected. He's a self-made man and he understands business."

An Iowa farmer says, "I don't care much for Kennedy, don't think he knows what he is doing half the time. But Rockefeller doesn't amount to much, and Goldwater is too gabby."

To another Iowan, an insurance agent in Eagle Grove, Senator Goldwater "is a complete radical" who "shoots off his mouth too much" and "lacks diplomacy." He adds: "People around here are conservatives, but they are quiet conservatives. They don't like big talkers." This man, a Republican, says he thinks Kennedy "is doing an excellent job."

Rockefeller's handicap. Time and again, the matter of Governor Rockefeller's divorce and remarriage crops up.

Says the president of a Madison, Wis., bank: "Rockefeller's remarriage hurt him badly, particularly among women. They talk of nothing else. I rather like Goldwater, although some of his views are ultraconservative. And if his name is linked with the John Birch Society, it could damage his chances in Wisconsin."

In Medford, Oreg., a housewife says: "I'd never vote for Rockefeller because of his divorce and remarriage. When Rockefeller was with his first wife, he'd always look into the camera. Now, all he looks at is that woman."

And from another woman, owner of a gift shop in Philadelphia: "Rockefeller is very inadequate. His divorce would hurt him. I wouldn't want him as a leader. There are certain standards our country should live up to." As for Goldwater, she adds: "He knows as much about people as the man in the moon. He's big business. He's reactionary."

In Chicago, a woman cashier says that Rockefeller couldn't be nominated because of his divorce. "Adlai Stevenson was a much better man than Rockefeller, and he didn't have a chance because of his divorce," she believes.

Some Southern Views. "Rockefeller," says a businessman in Charlotte, N. C., "seems to be dead as far as the Presidency is concerned. It isn't just his divorce and remarriage, although he has been hurt by that, unquestionably. People just don't know where he stands on a lot of issues. He is not the sort of fellow a conservative Democrat would vote for just for the sake of voting against Kennedy.

"On the other hand, Goldwater is gaining in popularity all the time. He looks, talks and acts like a conservative. People have an idea they can trust him."

A housewife in the same city: "My husband switched from being a Rockefeller fan after 'Rocky' married 'Happy.' Now he thinks the sun rises and sets in Goldwater. As for me, I'm for Jack Kennedy."

"The Kennedys have sold out, lock, stock and barrel, to the Negroes," says a restaurant owner in Greensboro, N. C. "I wonder if the Republicans want to be known as the 'white man's party.' I have a hunch that the Republican 'brain trust' is encouraging that idea. And it may pay off."

From a newspaper editor in Columbia, S. C., comes this: "To say that Goldwater sentiment is on the rise in South Carolina is an understatement. He would carry this State easily against Kennedy. People here think of Rockefeller as just 'a Republican Kennedy'—with the same confused ideas."

Continued support of Mr. Kennedy is promised by a merchant in Augusta, Ga., although he concedes that his views would be "mighty unpopular with my customers if I harped on that." Still, he argues: "Kennedy has to be a practical politician. He has to have Negro support to be elected. So far, what he has done for the Negroes hasn't hurt me. I sell to Negroes as well as whites, and I find their money is the same color as the money my white customers offer."

"In a way, Kennedy is a scapegoat," says a political leader in a large Southern city. "If Eisenhower were in office and the Negroes demonstrated as they have been doing in recent months, he would be blamed, just as Kennedy is being blamed now. The point is, the 'rednecks' in the South—the 'poor whites'—must have somebody to look down upon. That's why they fiercely resent anything that is done to hoist up the Negroes in the way of voting, education, equal accommodations and all the rest."

A farmer in Mecklenburg County, N. C., says: "Who am I going to vote for for President next year? Why, that fellow who is fixing to run against Kennedy. What's his name?"

The Kennedy "image"—brighter or duller? In other parts of the country, the President appears to have maintained a large measure of his popularity, although there is some creeping criticism.

"The Kennedy image is probably brighter now than at any time in the past," says a university professor in Madison, Wis. "In general, people like his style and his effectiveness. They approve his stand on civil rights."

A New York City merchant credits Kennedy with "stabilizing the economy of the country," and believes he will have no trouble in being re-elected.

"Kennedy will win if he runs again," agrees a diemaker in Middlebury, Conn. "It's a monstrous job he has. He has aged terribly. He's beginning to look like an old man."

A Detroit newspaper editor thinks Kennedy's strength is about the same. But, he adds, "There was a time when the public was aching to say of this man, 'He's the greatest.' Not any more. He didn't quite come off."

In Cleveland, another editor predicts that Kennedy will be re-elected, "although not as easily or as certainly as some months ago. The Republicans," he says, "have no one in sight with the strength, personality and gift of articulation of Kennedy. Rockefeller's divorce is too much of a potential cross to bear. Goldwater does not to me represent the progress of the future. He attracts those who yearn for the strength of stability."

"There are all kinds of popularity," says a lawyer in Seaford, N. Y. "For example, Kennedy will always be popular with women voters no matter what he does."

A New York City lawyer contends that Kennedy has been a success, "if you can call social prominence and social glamour success, but politically, he has not been a leader."

And to a bank officer in Flint, Mich., the President is "a great talker, but a poor doer."

Up in the air: a Republican choice. Even though the President's popularity may be waning among some of his former adherents, there seems to be no concerted swing toward any Republican champion.

"I was just thinking," muses a railroad conductor in New Jersey, "who the Republicans could put up as a candidate who could beat Kennedy. Kennedy's got them boxed in. Rockefeller's remarriage dims his chances; Goldwater seems to be against everything; Scranton may have the best chance."

"Kennedy does a lot of shooting from the hip, then doesn't follow up," criticizes a department-store owner in Lincoln, Nebr. "Take his tax proposals. There was a big noise, then the whole thing died down." But, he adds: "Goldwater was in town recently. I thought he made a poor impression."

A Cleveland economist voices this view: "If we don't get a tax cut, Kennedy will step up federal spending as much as he can, and that will make him a 'shoo-in' in 1964. Romney is too new, Scranton too dull. Rockefeller is a 'me-too man.' He's a dead pigeon because he married a young chick. Goldwater would provide the most exciting race."

A Milwaukee editor sees it another way. He comments: "Goldwater is held to be too right-wing. Romney is probably too local. That leaves Rockefeller as the only real hope."

In Grand Island, Nebr., a banker says, "Rockefeller is not liked around here. I don't think the divorce has anything to do with it. He was never popular. Goldwater is highly regarded, but I feel he would lose."

"Anyone could beat Kennedy in Montana today," predicts a rancher near Helena.

Some voters have little use for any of the possible candidates. Says an Iowa publisher: "No one around here cares much for Kennedy, but they don't like any of the Republicans, either. I wouldn't give you a nickel for any of them."

And from a farmer near Sioux Rapids, in the same State: "I don't really think it matters who is President. They all seem to act the same, spend money right and left."

BUSINESS: IT'S GOOD, BUT—

Automation is a worry . . . So is lack of unskilled jobs . . . Nation, generally, is enjoying good times.

Business is described as generally good across the country. Concern is mostly hinged to increased automation in factories and the problem of finding jobs for young people who drop out of school.

On the farms, weather is the chief cause of concern. Some areas have had too much rain, some not enough. There are small pockets of grumbling about Government controls over agriculture, but most farmers are not too unhappy.

"Business is fine," says the president of a life insurance company in Philadelphia. "We are active in 20 States, and it's good all over." He adds:

"You know what I hear most talk about? Automation. Every body seems to bring it up—what the long-range effect will be. We're putting automatic elevators in this building. Everybody is buying computers, all kinds of new machinery. The big question is: What is it doing for jobs? My feeling is that it will make more jobs in the long run."

In Georgia, an executive of the Augusta Chamber of Commerce says, "Business is better than it has been at any time in the 35 years I've been on this job. One reason is development of water resources through the Savannah River projects. The ample water supply has attracted new industry."

"Things are very good in this area," says an auto-union official in Flint, Mich. "These last two model years are probably the best we've ever had. The plants are working two 9-hour shifts, and have been since the 1964 model run started."

Business: "good" . . . "terrible." A radio executive in Minneapolis reports that "business has been comfortably good for the past six or eight years. There has been no recession and no mushroom growth. This area has diversified industry with a strong agricultural backstop, and the farmers are in pretty good shape. Jobs are plentiful around Minneapolis, and there is almost no tax delinquency throughout Minnesota."

A newspaper publisher in Storm Lake, Ia., is convinced that people are prosperous because, as he puts it, "we raised our subscription rates and got only a few complaints and no cancellations. Usually, we really hear about it."

But the owner of a tailor shop in San Francisco demurs. "Business is terrible," he says. "It fell off last May during the stock crash and has never recovered. People have cash, but they fear the Administration. It's so lackadaisical, people don't know which way it is headed."

(continued on next page)

THE CHANGING MOOD OF AMERICA

continued

FARMERS COMPLAIN about the weather, Government controls and low prices for their products, but seem to be not too unhappy over the state of agriculture and future prospects.

FIDEL CASTRO and presence of Russians in Cuba still rankle — but fewer people now seem ready to go to war over Cuba. Question is asked: How can the Russians be ousted?

IN THE CITIES, better transportation and urban renewal are much on people's minds, but there also is increasing worry over the steep, steady rise in local and State taxes.

—USN&WR ILLUSTRATIONS

In Brooklyn, N. Y., an ironworker in a shipyard reports that business is "in bad shape." U. S. shipyards, he says, "no longer are able to compete against foreign shipyards because of higher costs here."

Automation: pro and con. Automation is a particular worry to a toolmaker in Manchester, Conn., who says: "People are more worried about automation than anything else. They are afraid they are going to lose their jobs."

An industrialist in the same city, however, says that automation is the reason for a boom in the machine-tool business. Tape-controlled machine tools, he points out, "are making the conventional type of machine tools obsolescent. Old equipment will have to be replaced with fantastically improved new machines, and this will mean more jobs for toolmakers."

In Chicago, a labor leader says that an acute problem in Illinois is that the economy isn't absorbing young people. "The school dropout has almost no employment opportunities," he reports. "We have a paradox of a generally good economy, but with the hard core of unemployment steadily rising. Jobs in the construction industry have picked up, but there is talk of layoffs in the steel mills."

"I have a feeling that people are not spending," says a Methodist minister in Rockville, Md. "They are holding on to their money. There seems to be some fear that a recession is coming. Maybe there is some general fear."

From a Roman Catholic priest on Long Island, N. Y.:

"I am the administrator of a labor agreement for the electrical construction workers here, and this past winter was one of the worst we have ever had, as far as construction is concerned."

In Milwaukee, the employment situation is described as "not too bad" by a union official. "There are some weak spots," he admits, "but construction is booming and the breweries are going full blast. The packing houses are moving away, and that's put a lot of old-timers out of work who can't get other jobs. The International Harvester Company, which used to make tractors and engines and is a parts plant now, may move away. Of course, the American Motors body plant has given us a shot in the arm.

"Young people have trouble getting jobs, and there are more and more of them coming on, while people with seniority stay on the job. Negroes also have the feeling that they're losing out on jobs. It's hard to put your finger on it, but it's probably true that Negroes are the first to be laid off, the last rehired. That's because they mostly don't have seniority."

Worry about unemployment. An automobile dealer in Media, Pa., sees hard-core unemployment as "the biggest problem in the country. If unemployment could be corrected, there would not be so much Negro unrest," he says. "The trouble is there are not enough jobs for them. They are trying to get into the union, and the union men just don't want to share their jobs. There are not enough to go around."

"Our chief concern," says the manager of a Philadelphia hotel, "is the drop in spending as a result of the Internal Revenue Service ruling on expense accounts. It's hurting the restaurant and banquet business all over town.

"The hotel business is lousy. It's because of the jet age. People who used to spend the night now arrive in the morning and leave in the evening. All hotels find the same thing. Our business is down 10 to 12 per cent from last year."

A New York haberdasher complains that business in men's wear is poor. "You can't put your finger on what's wrong," he says. "I don't know why men are not buying or spending as much for clothes in proportion to their other expenditures as they used to. Their sense of values seems to have changed."

A bank president in Frederick, Md., reports "the best six months in our history, in net earnings. President Kennedy is always trying to make you think that money is tight. It isn't. We've held our interest at 5½ per cent, and we're getting plenty of prime mortgages.

"The farmer is the only one who has had it rough around here. There was the drought last year. They got no hay to speak of."

Business is "on the upswing" in the Cleveland area, says a bank official there. "It's not unemployment that's bugging us, it's 'disemployment'—the disappearance of jobs," he reports. "There is increasing capital investment—up 40 per cent this year compared with 1962—but the total number of jobs is falling off."

An auto dealer in Lake Mills, Wis., describes business as "the best in my five years here—and I think it will keep up for a while. People are trading up in cars, and the most expensive models are selling the best," he says.

Auto dealers in many other areas agree.

Views from farm country. "The farm picture around the State is good," says a stockyard executive in Omaha. "In western and northwestern Nebraska, the crops are absolutely beautiful." He adds: "Farming today is an intricate, involved business that takes know-how. It used to be, if you couldn't make it in the city, you could always go back to the farm. Now it is just the reverse. If you can't make it on the farm, you can always go to the city."

From a farmer near Denison, Ia.: "I just sold some cattle, didn't make out too well. This business is always a gamble. You have to take the good with the bad."

"I think the break in the cattle market is the only weak spot in the picture," says a banker in Grand Island, Nebr.

Too much rain has been a problem in parts of the South. "My main worry right now," says a tobacco farmer in Lexington County, S. C., "is what a 10-day rainy spell late in June did to my tobacco."

"The farmers around here are being robbed blind," says a grain-elevator operator in Eagle Grove, Ia. "Do you know how much the farmer gets for the corn in a box of breakfast cereal that sells for over 20 cents? One cent! That's ridiculous. The farmers should be better-organized."

"The farmer is on the dole—and is sort of ashamed of it," comments a farm-equipment dealer in Iowa Falls, Ia.

In the view of a newspaper editor in Grand Island, "The majority of farmers here feel the farm program is a giant giveaway, doing no good. It served a purpose during the depression, but must we have it forever? The sooner we start getting back to a free market, the better. We can't scuttle it overnight, of course. We'll have to inch out of it."

But another editor in the same State, in Lincoln, looks at the problem this way:

"The feed-grain bill has worked out quite well. More farmers took part. The results have been better, and the farmer has more cash in his pocket."

U. S. VIEWS OF THE WORLD

Little fear of war . . . But Cuba and Castro still rankle . . . Russia? There's some optimism, but—

American people, at this time, are not greatly concerned about foreign affairs. There seems to be no fear that war is imminent.

Even Cuba no longer is the hot issue that it once was, though nearly everybody is still irked by U. S. failures to get Fidel Castro, Communism and the Russians out of there.

Soviet Russia has receded, at least temporarily, into the background in people's minds. There's not much talk, either, about the war in Southeast Asia.

Most say: No war over Cuba. The idea of risking war over Cuba is widely rejected.

"You can't go in and declare war over a little island like that," says a Baltimore parking-lot attendant.

"I would like to see something done," says a New York City contractor. "Cuba is really a bone in our throat. But I wouldn't want to do anything which would drag us into war."

"I wouldn't do anything that would start a war," agrees a New Market, Md., grocer.

A Chicago savings and loan executive reports:

"There is apathy over Cuba. There were strong opinions at the time of the Bay of Pigs invasion that we should have kept going. But I find no strong feeling now that the U. S. should go back in."

A Detroit newspaper editor describes Cuba as an issue that is "festering, dormant." He says "people are accepting the Cuban situation, but they don't like it."

Another newspaper editor, in Augusta, Ga., reports:

"What you hear about Cuba these days is mostly in the form of bitter jokes."

A doubt that Russia would fight. Not everybody is willing to go slow in Cuba. A few people say they are ready to risk war if necessary to get Castro and the Russians out. Most of those doubt Russia would fight.

"We ought to push this guy Castro out," says a New York City banker. "Stop pussyfooting around."

"We should go into Cuba when they don't expect it," suggests a New York liquor-store clerk. "If we don't, the Communists will take over all of Latin America."

"I'd risk war," says a Frederick, Md., banker. "But I don't think we would have it."

"I'd walk right into Cuba," says a Philadelphia insurance executive. "I don't think the Russians would fight."

Baffled: What to do? You still hear considerable grumbling about the way the Cuban situation has been handled. But many people express a feeling of frustration as to what should be done.

"People are confused," reports a Waterloo, Ia., lawyer. "Everybody wants to get rid of Castro, but nobody knows how to do it."

"I ask myself: 'What would you do if you were the President?'" says a Philadelphia newspaper editor.

In the opinion of a New York City writer:

"The difficulty of clearing up Cuba is becoming greater and greater. But all that is really necessary is the will to win. If they just had the will to win in Washington, then everything else would fall into place."

A deal with Russia? Some people see prospects as improving for some kind of working arrangement with Russia.

"I think the chances are perhaps better than usual," says a Philadelphia stockbroker. "There is little question that there is a real split between Russia and China. That's why Khrushchev is starting to put anchors to windward. I think Khrushchev is about as muddled up as Kennedy is."

"Khrushchev has more problems than we have," suggests an industrial designer in Riverside, Conn. "But we don't take advantage of that. We never take the initiative."

A San Francisco attorney says: "If I were Khrushchev, I'd be scared out of my wits about what the Chinese are up to. In the long run, the Russians will find they have far more in common with us than with China—and we with them."

Other people remain skeptical. Commenting on the chances for a nuclear-test ban or other agreement with Russia, a New York City salesman says: "I don't think any real

(continued on next page)

UNEMPLOYMENT continues to harass some areas, although the situation in big industrial centers has improved. Chief concern now is providing job opportunities for young people.

BUSINESS almost everywhere in the U. S. is described as good. Most businessmen are gratified that the economy seems to be stable — with no recession or mushroom growth likely.

IN THE SUMMER of 1963, Americans appear to be content, not deeply upset over anything in particular. The objective of most is a family vacation — a chance to relax in the sun.

—USN&WR ILLUSTRATIONS

agreement is likely. The Russians are horse-traders—they want one horse for one rabbit."

A management consultant in New York City fears that Khrushchev's current dispute with Red China "may make a deal with the U. S. more difficult because Khrushchev will have to act cautiously in order not to give the Chinese the impression that he is appeasing."

Get tough with Reds? Here and there, you'll find somebody who volunteers the idea that the U. S. should be firmer in its dealings with Communist countries.

A Bronx postal clerk thinks: "We should not only invade Cuba but we should act tougher all around the globe. Chiang Kai-shek wants to liberate China; we should aid him—with arms, but not American men. I'd like to see the Berlin Wall shot down. The Communists respect power."

A Huntington, N. Y., accountant prefers "peaceful moves to deal with Russia—if the deals are made on an equitable basis."

"It's important to find a way out of conflict with Russia, or else we will all be dead," says a New York City housewife. She adds this comment about U. S. involvement in the war against Communism in Vietnam:

"I shocked some of my friends the other day when I told them that if my son, who is in the Army, were sent to Vietnam and got killed there, I would go to Washington and blow up things."

TOO MUCH WASHINGTON?

Pros and cons on "big Government" . . . Concern over U. S. spending, debt . . . Doubts on foreign aid.

Get people to talking about the Federal Government, and you hear complaints about its size, its power and its cost.

"Centralized government in Washington has become too big, too powerful, too socialistic," complains a banker in North Augusta, S. C. "It seems to me that the thirst for power is just insatiable. I hear people say that the Federal Government should use its power to kick the Russians out of Cuba, not to tell individual American citizens how to run their lives."

"We're getting the Government right down into our personal lives," says a lumber-union secretary in Oregon. "We're getting an awful lot of Federal Government. Look at the listings in the phone book. It's unbelievable it takes that much Government to run the country. The minorities demand the services. The workingman doesn't want the policing that goes with the services."

"We're learning that federal aid and federal control go together just like ham and eggs," says a tax consultant in San Jose, Calif.

"A little less do-gooding by the Government would be welcome," says a realtor in Marin County, Calif. "I think the benefits derived by the average citizen from the Government cost more than they are worth."

In Lake Mills, Wis., an executive in an electronics firm complains: "Washington is policing us too much, doing too much health and relief spending. And the records and books you have to keep—why, it just snows you under. I think most businessmen will tell you this."

One of the few who speak out in defense of big Government is a Philadelphia businesswoman: "The larger a country becomes, the more essential it is for the Government to intervene in local affairs."

Another is a Minneapolis radio executive: "Even we in the Middle West recognize the complexity of modern society and the need for more centralized controls. So most of us are resigned to more policing of our lives."

Tax cut? Yes, but—. Almost everyone agrees that a cut in the federal income tax would be welcome—but one person after another wonders how taxes can be cut unless spending is also reduced.

"It's remarkable," observes a Richmond, Va., newspaper editor, "how many people have the good sense to see that it doesn't make sense to cut taxes while Government spending and the public debt are going up and up."

"No tax reductions until the Government starts paying off the debt," declares a southern Oregon banker.

A Dayton, Ohio, businessman believes: "People would rather forgo a tax cut and have a balanced budget. They mistrust the idea of a tax cut anyway—giving with one hand and taking away with the other. The new expense-account law is a good example of that."

"I think the best thing the President could do would be to retire part of the national debt," suggests a Brandon, Ia., farmer. "That would really give people confidence."

The head of a Milwaukee brewery says: "What worries a lot of executives is the balance-of-payments situation. Foreign dollar holdings are dangerously high, and they could put a real squeeze on us that would hurt."

A Philadelphia insurance executive says: "People here are very much concerned about Government interference with business. This antitrust program is one angle."

There is widespread interest in the Government's space program—but a wide diversity of opinion about whether it's worth all the money it costs.

Questions on foreign aid. One form of federal spending that is questioned by many people is foreign aid.

"There is growing awareness that this foreign aid is a big giveaway," says a newspaper editor in Sioux City, Ia.

"You can't buy friendship," says a farmer near Neligh, Nebr. "You give these countries aid and they turn right around and spit in your eye."

A banker in Grand Island, Nebr., observes: "Here we are, building a big steel mill in India when our own industry is sick. Farmers see foreign barbed wire underselling domestic wire. This foreign aid has done little good."

A car dealer in Media, Pa., disagrees. "I am in favor of spending for foreign aid," he says. "It's a lot cheaper than going to war."

PROBLEMS CLOSE TO HOME

People worry about local taxes . . . Transportation . . . Schools . . . Teen-agers . . . Improving cities.

Local issues—property taxes, rejuvenation of downtown areas of cities, teen-age behavior, the need for more and better schools—are foremost in the minds of many Americans in this summer of 1963. But often these concerns are temporarily shelved in the excitement of vacation plans.

"The big interest of most people around here is property taxes," says a lawyer in Massapequa Park, N. Y., a residential community on Long Island. "Most of the people who move out here have been used to paying rent and letting the landlord worry about the taxes. They just say taxes are too high. They want the State to pick up the tab for education, not realizing that the State's money comes from them, too."

It's a similar story on the West Coast. Says a sawmill manager in Dunsmuir, Calif.: "There's a big tax uproar around here this year due to much higher appraisals. Taxes are a sore issue, so people veto bond issues when they come up."

From a housewife in Lakeville, Minn., comes this word: "Everything costs so much. I think the State ought to cut down on taxes, not give away so much relief for bums, so people could save a little. There's plenty of work for everybody, but those bums on relief don't want to work."

"The big problem today," says the mayor of a small North Carolina city, "is overemphasis in spending on education. This thing of 'quality education' can be carried too far. Kids are being pushed beyond their capacity. Everybody can't be an Einstein. What is happening is that the educational frills kids get make them dissatisfied with the station in life for which they—or many of them, anyway—are fitted. Nobody, leaving school, wants to work with his hands anymore. Everybody wants a desk job. We're going to suffer from that in the end."

In Iowa, "people are worried about schools," says a newspaper editor. "We need school reorganization. People wonder if their children, from these small-town schools, will be able to compete with children graduating from modern, better-equipped schools in the big cities."

At the same time, the battle against rising taxes continues. "Rural Iowa made a desperate effort to get relief from property taxation in the last legislature and failed," reports an insurance agent in Eagle Grove, Ia. "It was like Pickett's charge. The power of farmers is slipping."

A Philadelphia lawyer reports that one of the big issues there is a bill that would provide bus transportation for all children who go to school, including parochial and other private schools. One of the arguments for the legislation, he says, is that "if the Government can afford to throw money into the sky for the space program, it can afford to give school kids an extra bus."

Expense accounts, "phony" price tags. "People I know complain about expense-account restrictions while Senators get thousands of dollars they don't even have to itemize," says a jeweler in Birmingham, Mich. "They also complain about taxes. My pet peeve is 'phony' price tags. Some items have brand-name price tags that don't mean a thing, like a watch with a price tag of $200 selling for $19."

Lack of money is not the reason for resistance to taxes in suburban areas, says a school superintendent in northern New Jersey. He adds: "People who think nothing of spending $30 to $40 on a night out on the town will argue heatedly in a public meeting over a tax increase of $30 spread over an entire year."

North Dakota, says a chemical engineer in Bismarck, "is getting more and more conservative all the time. We have a series of tax proposals before the people on referral now. We'll get a 'no' vote from two thirds of the voters." The "no" vote turned out even heavier than he expected.

A small-town newspaper editor in New York is worried over "the potential for juvenile delinquency brought about by the fact that kids coming out of school have no place to go—economically, not for recreation." He says there is a big need to open up job opportunities for young people, "and for a sort of moral rearmament program among teen-agers."

"We ought to do something about the obsolescence of our downtown buildings," says a real estate man in Petaluma, Calif. "We've lost taxes that way. But it will get worse before something is done."

And from an optician in Rockville, Md., comes this observation: "The thing we are talking about most and hoping for most is urban renewal. We'd like to see a new department store built here. It would bring business to everybody."

An oil-company executive in New York finds most people unconcerned over national or international issues. He comments: "They seem to be seeking an escape from their concerns by concentrating on everyday living. My friends seem to be buying more cars, enjoying themselves at picnics and parties more than ever before."

LWD ✓
VJ
PA ✓
HC
ML ✓
BP

7/31/63

The Christian Century ✦ EDITORIALS

A+R Rel.

Tom Paines and Uncle Toms

✦ THE CURRENT racial revolution in the United States, like every other revolution, needs its Tom Paines—resolute, contentious, obsessed leaders whose fixed idea and single-minded purpose make them indifferent to precedent and propriety, impervious to threats to their person and independent of those dilemmas and paradoxes which in more prudent and deliberative men paralyze action. Nothing short of such a spirit and nothing less than such a focused determination can seriously challenge the deeply imbedded racial patterns in the United States, shake members of both races out of their lethargic moderateness and in this generation bring the Negro into the mainstream of American life. A tragic and shameful history in which the white man alternately promises and postpones equal status to the Negro now makes revolutionary leadership indispensable for the solution of the Negro's problems and the satisfying of his grievances. And, once more, there are Tom Paines, Negro and white, who are equal to "the times that try men's souls." Wholly committed to one goal—justice for the Negro—they break cherished images, defy immoral legalities, slash the red tape of genteel parliaments, alarm and embarrass their friends and sometimes in ways which to other men appear absurd demand for Negroes elemental human and civil rights. To say No to their goal or to deny to them the exercise of their method is to misread the nature of the revolution and to repudiate the future.

I

It is also a historical fact that the Tom Paines who make revolutions possible are seldom able to make the benefits of their revolutions permanent. And the ironic fact is that the very talents which make them superlative revolutionaries are the same ones which disqualify them for the building of new institutions on the ruins of the old. The true revolutionary has or soon develops an autocratic spirit. He insists that everyone adopt not only his ends but also his means. By demanding that others adopt his methods as well as his goals, that their zeal be as unruly as his own, he alienates the men who must put the pieces back together when the revolution ends. Moreover, the single-mindedness of the revolutionist, however well it may equip him for revolution, is not the stuff out of which communities are built. By fixing his whole being on one objective the revolutionary simplifies and sharpens the thrust of his own life. He does so, however, only by sacrificing other values which may be equal to his own but which his obsession precludes.

Life is relatively simple for the Negro and white Tom Paines who believe that racial justice is not only the most crucial issue in American society—as others would grant—but is indeed the only issue. Life is not so simple for those Americans—Negro and white—who view the racial struggle as the most important issue in a whole cluster of issues. To be at once committed to racial justice in all its ramifications and to peaceful protest against every kind of injustice and to an American community which offers more than mere peaceful coexistence between the races and to a Christian discipline which precludes brutal or boorish rebellion—this is not easy, and the men and women who are so committed deserve better treatment than they sometimes receive from the Tom Paines who with them seek a common goal.

II

It is pure bigotry to say, as some engaged in the racial struggle now do, that if one is not a Tom Paine in the racial battle he is necessarily an Uncle Tom. In addition to the tokenism, the gradualism, the groveling subservience of the white and Negro Uncle Toms on one end of the social spectrum and the white-hot rebellion of white and Negro Tom Paines on the other there are racial attitudes varying from depraved prejudice and ruthless discrimination to genuine commitment to a totally integrated society. Many Americans of both races who are not revolutionaries and who will not use revolutionary methods are nonetheless devoted to the Negro's cause—a devotion attested to by the fact that they sacrificed money, position, prestige and personal comfort to that cause long before it was respectable to do so. To reject such people as Uncle Toms because they will not support some particular technique in the racial protest, to let extremists set the pace and demand that everybody march to it or be humiliated, is to corrupt the revolution and postpone indefinitely the building of that new America which the revolution could make possible.

Who in the booing crowd has done as much as James Meredith to symbolize in personal courage and resolution the battle of a lone Negro against white politicians, white courts, white customs and white laws? Then why humiliate him and break his heart because he refuses to chant in approved terms what the crowd wants to hear? Who in the madding Harlem crowd has done as much as Martin Luther King, Jr., to lift the American Negro's hope for freedom and justice? Then why smear his car with stinking eggs because he has a Christian allegiance which will not let him resort to violence in the pursuit of justice? Bigotry remains bigotry however much it changes its color, and bigotry is particularly tempting to the absolutist, white or Negro.

The racial struggle needs Tom Paines who irritatingly stir and drive the people, fomenting and stimulating the necessary social revolution, but it also needs Washingtons and Jeffersons who with sound judgment and the long view put a nation together. It needs Garrisons who stubbornly and everlastingly exasperate the people until they act for justice, but it also needs Lincolns who "with malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right . . . bind up the nation's wounds." We need both; we need both simultaneously.

McNamara Restricts Servicemen's Demonstrations

✦ SECRETARY of Defense Robert S. McNamara's order restricting the participation of military personnel in racial demonstrations stands upon sound principle and honored precedent. The air force had permitted its servicemen to take part in racial demonstrations if they were off duty and in civilian clothes and if there were no danger of injury to themselves or of damage to government property. McNamara's directive said military personnel may not participate in civil rights demonstrations during the time they are required to be present for duty, when they are in uniform or on military reservations, when their activities constitute a breach of law and order or when violence is likely to result. We hope that the secretary will now take a second step in the right direction and ban military personnel from all demonstrations for or against desegregation. It will be held that such a restriction would deny military personnel their right to freedom of speech and action. Obviously it would. But it has been long assumed in American military tradition that a military system cannot be democratic and that those who participate in the system, whether voluntarily or by conscription, must sacrifice some of their constitutional rights. The time may come again when a branch of the armed forces must be used to maintain order or to enforce the judgments of federal courts in racial disputes. Servicemen who are deeply and actively involved in the racial conflict could not be trusted to handle this responsibility with the detachment essential to justice. Moreover, servicemen who participate in racial demonstrations will inevitably find themselves battling each other from opposite sides of the conflict and will destroy that team spirit which is essential to military service. It cannot be expected that servicemen will be personally indifferent to the most crucial sociological struggle in American life or that they will not be individually aligned with one side of the struggle or the other. It can and should be required that they refrain from expressing their sentiments in the streets in public demonstrations.

Public Libraries Desegregate

✦ ONE of the surprising and hopeful developments in the Negro's struggle for justice is the quiet and relatively rapid desegregation of public libraries throughout the nation—including the Deep South. This desegregation is far from complete, and many cities in the north still practice racial discrimination by locating public libraries in predominantly white neighborhoods. Even so, public libraries are far in advance of other public facilities in making their services available without racial discrimination. This encouraging report was released in mid-July by the American Library Association meeting in Chicago. In a 115-page report titled "Access to Public Libraries" the association announced that an integration program which has been in progress since the 1920s has now raised to 24 per cent the proportion of southern cities which have integrated library systems, the high being 55 per cent in Tennessee and the low, 7 per cent in Alabama. In many southern cities where schools are still rigidly segregated the main public libraries are open to Negroes: Mobile and Birmingham, Alabama; Baton Rouge and Lake Charles, Louisiana; Augusta, Macon and Albany, Georgia; Charleston, South Carolina. The interesting fact is that library integration has occurred despite the low priority Negro leaders give to it compared with their concern about voting, housing, job opportunities, education and other public rights and services. The opening of libraries to Negroes has also occurred with minimum pressure in the form of demonstrations and lawsuits. There is strong evidence that total desegregation of public libraries in the cities of the south can be achieved without publicity and social disruption if Negroes give library access high priority in their struggle for justice.

Test Ban Talks Raise Hopes for Peace

✦ IS THE improved relationship between the Soviet Union and the West cause or effect? Does Russia make conciliatory moves toward Great Britain and the United States because of its worsening relationship with China or does its relationship with China worsen because of conciliatory moves toward Great Britain and the United States? This hen-or-egg question is not irrelevant. If the new mood in Moscow develops from a growing Russian fear of the

Current
July 1963
R&R Rel.

RACISM IN THE UNITED STATES

WHOSE REVOLUTION SHOULD IT BE?

Mr. Lippmann believes that the only way for the moderates to dominate the revolution is to make it their own.

Walter Lippmann

"For a hundred years since Lincoln freed the slaves, this country has relied upon the education of the Negroes and the persuasion of the whites to bring about that equality of status to which it is committed. We are now realizing that the present rate of change will not be fast enough. The redress of the grievances of the Negroes is for the new generation too slow. . . . History teaches us that when this point is reached in the struggle for what men regard as their just rights a revolutionary condition exists.

"Then the supreme questions are posed. Will the ruling and privileged classes take command of the coming changes? Or will they cling to their privileges and become the immovable object in collision with an irresistible force?

"The white people of this country, not only the white people of Alabama and Mississippi, are now at that crucial point where they must answer those questions. They must choose, on the one hand, between leading the movement towards equality of status and, on the other hand, standing aside and letting matters be decided by collisions between the Negro agitators and the Bull Connors. . . .

"We cannot count upon nonviolence persisting in the face of brutal and illiterate resistance. The outstanding danger is not that there may be rioting and brawling. For these can be suppressed. The outstanding danger is a loss of confidence by the Negro people in the good faith of the white people. This is where the turning point lies at the present time.

"If confidence is lost that there is a legitimate remedy for genuine grievances, there will be lost at the same time confidence in the doctrine of nonviolence. What will come after that it is unpleasant to contemplate. . . .

"The time has come when there must be a change in . . . the policy of leaving desegregation, which is a national commitment, to the conflict between private law suits and local authorities. The cause of desegregation must cease to be a Negro movement, blessed by white politicians from the Northern states. It must become a national movement to enforce national laws, led and directed by the national government. . . .

"If it is still possible, and I think it is, to hold and even to recover the confidence of the Negroes in the good faith of the whites, then this is the basic principle by which to do it. It is to make plain by word and deed that the Negroes are no longer a weak and isolated minority trying to push the nation into doing what the national law and American principles require it to do.

"Then, because the national power is behind the movement towards equality of status, that national power, which will be more than sufficient, can be exercised without violence, with wisdom, and with restraint. For it is the very weak rebels who feel that they must resort to the extreme measures." (The Washington Post, May 28, 1963)

THE IMPACT OF AUTOMATION

The coming of automation has created the possibility of unprecedented levels of production. Some social theorists feel, therefore, that the crucial problem in our economy is no longer the increase of productive capacity, but rather the distribution of burgeoning abundance.

ARE WE READY FOR ABUNDANCE?

Mr. Ferry is the vice president of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions.

W. H. Ferry

"What is especially new in the U.S. is abundance—the discovery that we have the capacity now to provide all the goods and services needed by all of our citizens. Americans—but not all of them—have more than they need of many goods and services, even with a good deal of obsolescent machinery and methods and unused farm lands. We have even created a formidable surplus of unemployed. It is my conviction, based on this stubborn surplus, that full employment has to be discarded as a national goal; that most of the widening pool of hitherto employable men and women will never again find sustained employment; and that this growing group of human rejects constitutes another totally new situation, one heavy with revolutionary implications. . . .

"New theories and new institutions are called for, not mere modifications or touch-ups of the old. Nor do I mean substitutions, such as substitution of socialist theory for classical economics. Socialist theory is as qualitatively threadbare as classical economic theory, and there just is not enough of it to cover today's conditions. Socialist incantations, like capitalist incantations, are largely directed to vanished circumstances." ("Transforming Economic Institutions," Cambridge 38, February 1963)

Mr. Bazelon is a lawyer, and author of The Paper Economy.

David T. Bazelon

"Because capitalism and its paper world were based on true existing scarcity, the drama of the system was to contend heroically with the scarcity of things in the world. . . . But the whole point about the new freedom, the new technology, is that it has made scarcity absurd."

Consequently, money is not real. "What made it seem real for so long was its scarcity. Since money is supposed to be spent on things, its scarcity can truly reflect reality only when that reality is made up of a general scarcity of things. It no longer is, except mostly by intention. Since the imagined scarcity of money no longer mirrors an existing scarcity of things, and since money that is not meaningfully scarce is not exactly money, the whole nature of the symbol has changed profoundly. . . .

"We are quickly approaching the point where the nation will have to make a fundamental decision about whether it can do without the whole baggage of historical ideas which were outgrowths of previously existing scarcities. There is probably no more profound personal issue that any of us will ever have to face than this one—can we stand prosperity? Can we give up the scarcity idea?" (The Paper Economy)

Committee Reporter
July 1963 R&R Rel.

Race Relations: THE CRISIS OF TH

By Joseph Ross, Vice President, Americ

The widespread racial tensions in the United States today are symptomatic of a very serious illness in American society. The mass demonstrations in Birmingham, the picketing in Philadelphia and New York, the parades and sit-ins, freedom rides and mass rallies throughout the land, give new evidence of the desperation of American Negroes, 100 years after their legal emancipation.

What are the historical forces behind these events which are unfolding so rapidly before our eyes? Why are these events happening? Why do they occur in just this way? What is their underlying significance?

We must first of all understand that the era which produced the New Frontier of President Kennedy is fundamentally different from the era which produced the New Deal of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

The crisis of the New Frontier is a crisis of economic injustice rather than economic disaster. We have everything that makes for a healthy economy—except that one segment of our society does not share in it. If the conditions under which the Negro lives his life today were to permeate the entire fabric of our American society so that all the people of the land were affected, we would again have economic disaster. Unlike a disaster, which welds people of many different viewpoints into a common effort, an injustice splits people apart. It produces conflict between those who must bear responsibility for the injustice and those who are the victims of it. Thus, the mood of America today, in contrast to the 1930's, is a divisive mood. Its by-product is weakness and dissension and fragmentation, rather than strength and unity. This is the mortal danger of our times.

Economically deprived in the midst of our affluent society, the Negro fights a non-violent battle for his rights.

Moreover, even though the Negro has gained much in the past thirty years, today he is politically isolated. He is politically isolated because the white liberal-Negro coalition of the New Deal, if it is still alive, can hardly be described as vital. The Negro rejects the tempo of change which the white liberal has set for him. Today it is the pressure of the Negro fighting for himself, conducting his own demonstrations, which is forcing Washington into a consideration of new civil rights legislation.

The Negro drive for more comprehensive civil rights legislation, coupled with direct action along the lines of civil disobedience is confusing. Why fight for laws, if you are not going to obey them? But the

EW FRONTIER

wish Committee

Negro is not trying to be consistent. He is simply trying to win his freedom in any way he can: he says he is fighting for morally just laws and disobeying only morally unjust laws, and he is willing to pay the legal penalty for his civil disobedience.

The persistence of discriminatory practices in the South, in the face of the NAACP sweeping court victories destroying the legal basis of Southern segregation, coupled with the persistence of discriminatory practices in the North despite an upsurge of Northern civil rights legislation, has shaken the faith of the Negro in the effectiveness of the law.

So it is that the young Negro militant has departed from the classic liberal tactic of fighting one civil rights battle at a time, instead adopting the strategy of direct non-violent action – sit-ins, stand-ins, kneel-ins, boycotts, freedom rides, civil disobedience, and as yet unheard of techniques.

There is no organized master plan because there is no single dominant Negro leadership. The focus of activity may shift from moment to moment—from Jackson, Mississippi, to Washington, D. C., to Philadelphia. One week, demonstrations may erupt for civil rights in Washington; the next week, for open housing in Dearborn, and the third week, for de facto school integration in Englewood, New Jersey. In short, the Negro is expressing his resentment and frustration wherever he can, whenever he can, with whatever issues he can use to demonstrate that he is no longer satisfied with his traditional role in our American society. Until he achieves true, full

(continued on page 34)

This article is based on an address by Joseph Ross before the National Newspaper Publishers Association on June 27 in Detroit. Mr. Ross is President of Davidson Brothers Inc., which operates a chain of retail stores in Michigan, Ohio and New York State.

(continued from page 9)

Race Relations:

equality, this pressure will go on, and solutions in one area will not appease his hunger for status and dignity in other areas of American life.

Whether the white man admits it or not, he suffers more from non-violence than from any other kind of pressure. Even if he retreats to the privacy of his home or the innermost recesses of his own thoughts; even if he says his conscience is untouched, it is touched. Governor Wallace and Governor Barnett are doomed men; the more postures they strike, the more they rationalize, the more they betray the guilt of their own conscience. When the Negro fights with bricks, bottles and rocks, the white man can fight back with physical weapons of his own; but when the Negro fights the white man's conscience with non-violence, the white man has no defense.

We are engaged today, not in a class warfare between working people and capitalists, but in a caste warfare of race against race. On the Negro side, employed Negro members of the working class are allied with middle-class Negroes and upper-class Negroes in fighting for the economic rights of the unemployed Negro. On the other side of the fence, among white people, discrimination against the Negro is being practiced by many labor unions as well as middle-class employers and upper-class social clubs. The conflict cuts across class lines and creates the confrontation on caste lines.

When I lived in Texas, a hurricane struck the city of Galveston and laid it waste. The state and nation were united in their desire to restore this city in the image of the rest of America. If the thousands of individual tragedies in Galveston had been merged into the national statistics measuring the wellbeing of the nation as a whole, this disaster would have been like a drop of water upon the ocean.

Today, the Negro is nearly as stricken as the people in Galveston, only there is no visibility to his condition. His statistics are merged into the national statistics and they lose their significance. The Negro has met the invisibility imposed upon him by American society with a technique of his own, a technique unique in the history of human society. For, in fighting back with non-violence, he pays the white man the supreme tribute. He says, in effect, "I know you have a conscience. I do not want to harm you. I just want you to see what my problem is."

The true struggle is within our hearts and not on the pavements of our cities.

What we are witnessing is a revolution. The Negro will win his revolution because he is a citizen of this country as much as we are; because it is the soul of America which is at stake; because there is something in America which, in the words of Thomas Wolfe, is "More kind than home, more large than earth—whereon the pillars of this earth are founded, towards which the conscience of the world is tending—a wind is rising, and the rivers flow."

R&R Rel.

The Town Crier

Serving Cochituate Wayland Weston

Wayland, Massachusetts THURSDAY, AUGUST 1, 1963

Firsthand -- Wayland Girl's Own Story Of Helping Negroes Win Vote In South

By LINDA LYNES

Hoeing cotton ten hours a day in the southern sun, eating meals with the field hands, singing with the choirs of small country Negro churches, and living daily life as the guest of a Negro farmer and his wife in West Tennessee, were elements of my introduction to the background and personalities involved in the civil rights movement.

Stares in grocery stores where we shopped with our hostesses, an order from the Sheriff to "Conclude your business and get out of the county," threats of being shot by local whites, and being treated with deference by adults purely because of the lack of color in our skin, were some local reactions we met in our integrated workcamp of northern students.

Greeting us as we drove into Brownsville, Haywood County seat, was the county courthouse, located in a square in the center of town. In front of the courthouse, as if proclaiming the justice to be found within, were two drinking fountains, one labelled "White," the other "Colored."

A hot dog party was given for us as a welcoming gesture. Among the receptionists were the 10 young people who were to be driven to Philadelphia as an exchange workcamp. In the dark, amid questions about the others' way of life, skin color was forgotten.

We went home that night with our Negro host families to what were to become truly homes for us. We had come in order to learn about the lives of the local people; as these people are farmers, we lived a farming life.

Early Monday morning our week began with a delicious large breakfast of fried ham, scrambled eggs, coffee, toast, and corn bread muffins. After breakfast we went to the fields at about 5:30 to learn to "chop cotton", which is to say, to weed and thin it with a hoe. The field hands with whom we worked were earning $2.50 a day and their three meals a day. After two weeks of chopping, ten of their 12 working hours, I was still not able to learn the accuracy and speed of one of my co-workers who said to me repeatedly, while she was helping me to finish my row:

"Now don't y'all worry if you cain't chop as good as me. I been choppin' fo'ty years now, I ain't never done nothin but chop. Look at y'all, readin' and writin' and all. I ain't never known nothin' but choppin' "

I, clumsily but truthfully added once that in spite of my schooling, I would be the ruination of my host if he depended on my ability as a field hand.

One of our first problems was determining how to address our host and hostess and how we wanted to be addressed. We quickly settled into the custom of calling adults by their first name prefixed with Mr. or Mrs. (pronounced "Miz".) We insisted that they drop the Miss for us, because of our age, but this was hard to establish, because they had never addressed a white man without the formality of Mr.-Mrs.-Miss.

My hostess spent her afternoons in the field but her mornings in the house. When we came to dinner the first day at noon, I concluded that she must have spent her entire morning cooking! We had meat in a sauce she had fixed, string beans and beet greens, two kinds of warm home-baked bread, a potato casserole, and a homemade baked dessert for which I never learned a name.

When I said to my host one day in jest, "Miz Katherine must do nothing but cook to produce so much good food," well, that decided it. The next morning I stayed home to help Miz Katherine.

I was not really surprised to find that she did a wide variety of chores, the same chores I've done at home. Here they were made more difficult by lack of vacuum cleaner and hot water, but simplified by the simplicity of the four room house. We picked beans and squash for dinner, and I tried to help fix the squash.

"How much water do I put in?"

"Not too much. An a little sugar and salt"

"How much sugar?"

"Jes' a little"

"How long should it cook?"

"You kin tell if it's done"

So, that was the trick to her good cooking!

Mr. Tom, my host, was very proud of his tractor, which saved him time and money.

One day while we were there he had to call a repair man to work on it. He told the girl who was living with me in his home that she and I had better stay in doors.

He had called a white man to do the job, and while the white man was willing to include a Negro's tractor among his jobs, (because as Mr. Tom put it, "A Negro's money is the same as a White Man's.") yet Mr. Tom said, "This man is mean, and he might not like it, you livin' with us."

One workcamper was told when he was shopping alone at a local store, that if he didn't leave, they would shoot into his hosts home.

When he told his hostess this and suggested he move, she said, "Don't you pay them no mind. They afraid we gonna get uppity. I'll tell you what: I'm jes uppity enough that I gotta right to keep whatever guests in my home that I want!"

The workcamper stayed and no one shot into his home.

The boy who drives the tractor for Mr. Tom told me that when he finishes high school he's going to join the army.

"It's the cheapest way for us to get an education, and besides, we can earn more money in the army than working on a farm. I don't think I'll have to shoot anybody though. I couldn't never do that, cause it's not right to kill another man."

One girl among the hands had just finished high school and was planning to go to a state college in the fall to learn to be a secretary. In discussing her hopes for the future and mine, I learned that she wants a job in New York City. When I asked her why, she said:

"I know a Negro's not treated like a white man even in the north but at least he can talk to white men, and some will treat him right. You're the first white person I ever talked to who cared about my ideas,

"I know it's hard to find a job, but it's harder here. My sister lives there, and she writes me about it."

When I asked the same girl a few days later what effect, if any, she thought the workcampers were having, she said:

"Oh, y'all are havin' a real good effect! When other colored folks see us talkin' to y'all, they see it can happen; and ridin' in the back of a truck with us, and choppin' ! And if any white folk's sees u'all, well, maybe they'll have to think.

"Course, it won't really change no white man's ideas, cause people jes think the way they's been brought up."

One day when my southern family were all listening to the radio report of violence in civil rights demonstrations in Philadelphia, Cambridge, Md., and Jackson, Miss., my host said, "We want our rights here just like they do, but we don't want no violence in Haywood County."

Three years ago Mr. Tom had been forced to deal with mortgage foreclosure and the refusal of the white merchants to sell him food, clothing, or gasoline, because he had registered to vote.

Several times we went visiting grandparents and friends, and we saw the contrast between the life of our home-owning host families and the life of the sharecroppers. Beds with homemade mattresses, straight back chairs, bare electric light bulbs, and gay voices were all that cheered many of these two-and three-room houses, one board thick.

When the temperature was 95 and we had been working in the fields, and we were offered water, we accepted with unusually deep gratitude, not only because of thirst but also because we knew that our hostess must have brought the water from a well at the next house.

Linda Lynes — Forward-Looking Girl

Linda, the 18-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Gregory Lynes, had a concern for the "problem" during her freshman year at Swarthmore College, but like most northerners, including her 12 fellow workcampers, she was unprepared for conditions as she found them in Haywood and Fayette County, Tenn.

What is it really like on the battlefront for civil rights in the South?

Linda Lynes of Wayland spent three weeks there--first, as part of a Quaker workcamp working in the cotton fields and living with sharecroppers and then in the "voter registration field". . .the hardest work of all.

Whenever we went visiting, after introductions, there was always a time when we were trying to hide the awe we felt at the conditions we saw and trying to destroy the awe felt by the family at white men of good will. At this point we were introduced to the long line of children usually at least eight, often 15.

Knowing that white plantation owners, instead of paying their sharecroppers their share of income from the crop, gave them food and clothing, we could understand why the thin children wore such shabby clothes.

Then we would sit down on the porch and discuss local gossip: a friend's wedding, Sunday's sermon, the weather, the crop, the voter registration drive, where we northerners came from and in whose home we were living and how we liked chopping.

Once all of our bi-racial workcamp rode in the back of a pickup truck the 40 miles to Memphis to attend a meeting to discuss the economic difficulties of the farm life in West Tennessee and the delta countys in Mississippi:

Would it be possible to unionize farm workers? Would it have any effect on wage rates? What could they do about mechanization? Where was it possible to get crop loans and loans for equipment? how can co-operative farming make use of everyone's small plots of unplanted land?

These and other questions were primary in areas where most of the land is owned by poor Negroes or white men with sharecroppers and day laborers.

At that meeting it became especially clear to us that the civil rights struggle is inspired not only by the desire of the Negro people to be recognized as individuals with human problems, but also by the desires of these individuals to solve these problems. Our friends in the south, just like us and all our friends anywhere, worry about their financial needs and how to feed, clothe, house, educate, and bring up their children.

While we were living in Fayette and Haywood Counties, and while our host families were going out of their way to make us feel welcome, the police were going out of their way to make us feel unwelcome. They followed us often and frequently stopped cars with northern plates. The driver was required to show his license, auto registration, and permission to drive the car if it did not belong to him. Then he was subjected to a questioning something like this:

"What are y'all doing down here?"

"Visiting some friends."

"Are you a Communist? That's why you're makin' all this trouble, ain't it?"

"No I'm not a Communist."

"Well we don't want no Communists like you down here stirrin' up trouble. These niggers ain't intendin' y'all no good. There ain't no tellin' what they'll do. And I'm warnin you, you're not wanted and if you know what's good for you, you'll get out of this county."

One workcamper answered quietly, "You are the first man in this county who has not wanted me here."

Sundays we attended church with our hosts and hostesses and were invited to sing in the choir. We saw that religion is the dominant influence in these lives. Listening to their prayers for peace and love and justice, we could sense that, much as these people wanted justice, there was no hate in their hearts for the white men who inflicted injustice.

We will never forget the prayers, so often repeated, in which the minister or members of the congregation chanted in a beautiful voice words like these:

"Dear Lord, help us to show these guests that they are welcome here, and dear Lord, we know that there ain't no color in heaven, and, dear Lord, help all men to live a life of peace and love on earth so we'll be ready for that other life when we leave this one."

NEXT --Just who works against you on voter registration? Sometimes it's the Negroes. And what are the pressures in a small-town county?

Reprinted by permission for Fayette County Work Camp Project
c/o Virgie Hortenstine
5541 Hanley Road
Cincinnati, Ohio

Send contributions for building materials for community center to this address.

Next work camp November 27 - December 1, 1963

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CONTRIBUTION _____

Please send me more reprints
at $1.00 per 100

A group of college students observed the life of Tennessee sharecroppers by staying with Negro families and instructing them on voter registration. In the above photo a new community center is being constructed at Somerville, Tenn.

NEEDED - $1,000 For this community center that now stands Roof high . . . . . This was built by workcampers and local Negroes working for civil rights . . . . . See Flyer "IT NEEDS A ROOF" they could procure in a more attractive manner.

Let's face reality and see to it that today's serviceman has the same opportunity to contribute his talents and satisfy his potential as did his predecessors. Let's continue with the good, rich America.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, Mr. Matthews' essay speaks for itself and is an excellent and eloquent testimonial in support of the cold war GI bill.

ARE RACIAL RIOTS COMMUNIST INSPIRED?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, there has been much discussion lately in the halls of Congress as to whether the Communists have any connections with the Negro demonstrations which are turning into race riots in various cities across the country. Considerable material showing Communist connections with the riots has been placed in the record of the hearings being conducted by the Commerce Committee on the President's proposal to permit the Federal Government to infringe on private property rights of businessmen by forcing them to serve and sell to whom the Federal Government dictates. In view of the fact, however, that these hearings will not be printed for a few weeks and this issue is receiving such prominent attention, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD the following materials:

An article from the Greenville News, Greenville, S.C., dated July 23, 1963, entitled "Reds Active in Sit-Ins?" by Holmes Alexander.

An article from the Nashville Banner, Nashville, Tenn., of July 26, 1963, entitled "Despite Kennedy Claim Thurmond Cites Leftist Ties Among March Group" by Frank van der Linden.

An article printed in the Nashville Banner, Nashville, Tenn., entitled "Kennedy Aids Working With Leaders of March" by Frank van der Linden.

A column from the Associated Press which was printed in the Memphis Press, Memphis, Tenn., entitled "Riders' Linked to Communists."

An article printed in the Dallas News, Dallas, Tex., entitled "Mississippian Says Reds Behind Rides."

A narration of a television newsreel heard over station KTTV in Los Angeles, Calif., on June 25, 1963, entitled "Racial Demonstrations Communist Inspired?"

An editorial from the Birmingham News, Birmingham, Ala., on July 26, 1963, entitled "Reds and Race Issues."

A series of four articles which appeared in the Atlanta Constitution, Atlanta, Ga., in July 1963, written by Bill Shipp.

An article printed in the Columbus Evening Dispatch, Columbus, Ohio, on July 12, 1963, entitled "CORE To Keep Pickets at Governor's Home."

An editorial from the Augusta Chronicle, Augusta, Ga., on July 27, 1963, entitled "A Bar to Racial Progress."

An editorial from the News and Courier, Charleston, S.C., which appeared on July 28, 1963, entitled "The O'Dell Case" and an article from South magazine entitled "Martin Luther King's Traveler" which appeared in the News and Courier the same day.

An article from the Sacramento Bee, Sacramento, Calif., on July 23, 1963, entitled "North State Communist Draws Crowd of 1,400 at UC Speech."

An article from the Greenville News, Greenville, S.C., entitled "Man Linked to Reds Worked Twice for King."

An editorial from the State, Columbia, S.C., on July 27, 1963, entitled "A Communist Voice."

An editorial from the Augusta Chronicle, Augusta, Ga., on July 24, 1963, entitled "Red Tinge in Savannah."

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Greenville (S.C.) News, July 23, 1963]

REDS ACTIVE IN SIT-INS?

(By Holmes Alexander)

WASHINGTON.—On January 16, 1958, when Director J. Edgar Hoover was asking the House Appropriations Subcommittee for funds to run the FBI during the next fiscal year, he said:

"The Negro situation is also being exploited fully and continuously by Communists on a national scale. Current programs include intensified attempts to infiltrate Negro mass organizations. The party's objectives are not to aid the Negroes—but are designed to take advantage of all controversial issues on the race question so as to create unrest, dissension, and confusion in the minds of the American people."

Mass demonstrations by Negroes in the North and South, to be culminated with a huge march on Washington next month, were not in the news, as they are now, when Director Hoover gave this dispassionate, succinct and informed statement of Communist intentions. Last week southern Governors Barnett, of Mississippi, and Wallace, of Alabama, flapped the Red flag in words much like Hoover's. But the Barnett-Wilson testimony before the Commerce Committee's civil rights hearings was too self-interested to be effective. Another red object—the red herring of McCarthyism—came scurrying into the caucus room where McCarthy once performed. The subject of Communist complicity soon got lost amid pious horror of "smearing" the Negro race and its leaders. Somebody suggested that J. Edgar Hoover be summoned as a star witness on the subject, but Chairman MAGNUSON was against it.

Fortunately, it is hardly necessary to call Hoover. A little page lifting through House Appropriations hearings shows that the FBI Director has several times asked Congress for money for the very purpose of investigating Communist incitation of the Negroes.

On March 3, 1961, Hoover told the House money raisers:

"The sit-in demonstrations in the South were a made-to-order issue which the party fully exploited to further its ends."

By now the Director was giving names, places, and dates. He mentioned James E. Jackson and Joseph North, "national Communist party functionaries," who came around for the demonstrations at Richmond, Va., in February 1960. He quoted the Negro Communist, Ben Davis, the party's national secretary, as stating in March 1960 that Negro demonstrations are the next best thing to proletarian revolution.

Again, on January 24, 1962, Hoover came to the House Appropriations Committee for funds, and one of his arguments was:

"Since its inception the Communist Party, U.S.A., has been alert to capitalize on every possible issue or event which could be used to exploit the American Negro in furtherance of party aims, in its efforts to influence the American Negro, the party attempts to infiltrate the legitimate Negro organizations for the purpose of stirring up racial prejudice and hatred. In this way, the party strikes a blow at our democratic form of government by attempting to influence public opinion throughout the world against the United States."

Nothing could be clearer than that, I have names for future columns showing proved Communists ferrying between Havana and the demonstration sites in American cities, and showing known Communists at the dirty work of teaching Negroes and whites to hate one another.

But the point which Warren Magnuson's Commerce Committee ought to be honest enough to discover is already laid bare, and this is it:

The unhappy American Negro, generally immune to Communist blandishments and greatly preferring the American way, is now being solicited and tempted, organized and incited as never before by the worst enemy our country ever had.

---

[From the Nashville Banner, July 26, 1963]

DESPITE KENNEDY CLAIM THURMOND CITES LEFTIST TIES AMONG MARCH GROUP

(By Frank Van Der Linden)

WASHINGTON.—Although the Kennedy brothers claim there is no evidence of Communist interest in the Negro equality campaign, Senator STROM THURMOND has files that show definite leftwing links among some leaders of the planned August 28 march on Washington.

The New York Times said Thursday that Bayard Rustin is deputy director of the committee planning the Capital march by 100,000 or more Negroes to press for passage of President Kennedy's civil rights bills.

The Daily Worker said a man named "Bayard Rustin" attended the 1957 Convention of the Communist Party, U.S.A. According to the files of the South Carolina Senator, the Daily Worker identified Rustin as secretary to Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and a prime mover of the August 28 March, and racial demonstrations generally.

Rustin was one of eight "impartial observers" at the Communist Party's 16th National Convention, according to THURMOND, and a member of the American Forum for Socialist Education, cited by the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee December 19, 1957, as a Communist front.

THE 1958 MARCH

Rustin helped Dr. King's 1958 march on Washington, which the Worker called a Communist project. Now Rustin turns up again in New York City as deputy director of the committee making detailed preparations for the mass march on Washington.

The coordinating committee consists of: Dr. King; A. Philip Randolph, president of the Brotherhood of Pullman Sleeping Car Porters and only Negro vice president of the AFL–CIO; Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; James Farmer, national director of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE); Whitney Young, Jr., of the National Urban League; and John Lewis of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee.

The Times quoted Dr. King as saying the committee would request a meeting with Kennedy when the marchers converge on the White House, and would ask the President to create a Federal civil rights police force.

HUAC RECORD

The House Un-American Activities Committee also has a large file on Randolph, showing he has worked closely with various leftwing groups for many years. He has called for a radical labor movement to promote "interracial brotherhood and the cause of the American working class and world peace."

An investigating committee of the Texas House of Representatives in 1961 said that Farmer, the CORE director, and Dr. King are members of the national board of the committee for a sane nuclear policy, which advocates that the United States stop all nuclear testing, and "which has many Communist-fronters among its guiding personnel."

The Texas legislative report incorporated into the Senate Judiciary Committee's official hearing record on the confirmation of the NAACP lawyer, Thurgood Marshall as a Federal circuit judge last year also said this about Farmer:

"He served as field secretary for the Student League for Industrial Democracy (SLID) visiting many college campuses. * * * The SLID publication Revolt, says 'The League for Industrial Democracy is a militant educational movement which challenges those who would think and act for a "new social order based on production for use and not for profit." That is a revolutionary slogan. It means that members think and work for the elimination of capitalism and the substitution of a new order.' "

[WASHINGTON.—Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy's office said one of his top aides would meet here this afternoon with Negro leaders and Metropolitan Police to plan the civil rights march on Washington August 28. The Justice Department said John Douglas, assistant attorney general and son of Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, Democrat, of Illinois, would represent the Attorney General at the conference. The New York Times today quoted Cleveland Robinson and Bayard Rustin, two leaders of the march, as saying they would meet today with the Attorney General himself. However, Kennedy's offices said this "was not correct."]

---

[From the Nashville Banner, Nashville, Tenn.]

KENNEDY AIDS WORKING WITH LEADERS OF MARCH

(By Frank van der Linden)

WASHINGTON.—Top aids to Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy are working closely with Negro leaders of the projected civil rights march on Washington August 28 in hopes of preventing violence.

Assistant Attorney General John Douglas, who conferred Friday with the march leaders and Metropolitan Police Chief Robert Murray, said: "We are concerned that everybody realize this is quite an undertaking, and made it as orderly as possible."

Douglas, son of Illinois' liberal Democratic Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, heads the Justice Department's Civil Division.

Chief Murray said the conferees discussed "minute details" for moving the estimated 100,000 marchers through the Capital City. He has notified all metropolitan policemen to be on hand for duty that day, and has canceled all leaves. The Third Infantry at Fort Myer, Va., has a battle group of soldiers' standing by for emergency calls, if necessary.

A special office will be set up at Washington headquarters of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, to register the marchers in advance. The cooperating Negro, labor, and church groups hope by this means to know the identity of the marchers and to screen out any considered undesirable.

The civil rights groups and the Kennedy administration are supersensitive to charges that some integration leaders have links with leftwing or Communist-front outfits.

Bayard Rustin, deputy director of the organizing committee for the march, and Cleveland Robinson, chairman of the policy committee, said in New York that they would meet the Attorney General here Friday. Kennedy's office said they would see Douglas, but not Kennedy himself.

"Fellowship," the official publication of the "Fellowship of Reconciliation," printed a profile of Rustin in its January 1963 issue calling him "executive secretary of the War Resisters League and race relations secretary, FOR, 1943–53."

"Milestones in Bayard's later life include his 5-year association with Martin Luther King, Jr., as secretary, adviser and organizer, his coordination of two youth marches for integrated schools in Washington, D.C., and a year earlier, a prayer pilgrimage to the same place that drew 40,000; work to establish a center for nonviolence at Dar Es-Salaam, Tanganyika, for the World Peace Brigade, the magazine said.

"To this we might add his participation with Michael Scott and others in a protest team to attempt to stop the French H-bomb tests and * * * opening of a New York office for the Student Nonviolent Coordination Committee."

"Fellowship" calls Rustin a "friend" of Ghana's Communist President, Nkrumah.

---

[From the Atlanta Constitution]

ONETIME RED ORGANIZER HEADS N.Y. OFFICE OF REV. KING'S SCLC

(By Bill Shipp, Constitution State News Editor)

A 39-year-old Negro, who has been identified as a district organizer for the Communist Party, USA, is now director of the New York office of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.'s Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC).

He is Jack H. O'Dell, who resides at 488 St. Nicholas Avenue, New York City.

Dr. King said on October 31, 1962 that O'Dell had resigned from SCLC. He said again on December 1 that O'Dell was no longer with SCLC. And one of Dr. King's top aids told the Constitution on July 18, 1963, that O'Dell was no longer with SCLC.

O'Dell, who works in the New York SCLC office at 312 W. 125th Street, has in recent months been engaged in fund-raising activities and mailing literature for Dr. King's organization.

Once in December, 1962, and on three occasions in January, 1963, O'Dell registered at the Waluhaje apartments in Atlanta as a representative of SCLC

In January 1963, O'Dell, Dr. King and other officials of SCLC flew together to Savannah on a Delta Air Lines plane.

O'Dell expenses for at least one of his trips to Atlanta were paid by SCLC.

Among those working out of the SCLC office in New York is Benjamin Van Clarke, 19, executive secretary of the Chatham County Crusade for Voters and a leader of recent massive night street demonstrations in Savannah.

Dr. King announced O'Dell's resignation last fall after news stories appeared in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat and the New Orleans Times-Picayune labeling O'Dell a Communist.

Dr. King said at the time that O'Dell had worked briefly and temporarily as a technician in SCLC voter registration projects, but "ceased functioning there long before this publicity appeared."

King denied that O'Dell had served as southeastern director of SCLC.

"He has never had any administrative post in SCLC," King said.

O'Dell, born in Detroit, was identified with the Communist Party as late as 1958.

O'Dell, who also is known as Hunter Pitts O'Dell, has been identified by Robert Morris, counsel for the Internal Securities Subcommittee of the U.S. Senate, as an organizer for the Communist Party, U.S.A., in the New Orleans, La., area.

At the time he was an organizer, O'Dell was employed as a waiter in New Orleans. O'Dell also has been identified as a member of the National Committee of the Communist Party, U.S.A.

Morris said that O'Dell also has given directions for Communist activities under the names, John Vesey and Ben Jones.

AT RIGHTS SCHOOL

He attended SCLC's civil rights school at Dorchester Center in Liberty County in 1962.

The SCLC "Citizenship Workbook," used at the SCLC school at Dorchester, lists J. H. O'Dell as a staff consultant on the voter education project.

The Reverend Andrew Young, administrator of the SCLC school at Dorchester, said O'Dell resigned from SCLC last fall, pending an investigation of his activities by SCLC.

"Nothing was found to indicate that he was a Communist," the Reverend Mr. Young said. "But the resignation was made permanent."

SAYS HE CUT LINK

O'Dell said in January of 1962 that he had severed all ties with the Communist Party.

O'Dell was an organizer of a "Freedom Rally" in Macon in 1962 at which Dr. King was the announced speaker.

The National Guardian, a leftist newspaper, carried an advertisement November 20, 1961, announcing that Jack O'Dell of SCLC would address a civil rights conference. O'Dell did not show up for the meeting.

In July 1958, O'Dell was called to testify before the House Committee on Un-American Activities which was then convened in Atlanta.

TERMED "ZEALOT"

O'Dell was identified by a committee counsel at the hearing as a dedicated zealot to the Communist cause.

At that time, O'Dell gave his employment as an insurance agent in Montgomery, Ala. His name was listed as Hunter Pitts O'Dell.

At the hearing, O'Dell contended "all the immunity the Constitution gives me as a Negro—the first and fifth amendments and any others" in refusing to say whether he was a Communist.

Richard Arens, chief counsel for the committee, displayed a Communist plan for activities in the South for the years 1955 and 1956. He said the plan was taken from the premises occupied by O'Dell in New Orleans.

Arens also said O'Dell was identified in 1957 as the top man in Louisiana communism since 1950 and as a former seaman who had been expelled from the CIO National Maritime Union for circulating a peace petition.

---

[From the Memphis Press]

"RIDERS" LINKED TO COMMUNISTS: JACKSON POLICE NAME TWO WOMEN

JACKSON, MISS.—Police connected two white freedom riders with a Communist lawyers' group in Los Angeles.

The two, Rose Rosenberg, 55-year-old lawyer, and Jean Pestana, 43-year-old Hollywood lawyer who uses the professional name of Jean Kidwell, were arrested July 15 in the Greyhound Bus Terminal with 10 other riders.

Police gave newsmen copies of a report by the House Un-American Activities Committee on Communist legal subversion. It said:

"Rose S. Rosenberg was identified as a member of the Communist Party by former Communist Party members, Milton S. Tyre on December 14, 1951, and A. Marburg Yerkes, January 24, 1952, when they testified that they had known Mrs. Rosenberg as a member of a Communist lawyers' group in Los Angeles.

"Rose Rosenberg testified before this committee on October 1, 1952, at which time she invoked the fifth amendment in refusing to answer questions concerning her Communist Party membership."

The report said testimony of David Aaron before the committee on January 23, 1952—entitled "Communist Activities Among Professional Groups in the Los Angeles Area"—indicated Mrs. Pestana was a member of the Communist lawyers' group.

Mrs. Pestana said, in testifying this week in an assault case involving another freedom rider, that she was the wife of Frank Pestana and they made up a law firm, Pestana & Kidwell.

---

[From the Dallas News]

MISSISSIPPIAN SAYS REDS BEHIND "RIDES"

JACKSON, MISS.—Brig. Gen. T. B. Birdsong, head of the Mississippi Highway Patrol, charged Thursday "freedom rides" were "directed, inspired, and planned by known Communists."

The charge brought an almost immediate denial from a New York official of the Congress of Racial Equality.

Birdsong told a press conference at least two riders arrested during efforts to desegregate Jackson transportation facilities attended a Soviet-directed seminar in Cuba last February.

He said 202 American students made the trip to Havana and heard addresses by 9 officials of Soviet Russia "to teach the students how to make sit-ins, walk-ins, kneel-ins, and freedom rides."

Birdsong told newsmen the Congress of Racial Equality was responsible for the freedom rides and was a Communist-front group.

Earlier this week, Gordon Carey, of New York, field director of CORE, told newsmen here he planned the rides in February.

Birdsong said the two riders who had attended the Havana meeting were:

Katherine Pleune, 21-year-old white Mimeograph operator from Chicago, arrested on breach-of-peace charges when she arrived as a freedom rider June 19, and James Robert Wahlstrom, 24-year-old University of Wisconsin student from Madison, Wis., arrested with a group of riders June 6.

Both were convicted and Miss Pleune is serving a 4-month sentence at the State penitentiary. Wahlstrom received a 4-month sentence, with 2 suspended, and is free on a $500 appeal bond. Each also was fined $200.

---

[From KTTV Television Newsreel, June 25, 1963]

RACIAL DEMONSTRATIONS COMMUNIST INSPIRED?

There are growing indications of possible Communist influence in the nationwide racial situation. Today, Caleb Peterson, Negro president of the Hollywood Race Relations Bureau, states, "I suspect there is directly or indirectly Communist motivation behind the nationwide wave of demonstrations." And he adds, "Certainly here in Los Angeles there is no cause for protest marches." The recently formed United Civil Rights Committee now walks arm in arm with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Representatives of both groups appeared yesterday before the Los Angeles Board of Education. The chairman of the United Civil Rights Committee is Attorney Thomas G. Neusom, and the head of the United Civil Rights Committee's legal committee is Jack Tenner. Tenner also has been a member of the executive board of the NAACP.

Jack Y. Tenner, an attorney, of 7416 Rosewood, Los Angeles, was identified as a member of the Communist Party by David Aaron, attorney, in a hearing before the Committee on Un-American Activities, House of Representatives, 82d Congress, on January 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, and April 9, 1952.

I now read from page 2507 of that official document:

"Question. Mr. Aaron, will you give us, in the pages of your statement, how you know Mr. Jack Tenner was a member?

"Aaron's answer. I believe he became a member of that group when he became a member.

"Question. Did you ever collect dues from him?

"Answer. Yes, I did."

And again, on page 2575 of that same House report:

"Question. Was Jack Tenner a member of the Communist Party?

"Answer by Mr. Yerkes: As I now recall, yes, sir."

This testimony from the official document of the House Committee on Un-American Activities:

"Jack Tenner was born in Russia; became a naturalized citizen through the naturalization of his father. Continues to be active in liberal and progressive organizations, has been a member of the executive board of the NAACP."

"October 1 of 1952, Jack Tenner appeared before the House Committee on Un-American Activities as a witness; took the fifth amendment on all the questions relative to Communist activity and membership. But Jack Tenner now puts himself in the position of asking questions of law-enforcement agencies. Yet he, himself, refused to answer questions propounded to him by a duly constituted agency of the Congress of the United States.

"The same year Jack Tenner was identified as a member of the Communist Party, Attorney Thomas G. Neusom appeared before the House Committee on Un-American Activities along with other attorneys seeking to quash subpenas sent to the following clients by the House Committee on Un-American Activities:

"Neusom represented Fred Steinmetz, Ben Margolis, John W. Porter, William B. Esterman, Sam Houston Allen, Fred M. Snyder, Pauline Epstein, Esther Shandler, Robert D. Katz, Charles J. Katz, Richard L. Rykoff, and others. Neusom was representing identified Communists before the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

"And now the two, Jack Tenner and Thomas G. Neusom, are members of the newly formed United Civil Rights Committee, standing in judgment of law-enforcement agencies."

---

[From the Birmingham News, July 26, 1963]

REDS AND RACE ISSUES

Yesterday Attorney General Robert Kennedy in a staement said that "based on all available information from investigation and other sources," he has found no evidence that "any of the top leaders of the major civil rights groups are Communists or Communist controlled."

That is a statement which helps partially to clear up doubts. It is easily enough understood why some, perhaps even many, think Reds are or may be behind Negro activist movements. Disruption of the United States, of which there has been a terrible amount, clearly serves Communist purposes; whatever happens here indicating Negro versus white dissension or even, at times, open conflict, is rich material for the Communist propaganda machine.

But it would be misleading for reasonable whites to assume that in its basic organization or philosophies the Negro drive for a sometimes vague, sometimes concrete set of goals is fundamentally Communist contrived.

THE RED APPARATUS

To draw this conclusion would lead whites astray. It would malign Negro leaders on the local level, who in many cities have joined in the Negro effort and supported it. To call it Communist in genesis reveals failure to understand the nature of much of the Communist apparatus. For it is less clever than sometimes it is credited with being, and certainly not clever enough to organize this massive eruption.

But Communists are, on the other hand, adept at infiltrating, at using such an effort especially when thousands are involved, almost everywhere. Moreover, Negro campaigns for equality, as described by one or multitudes of Negro leaders and writers in the past, always have attracted both professional and amateur liberals. Among these have been Reds and other people who at times, though not actual Communists, have touched the Communist or Communist-front mechanisms. Thus it would be and is possible to draw connecting lines which show Communist or Red-front taints here and there.

THE O'DELL EVIDENCE

That this is the case was demonstrated by the good newspaper reporting of the Birmingham News' James Free, in Washington. He showed last year that a man named Jack or Hunter Pitts O'Dell has been charged with Red connections, and that he has been on the payroll of Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference. Mr. Free also has revealed that, though Martin Luther King "accepted the resignation" of O'Dell, records show he had drawn SCLC funds after that "resignation." The Atlanta Constitution in a copyrighted article reports O'Dell now heads the SCLC New York office.

Reverend King's explanation of all this is pitiably weak.

The Atlanta Constitution State editor, Bill Shipp, this week has been running a series of articles on page 1 which show that the Savannah-based "Southeastern Georgia Crusade for Voters" has had ties with the Highlander Folk School in Monteagle, Tenn. That organization is declared by the Justice Department not to be a Red front. But it is common knowledge that through Monteagle school have passed people who generally were regarded either as Reds or members of Red-involved agencies.

Moreover, the Constitution series also reports that the "Crusade," which is behind violent Negro demonstrations in Savannah, has headquarters in offices of the International Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers Union, rentfree. MMSW also has contributed to the "Crusade." The union in 1950 was expelled from the CIO on grounds it was controlled by Communists. In 1955 the Justice Department charged with the Subversive Activities Control Board that the union "is and has been made into an instrument for the promotion and advancement of Communist objectives. * * *" An appeal in the case is set for Federal court hearing in December, this year.

Seven members of the union are to be tried in Federal court in Denver next month on charges they fraudulently obtained National Labor Relations Board services through false non-Communist affidavits.

DANGER TO NEGROES

The "crusade" is headed by one Hosea Williams, a Negro Government employee who the Constitution says, was expelled as an NAACP vice president 2 years ago.

The Atlanta paper this week editorially noted that "communism has always fished in troubled waters," which is evident. But it added that "Negro groups that carelessly permit Communist-related contingent to hitch its shoddy little trailer to their bandwagon are doing a dangerous disservice to the Negro American's cause and should steer clear." The evidence suggests Negro groups have not always done so. Even now there seems footdragging on action to eliminate any suspicion.

This matter of the Negro and communism is not new. But the Negro in America, despite what he considers provocation for bitterness, has had an FBI-certified record of resistance to Communist lures generally. Even so, the matter yet evidently requires public and governmental attention to reassure all, including many Negro citizens, as to no such infiltration.

SOME LONDON ADVICE

Writing in the New York Times from London, C. L. Sulzberger a few days ago said that Communists showed in anti-Greek demonstrations there how they "can penetrate a protest group." Mr. Sulzberger added: "If this can occur in a relatively placid country like England * * * imagine how much more dangerous a similar experiment in human engineering might be in our own country and on an issue that can be excited by racist emotions." Mr. Sulzberger emphasized the danger of such Red intrusion in such as the Washington march.

That Communists are alert to this opportunity is certain. This now commands international headlines. Red China, by even the Soviet Union's official statements, has begun a campaign to divide the world on basis of race. It is no comfort that Red Chinese are using this device against the U.S.S.R., trying to win Asian and African backing through calling Russians part of a white power structure.

JOB FOR CONGRESS

It ought to be brought prominently to the fore in all civilized people's minds, white and Negro, that communism can find advantage in exploiting color conflict.

Mr. Kennedy's statement on the "top leaders" of Negroes therefore is less than wholly comforting. There is evidence that communism is not inactive in this matter. Alabama's Governor Wallace and others have raised the question of such infiltration. While Mr. Wallace may be suspected in Washington of trying to cloud any effort toward Negro achievement of declared goals, the question thus raised yet stands by itself as not fully answered. It is a matter the Congress should explore at once. And no politics, fear of antagonizing Negro votes, should retard such effort. Negroes themselves will gain by fullest revelations which do more than cover top leaders.

---

[From the Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution, July 22, 1963]

RED-LINKED LABOR UNION GIVES FREE RENT TO CRUSADE

(By Bill Shipp)

SAVANNAH.—The Chatham County Crusade for Voters, the organization responsible for massive desegregation demonstrations here, is headquartered, rent-free, in the offices of a labor union that has been found by a government agency to be Communist-controlled.

The union, the International Union of Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers, has contributed money to the Chatham Crusade for Voters, and two of the union's officers are members of the 70-man executive board of the crusade.

The Chatham County Crusade for Voters is an affiliate of Dr. Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

The crusade is headed by Hosea Williams, 37, a Negro government employee who was ousted 2 years ago as vice president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

The crusade is financed largely by "free-will" donations and a recent grant from the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta. The Southern Regional Council stipulated that none of its funds could be used for financing demonstrations.

The crusade's activities have included encouraging Negroes to register to vote and, more recently, massive night street marches which have ended in race riots. Dozens have been injured in the street fighting and thousands of dollars worth of damage has been inflicted.

In addition to the crusade, others operating out of the Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers Union offices at 416 Park Avenue West have included representatives of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the Crusaders Freedom Now Movement and the Rev. Andrew Young, program director for Dr. King's organization.

Reverend Young, the guiding force of the crusade's activities while Williams was in jail on peace warrant bonds during the past 2 weeks, said he has seen no evidence of Communist or union influence in the civil rights work of the crusade—or in other civil rights movement he has dealt with.

EXPELLED FROM CIO

The International Union of Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers was expelled in 1950 from the Congress of Industrial Organizations. The CIO said the Mine-Mill Union was ousted because it was controlled by Communists.

In 1955, the Department of Justice filed a petition with the Subversive Activities Control Board charging that the union "is and has been made into an instrument for the promotion and advancement of Communist objectives and has been so used without the knowledge of the great majority of its union members."

Hearings began in 1957 and were concluded in May 1961.

Francis A. Cherry, an examiner for the control board, recommended in December 1961 that the board label the mine-mill union Communist infiltrated and bar the organization from bargaining under the provisions of the National Labor Relations Board Act.

Cherry said in his findings that the mine-mill union is "substantially directed, dominated or controlled by individuals who are (or have been) actively engaged in giving support to the Communist Party of the United States."

"The aid and support flowing to the Communist Party (U.S.A.) from the union and its controlling leadership have been real, substantial, and significant," Cherry said in the report.

The board concurred and on May 4, 1962, officially labeled the International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers as "Communist infiltrated."

UNION APPEALS

The union has appealed the decision to the Federal court of appeals in the District of Columbia. The court has set a hearing on the appeal "on a date as soon after December 5, 1963, as possible."

Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy outlined the Government's battle against subversive activities in a report to the President and Congress dated June 1, 1963. The Mine-Mill Union is the subject of a three-page section of the report titled "Communist Infiltrated Organizations."

Seven officials or former officials of the mine-mill union are scheduled to be tried in Federal court August 26 in Denver, Colo.

They are charged in a Federal indictment with conspiring to fraudulently obtain and use the services and facilities of the National Labor Relations Board through the medium of false and fraudulent non-Communist union office affidavits.

The seven, including one from the Southeast, Charles Wilson of Columbia, Tenn., were convicted of the charge previously, but the trial was overturned on a legal technicality by the court of appeals.

No officers of Savannah Local 870 are mentioned in the criminal proceeding.

The president of Savannah Local 870 is James Edwards. Edwards, along with Jesse Doster, the local's representative to the international union, are members of the executive board of the Chatham County Crusade for Voters.

Reverend Young said he has never met either man and he understands that they seldom attend board meetings because "they are out of town much of the time." Neither local union officer could be reached for comment.

Reverend Young said the union provides rent-free office space for the civil rights movement, but the crusade pays the utility bills.

Reverend Young said the union contributes "sometimes $50, sometimes $100" periodically to the crusade. But he added, "It is no more than a large church would give."

Reverend Young said he did not know the total amount donated by the union during the past year.

Public records in the Bureau of Labor Management reports in Atlanta show that local 870 of the Mine-Mill Union gave a total of $579 to the crusade and the NAACP during the fiscal year ending June 1962. A current report is not yet available.

KING NOT AVAILABLE

Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., was not available for comment about the relationship of the Mine-Mill Union to the civil rights drive. An aid told a reporter that Dr. King is "busy writing and won't have time" to discuss the union-crusade-SCLC relationship.

Reverend Young, however, discussed the civil rights drive in southeast Georgia freely and made available his personal file to a reporter.

During the questioning of Reverend Young, a youthful member of the crusade interrupted: "Any time that the Negro tries to get his rights as a first-class American citizen somebody tries to say he's a Communist."

---

[From the Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution, July 23, 1963]

HIGHLANDER SCHOOL HELPED SET UP NEGRO VOTE CRUSADE

(By Bill Shipp)

SAVANNAH.—The Southeastern Georgia Crusade for Voters, which aims to register and organize Negro voters in the 18 counties of the First Congresional District, had ties with the controversial Highlander Folk School in Monteagle, Tenn.

The Southeastern Georgia Crusade was organized here in January 1961 at a meeting attended by Miles Horton, director of the Highlander School, and 54 persons representing all counties in the district.

Horton was keynote speaker at the meeting which set the tone for the future of Southeastern Georgia Crusade for Voters, according to Hosea Williams, president of the crusade.

Prospective adult citizenship school teachers from each county in the district were sent by the crusade for training at the Highlander School, Williams reported.

The school, which was closed when its charter was revoked in April 1961, has since reopened and has a new charter as the Highlander Research and Education Center in Knoxville, Tenn. Horton is director.

A Tennessee legislative investigation committee, which recommended the revocation of Highlander's charter in 1959, reported: "There were * * * admissions on the part of Miles Horton that he, himself, had been a member of some organizations listed as subversive" although he said he did not know at the time that they were subversive.

The Southeastern Georgia Crusade for Voters is headquartered in offices at 416 Park Avenue West, Savannah. These offices are provided, rent free, by the International Union of Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers.

This union has been found to be Communist-controlled by the Subversive Activities Control Board. The Board's finding is now under appeal to the Federal appeals Court.

The Southeastern Georgia Crusade for Voters grew out of the Chatham County Crusade for Voters, which has recently been involved in massive desegregation demonstrations here and which also operates from the offices of the Mine Mill Union in Savannah. Williams also is president of the Chatham Crusade.

The Southeastern Georgia Crusade for Voters is an affiliate of Dr. Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference. The crusade is supported largely by free-will donations and by recent grants for the voter education project of the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta.

The Southern Regional Council is directed by Leslie W. Dunbar, an honorary lieutenant colonel on the staff of Gov. Carl Sanders.

The Savannah chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People gave financial support to the crusade until it received the Southern Regional Council grant.

Then the NAACP voted to withdraw its support of the crusade. The reason for the withdrawal was not announced.

In a report to Wiley A. Branton, project director of SRC's voter education project, Crusade Leader Williams wrote:

"After the Crusade for Voters made public that it had received a $4,000 grant from the VEP for a 3-month voter registration program, the executive board of the local NAACP met and voted to stop sharing its funds with the Crusade for Voters. Officials of the Crusade for Voters objected due to the fact the grant was for only 3 months, but the NAACP board voted 20 to 10 to no longer share its funds.

"The passing of the NAACP's stop-sharing-fund motions actually matured the CCCV (Chatham Crusade). The situation demanded that the public become informed without a big display as to the real nature and purpose of the Crusade for Voters. The Crusade for Voters executive board voted to charter the organization and later apply for tax-exempted status."

Two officers of the International Union of Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers are members of the executive board.

Information concerning the crusade was made available to the Constitution by the Reverend Andrew Young, program director of Dr. King's organization and the guiding force behind the crusade while Williams was in jail on peace warrants.

The Southern Regional Council suggested that $3,000 of a $4,000 grant made last fall be spent in Chatham County and the remainder should be spent on organizing crusade structures in seven other First District counties. Jack Minnis, research director for SRC's voter education project, said, "We were very careful to be sure that the money was not spent" on direct action demonstrations.

When the first grant was made, there were 11,200 Negroes registered to vote in Chatham County. By March 1963, Williams reported that 14,000 Chatham Negroes were registered.

Williams also reported that the grant enabled the area crusade to organize or strengthen voter registrations in Liberty, Tatnall, Wheeler, Emanuel, McIntosh, and Burke Counties.

In May 1963, the Southern Regional Council approved a second grant of $4,000 to be paid in four equal installments to the crusade, according to SRC Director Dunbar.

When demonstrations erupted in Savannah, Dunbar said SRC asked Williams to account for the money and to show that none of it had been used in direct action campaigns. Williams' office assured SRC that the money was not used for demonstrations.

When Williams failed to answer formally SRC's queries, the grant was frozen with approximately $600 unexpended, Dunbar said. SRC did not contribute to the crusade in June and will not contribute in July, Dunbar said.

The aims of the crusade in the first district, according to Williams' report, are: (1) To get every eligible citizen registered to vote; (2) to get all registered voters to vote; (3) to interview all candidates; (4) to keep daily records on all public issues, public officials, political parties, etc.; (5) to operate adult citizenship schools and carry on continuous political education projects; (6) to coordinate the positive drive of all individuals so as to produce an effective political action program.

---

[From the Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution, July 24, 1963]

LIBERTY SCHOOL AIDE PLAYS BIG ROLE IN CHATHAM CRUSADE

(By Bill Shipp)

SAVANNAH.—The administrator of the Dorchester Center in nearby Liberty County played a leading role in the desegregation activities of the Chatham County Crusade for Voters.

The administrator, the Reverend Andrew Young, who also is program director of Dr. Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference, received training at the old Highlander Folk School at Monteagle, Tenn.

Before its charter at Monteagle was revoked, the Highlander School received support from the International Union of Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers.

An officer of the union, now under indictment on a charge of filing a false non-Communist affidavit, was one of the directors of the Highlander School.

The Reverend Young has been headquartered rent-free in Savannah in the offices of the International Union of Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers. The Subversive Activities Control Board, an agency of the Federal Government, has found the union to be Communist infiltrated. The Mine-Mill Union has appealed the finding to a Federal court of appeals.

The Reverend Young, who was jailed during demonstrations here, has directed much of the activities of the Chatham Crusade while its president, Hosea Williams, has been in jail.

The Reverend Young has said repeatedly that he has never encountered any Communist activity in Savannah—or at the Highlander Fair School—or at the Dorchester Center.

Among the old Highlander school directors was Charles Wilson of Columbia, Tenn., international representative of the mine-mill union in Tennessee, who was indicted by a Federal grand jury in Denver, Colo., on November 16, 1956.

He was charged with some other mine-mill officers with conspiring fraudulently to obtain and use the services of the National Labor Relations Board through the medium of false non-Communist union officer affidavits.

ON SCHOOL'S BOARD

Wilson was convicted December 17, 1959, but the conviction was overturned on appeal. He is scheduled to be retried August 28 in Federal court in Denver, Colo.

Wilson was listed in 1958 as a member of the 27-man board of directors of the Highlander School.

Two officials of the Savannah mine-mill local serve on the 70-man board of directors of the Chatham Crusade.

SCLC OPERATES

The Dorchester Center, a civil rights school administered by the Reverend Young, has trained leaders of the Chatham Crusade and the Southeastern Georgia Crusade for Voters, both headed by Hosea Williams.

The center is operated by Dr. King's SCLC and the Southern Missionary Association Division of the United Church of Christ.

Its students have included pupils who were expelled from Albany State College as a result of racial demonstrations there.

The center is under investigation by Georgia Attorney General Eugene Cook.

NO EVIDENCE

Cook said Tuesday that the investigation has turned up no evidence of subversive activities. He added that Myles Horton, executive director of the Highlander School, had been to the Dorchester Center and to Savannah.

The center is currently financed by a $250,000 grant from Marshall Field Foundation. The grant is for 2 years.

The supervisor of teaching at the center is Mrs. Steptima Poinsette Clark, 65.

Mrs. Clark served at the Highlander School as director of workshops, 1956–57, director of education, 1957–61, and director of the literacy training program in 1961.

LONG IN STRUGGLE

She lists the affiliations in her biographical sketch, made available to the Constitution by SCLC.

She has a long history of involvement in civil rights struggles.

At the end of her biography, Mrs. Clark wrote: "In 1918–1919, I went door-to-door for the NAACP, getting signatures to petition the South Carolina Legislature that Negro teachers be placed in the public schools of Charleston. We got the teachers in, in 1920."

LOST TEACHER JOB

"Then in 1956 I refused to disown the NAACP and lost my job as a public school teacher in South Carolina as a result of my membership and interracial activities. Finally, in 1959, while directing the educational program at the Highlander Folk School, I was arrested for allegedly possessing whisky (which was found by the courts to be untrue, and the case dismissed). This attack was made on me, I feel to scare me, the only Negro resident, so I would leave. I stayed."

According to the Reverend Young, Mrs. Clark is the only former staff member of Highlander working at Dorchester.

The Reverend Young said, however, that he attended classes at Highlander. Before joining Dr. King's organization, the Reverend Young said he retained a New York law firm to investigate Highlander. He showed the firm's report to the Constitution. The report says that Highlander has never been labeled subversive by any Federal agency, although a Tennessee legislative committee recommended that the school's charter be revoked.

The goal of the Dorchester Center is to train teachers to establish "Adult Citizenship Education" programs throughout the south.

In the 2 years it has operated for that purpose between 500 and 700 teachers have been trained.

One purpose of the citizenship program, according to the SCLC, is to teach reading and writing to aid Negroes in passing literary tests for voting.

The schools also are aimed at giving "an all-round education in community development."

The SCLC furnishes the cost of travel to the training center, and pays tuition.

MUST ORGANIZE

Teachers graduated from the center are required to organize schools in their areas, provide a place for the classes to be held and select a "community coordinator" for the schools in their area.

The Dorchester Center already has established branch "Saturday Citizenship Clinics" in each of Georgia's 10 congressional districts and several clinics in South Carolina and Alabama.

Courses at Dorchester are conducted for 1 week during the third week of each month, according to the Reverend Young. Classes run from about 9 a.m. until as late as 10 p.m., the Reverend Young said.

Teachers who have been trained at Dorchester have gone on to establish "citizenship classes" in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.

---

[From the Columbus (Ohio) Evening Dispatch, July 12, 1963]

CORE TO KEEP PICKETS AT GOVERNOR'S HOME

Fair housing pickets will keep up their demonstrations at the Ohio Governor's mansion "indefinitely," a spokesman for the Congress on Racial Equality said Friday.

The Reverend Arthur A. Zebbs, of 1204 Windsor Avenue, a leader of the CORE-organized pickets who have ranged widely through the Statehouse during the past several weeks, said:

"We're trying to develop bigger and bigger demonstrations. We have more and more people joining us and we plan continuous, sustained activity at the mansion."

Among those who joined the 30 or more marchers at the mansion in a several-hour demonstration Thursday night was Oscar Smilack, Columbus junk dealer, who was dubbed "the financial angel" of the Communist Party in Ohio a decade ago.

Zebbs said the pickets are "asking Governor Rhodes to call a special session of the legislature this summer to act on a fair housing law."

The clergyman, a former Cleveland resident, said that in addition to picketing activities at the mansion in Bexley, "we're going to be looking into housing developments, real estate agencies, and banks where there is clear-cut racial discrimination."

Mr. Zebbs said the activities of the Columbus CORE group are being reported to CORE's national headquarters in New York.

However, "there is no actual coordination" with any other CORE demonstrations across the Nation, he asserted.

Mr. Zebbs said the local group is expecting the Reverend Elton Cox, CORE field representative from Chicago, to meet with them, probably next week, on the Ohio program.

The picket leader said he did not know whether Smilack was among the Thursday night pickets.

Mr. Zebbs asserted definitely that Smilack was not a member of CORE.

However, when Smilack was questioned by the Disptach Friday he acknowledged that he had been among the pickets and said he is a member of the Columbus CORE chapter.

Smilack would not discuss the controversy-laden days of the early 1950's when he was found guilty of nine counts of contempt of the Ohio Un-American Activities Commission.

Smilack had refused to answer questions bearing an affiliation with the Communist Party and the late Ralph J. Bartlett, then Franklin County prosecutor hung the "financial angel" tag on him.

Friday, Smilack told the Dispatch, "I think it's very bad taste to bring up a matter like that—a political question—at this time."

Asked if he cared to answer the Communist affiliation question now, Smilack chuckled and said: "Of course not."

Smilack said he planned to join the marchers again Friday night.

The demonstrators may be one member shy Friday. Columbus police Thursday picked up on Ohio State University graduate student, Robert Henes, 24, of 110 West King Avenue, for investigation of grand larceny.

Henes, police said, has been among pickets recently at the statehouse.

[From the Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle, July 27, 1963]

A BAR TO RACIAL PROGRESS

Hunter Pitts O'Dell's association with both the Communist Party and Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference, revelation of which is now creating a storm of controversy in Atlanta, was noted by the Chronicle in an editorial last October.

We charged at that time that the Communist Party, U.S.A., after a multiplicity of unsuccessful attempts to win Southern Negroes over to communism, had succeeded in getting O'Dell, one of its most experienced organizers, into a key position with the SCLC. Latest developments in the O'Dell case have yet to prove that he is not still in such a position.

Atlanta Constitution State editor Bill Shipp, in a copyrighted story Thursday, said O'Dell—alias Jack H. O'Dell—is currently director of the SCLC office in New York City. Lending support to his story was the report of United Press International that an inquiry at the New York office Thursday morning produced the reply that O'Dell is still with the office as "administrator" of the New York operation.

King denied both stories, insisting that O'Dell's most recent association with SCLC was terminated on June 26. But Shipp and UPI stood by their reports. And a subsequent Constitution story noted that King twice before—on October 31 and December 1, 1962—reported that O'Dell had resigned from the organization.

According to highly authoritative information possessed by this newspaper, O'Dell is a concealed member of the National Committee of the Communist Party, U.S.A. During hearings before the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee on the scope of Soviet activity in the United States in 1956, he took refuge in the fifth amendment. He refused to answer questions concerning his activities as a Communist Party organizer for the New Orleans and gulf area. Nevertheless, hundreds of documents seized by New Orleans police at O'Dell's residence in March of that year clearly established his key position in the Communist movement.

That O'Dell has been linked beyond reasonable doubt with the Communist Party does not necessarily mean that any of his SCLC associates are guided by Red ties or motives. But his continued association with King's organization after last fall and the uncertainty over his present status inspire distrust of the organization and harm the cause of racial progress.

---

[From the Charleston (S.C.) News & Courier, July 28, 1963]

THE O'DELL CASE

Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy persists in saying that he can't find any Reds in the civil rights movement. The reason he can't find them is that he won't look for them.

Anyone who is willing to dig can uncover ties between the Communist Party, USA, and the racial agitation that has hit America. Only last week, the Atlanta Constitution, the liberal newspaper of which Ralph McGill is publisher, revealed a close link between a man identified as a district organizer of the Communist Party and the Reverend Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

Last Thursday, a headline on the front page of the Atlanta Constitution said: "Onetime Communist Organizer Heads Reverend King's Office in New York."

The Constitution reported that O'Dell, a former member of the National Committee of the Communist Party, USA, has been a part of Reverend King's movement during the last 2 years. He was engaged in fundraising for the SCLC. In December 1962, and January 1963, he registered at the Waluhajae Apartments in Atlanta as a representative of SCLC. Early this year, he flew with Reverend King to Savannah on a Delta Air Lines plane.

Among those working out of the New York office directed by O'Dell is Benjamin Van Clarke, 19, a leader of massive night street demonstrations in Savannah. The Constitution also says that O'Dell in 1962 attended SCLC's civil rights school at Dorchester Center in Liberty County, Ga. The SCLC "Citizenship Workbook," used at the SCLC school in Liberty County, lists J. H. O'Dell as a staff consultant on the voter education project.

When questioned at a press conference in Atlanta, Dr. King accused Ralph McGill's newspaper of "McCarthy tactics" and of "yielding to the pressures of reactionaries." He confessed, however, that O'Dell had worked for the SCLC on two occasions, but "purely in the capacity of a technician." King angrily denied that O'Dell is now employed by the SCLC's New York office or that he had held an administrative post.

When a reporter for United Press International called Reverend King's New York office Thursday morning, he was told that O'Dell was an "administrator" with the "civil rights" organization. Later in the day, the same office told the UPI that O'Dell was not connected with SCLC and that SCLC had no knowledge of his whereabouts.

Attorney General Kennedy immediately rushed to Reverend King's defense, saying that the Justice Department had no evidence that the "civil rights" leader was Communist controlled.

The American public would like to know whether the Justice Department had evidence that O'Dell was on Martin Luther King's payroll. Did Bobby Kennedy have such evidence when he went before a committee of the U.S. Senate and gave the "civil rights" leaders a clean bill of health?

We urge Senators THURMOND and JOHNSTON to put the question to Attorney General Kennedy the next time he testifies before a congressional committee.

Bobby Kennedy should be pinned down on this point. Either the Justice Department had the evidence, and withheld it from the Senate and the public, or it was shockingly negligent in not knowing that a veteran worker in Communist causes was an official of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. O'Dell has been in the news for years. If the Department of Justice is negligent in this case, how much more of the overall pattern of Communist infiltration is it missing? O'Dell is not the only "civil rights" official with a Red record. The House Un-American Activities Committee has voluminous records of persons who have been affiliated with Communist fronts.

The Justice Department is required by law to investigate Communist infiltration in the United States. Its job, contrary to what the Kennedys seem to think, is not to whitewash political allies of the administration.

The Senate should hang the O'Dell case around Attorney General Kennedy's neck until he makes full disclosure of the records concerning Communist activity in the "civil rights" movement.

---

[From South magazine]

MARTIN LUTHER KING'S TRAVELER

Almost 9 months ago a major associate of cash and glory seeking Martin Luther King was identified in press reports as a longtime, if sometimes surreptitious, functionary of the Communist Party.

This was one Jack H. O'Dell, alias Hunter Pitts O'Dell, alias John Vesey, alias Ben Jones, executive in agitator King's so-called Southern Christian Leadership Conference. As of last October, according to Birmingham

News' Washington correspondent James Free, O'Dell was a busy king bee pushing SCLC activities in the South.

O'Dell was busy at other chores earlier. He was kicked out of National Maritime Union at Galveston for circulating pro-Soviet-anti-United States propaganda. He later turned up as a New Orleans waiter, "took the fifth" when questioned by Senate probers, was identified by police in that city as a key Communist organizer in the South. Two years later he showed up at Atlanta, called himself Hunter Pitts O'Dell, a Montgomery insurance man, again took refuge behind the fifth amendment when asked about his Communist activities.

Last December 1, when asked about O'Dell's record, King said he'd looked into the matter, didn't believe the bulk of allegations but was tentatively accepting his associate's resignation pending further inquiry.

Less than a month ago, newsman Free reported that O'Dell had been on SCLC's payroll as late as January of this year, had been to Atlanta on SCLC business and was King's companion on a flight to Savannah, site of past and present SCLC depredations.

King himself is no stranger to commie-affiliated activities, spent much time in "workshops" at now outlawed Highlander Folk School, onetime mountain area for fellow travelers and such.

King hasn't been quoted on the disparity of dates between O'Dell's designation and continued chumminess of record. It takes time, of course, to check into a person's Communist background, especially when it's a matter of public record.

Maybe it's like King keeps saying, we all ought to be colorblind.

---

[From the Sacramento Bee, July 23, 1963]

NORTH STATE COMMUNIST DRAWS CROWD OF 1,400 AT UC SPEECH

BERKELEY.—An overflow crowd of 1,400 persons turned out at the University of California to hear Albert J. "Mickey" Lima, the first Communist to speak on the campus in 13 years.

Lima, northern California chairman for the Communist Party, was permitted to speak as the result of action by UC regents last June 21 in removing the long-time ban on Communist addresses on the campus.

The speaker yesterday touched on such subjects as the civil rights movement, U.S. Cuban policy, U.S. Senate Dixiecrats, "far right" Republicans, and the late Pope John's peace on earth encyclical. The audience responded with polite applause and quiet demonstrations.

Lima admitted Communists had a hand in organizing the recent freedom march in San Francisco but said most of the 30,000 who participated were mobilized by others.

He called for a new charter for the United States to provide for uniform voting laws in all States with 18 the minimum voting age. He also asked for the reapportioning of all electoral districts on the basis of population, forbidding of all forms of discrimination, and the establishment of uniform minimum wage, unemployment and pension laws for all States.

"We believe that, in time, and in the light of their own experience, a majority of Americans will be persuaded to socialism as, indeed, the answer to the country's basic needs," Lima said.

He called the Communist Party the "touchstone in the fight for Democratic rights."

He attacked United States Cuban policy as "resistance to revolutionary change that threatens U.S. monopoly interests in Latin America."

In his comment on Pope John, Lima hailed the late pontiff as "one of the most remarkable figures of our time."

During a question and answer period after his speech, Lima answered a half dozen generally antagonistic questions.

One student asked if the Communist Party were the "shovel" Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev had in mind when he spoke of burying the West.

"I hope not," Lima laughed. "He has more substantial tools than that."

---

[From the Greenville (S.C.) News]

MAN LINKED TO REDS WORKED TWICE FOR KING—LEFT ORGANIZATION BY MUTUAL AGREEMENT, SAYS MIXING LEADER

ATLANTA.—Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., said Thursday that a 39-year-old technician who was linked by congressional committees to the Communist organization worked twice for his Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

King said the Negro, Jack H. O'Dell, of New York, left the Southern Christian Leadership Conference the second time June 26 by mutual agreement because of concern that his affiliation with the integration movement would be used against it by segregationists and race baiters.

The Senate Internal Securities Subcommittee and the House Un-American Activities Committee have linked O'Dell with Communist work.

At an Atlanta hearing of the Un-American Activities Committee, a committee counsel called O'Dell a dedicated zealot for communism.

At a New Orleans hearing of the Senate group, Richard Arens, chief counsel, said O'Dell was the top man for Communist activity in Louisiana.

King acknowledged at a news conference that O'Dell "may have had some connections in the past" with communism but "we were convinced that he had renounced them and had become committed to the Christian philosophy of nonviolence in dealing with America's social injustices."

EMPLOYMENT DENIED

He denied repeatedly a recently published report that O'Dell was currently employed by the Southern Christian Leadership Conference in any capacity.

The newspaper said he was director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference's New York office. A staff employee who answered the telephone Thursday morning told United Press International O'Dell was still with the office as administrator of the New York operation. Later in the day the same office said he was not connected with the agency and had no knowledge of his whereabouts.

King told reporters he could not understand why anyone in his office would say O'Dell worked there "when he doesn't."

King said O'Dell worked for the group on two occasions—the second time after the Southern Christian Leadership Conference satisfied itself he was not a Communist as charged—but that his connection were severed for good June 26.

King said O'Dell first came to the Southern Christian Leadership Conference after work on the Bronx Committee of Citizens for Kennedy in 1960 and that a letter of commendation for O'Dell was received from Robert M. Morgenthau. He is a U.S. attorney in New York who ran against Nelson M. Rockefeller for the New York governorship.

King said O'Dell was asked to resign temporarily after published reports that he had had some relationship with the Communist Party. After an investigation, he said, "we concluded he had no present connection" and he was returned to the Southern Christian Leadership Conference staff.

MUTUALLY AGREED

He said it was mutually agreed that O'Dell should leave the Southern Christian Leadership Conference again when "it became evident in Birmingham that the crusade for civil rights had reached the conscience of America and that Mr. O'Dell's employment could be used against the organization by segregationists."

King said the O'Dell issue was being used "in another attempt to forestall and hamper the true essence of today's civil rights struggle.

"It is another McCarthy-like tactic to destroy the movement," King said.

He acknowledged that communism can use the integration movement against the United States but he felt that efforts to prevent Negroes from full rights would be used even more.

"When they realize there is a determined struggle to get rid of segregation and that the citizens of good will are behind it, the Communists will then know that one of their best tools in destroying the American image is gone," King said.

He said the Southern Christian Leadership Conference will continue to screen staff members but that we are not an investigative agency and we will not witch hunt.

"I am not going to be intimidated by some committee," King added.

In testimony before both Senate and House groups, O'Dell refused to say whether he was a Communist.

---

[From the State, July 27, 1963]

A COMMUNIST VOICE

Denials and derision have followed the allegations by Governors Barnett, of Mississippi, and Wallace, of Alabama, that Communists have played a part in the antisegregation demonstrations currently marring the American scene.

Without further comment on that score, we offer the testimony of an expert witness, James E. Jackson, editor of the Worker, successor publication to the Daily Worker, of the Communist Party of the United States.

In an editorial of July 21, 1963, the Worker has this to say:

"The selfless, and often pioneering role, of the Communists in the struggle for the freedom and equal rights of the people is unmatched by the members of any other political party in American life. The Communists, Negro and white, set a standard of leadership and service in the fight for the just rights of the Negro people that is only now being matched by numerous other forces and organizations.

"It was the Communists in the International Labor Defense who first made the issue of Scottsboro and the Jim Crow oppression of Negro Americans a cause that rang around the world. It was the Communists in the trade unions who raised the banner of struggle against racist exclusion practices and discrimination in employment. It was the Communists who were foremost among the organizers of the unorganized workers and sharecroppers in the South in the CIO's pioneering days. It was the young Communists who lit torches of hope and led exemplary struggles of the World War II generation for jobs and voting rights.

"Indeed, in the entire phase of the modern history of the Negro freedom struggle, the Communists have always played, and always will play, an honorable and dedicated role. The Communist Party of the United States wholeheartedly and selflessly supports the just struggle of the Negro people for freedom and integration in the political, economic, and social life of the Nation."

The socialist state always operates on the theory that the general run of the people are just too stupid to know what's good for them, and therefore the elite socialists must determine what's best for everyone. Then, of course, force must be applied to make them do what has been adjudged best for them. In short, the individual has little choice in the matter, and without freedom of choice there can be no real freedom.

But the most amusing thing is that the leftist socialist hates the rightist socialist more than anything else in the world. Witness the unpleasantness between the Hitlerites and Stalin's legions in the 1940's. Nevertheless, rightist or leftist, socialists are socialists and have little regard for property rights and individual liberty.

[From the Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle, July 24, 1963]

RED TINGE IN SAVANNAH

A current series of articles by Atlanta Constitution State Editor Bill Shipp offers added insight into communism's exploitation of the American Negro's drive for equal opportunity.

In his first two articles, Shipp (1) described an arrangement under which the Chatham County Crusade for Voters in Savannah is headquartered in rent-free office space of a labor union that has been found by a Government agency to be Communist-controlled; and (2) documented a connection between the Southeastern Georgia Crusade for Voters and the controversial Highlander Folk School in Monteagle, Tenn.

Activities of the two crusade organizations sparked the mass demonstrations and rioting that have plagued Savannah for several weeks.

The labor union which has provided office space and contributed money for the Chatham Crusade is the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers. The Department of Justice has charged that the union "is and has been made into an instrument for the promotion and advancement of Communist objectives." In 1950, the union was expelled from the Congress of Industrial Organizations because, the CIO said, it was controlled by Communists.

The Southeastern Georgia Crusade, an outgrowth of the Chatham organization, was formed in 1961 at a meeting addressed by Miles Horton, director of the Highlander School. Hosea Williams, president of the crusade, was quoted by Shipp as saying that that meeting, with Horton as keynote speaker, "set the tone for the future of SGCV."

The Highlander School's charter was revoked by Tennessee in 1959; it has since reopened with a new charter, new name and new home in Knoxville. But Horton is still director.

It was at a session of the Highlander School that the now well-publicized picture of Martin Luther King in the company of several known Communists was taken. The Chatham County Crusade is an affiliate of Dr. King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

In calling attention to Communist associations of some Negro leaders and Negro organizations, we do not suggest that belief in communism is the motivation of the Negro's push for equal treatment. This is the mistake made by many whites who blind themselves to the fact that most Negroes sincerely seek to remove the stigma of racial discrimination, without needing any additional motive.

But there is another side to the coin. The Negro's responsibility is to make certain his quest for equality is not directed—or even tinged—by the hand of Communist agitators. Obviously, communism seeks to capitalize upon racial turmoil—in Savannah and throughout the United States.

Responsible Negroes will shun the leadership, money and membership infiltration attempts of questionable organizations. Unfortunately, in Savannah and many other cities, the more irresponsible element has prevailed. This is reflected in the nature of their activities. It is reflected in their association with Red-tinged organizations and individuals.

KHRUSHCHEV SHOULD GIVE THE WORLD AN ACT OF GOOD FAITH

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the U.S. delegation leaves today to sign a test ban treaty with the Soviets. According to news reports, Secretary of State Rusk will remain in Moscow for a few days after the treaty is signed to probe for the real motives of the Soviets in agreeing to this treaty.

Mr. President, this is like shutting the barn door after the cows have gone. The time to find out the Soviet's real motive, if we do not already know, is before the treaty is signed, not after.

All we have had from Khrushchev and his Kremlin crowd are soft words and bad deeds. His words without exception have proved a mask for deceit, treachery, and villainy.

The American Government has repeatedly stated, immediately following each new act of duplicity by Khrushchev, that before any new agreement was reached with Khrushchev, an act of good faith would be required. Khrushchev has yet to do an act of good faith. If his motives are peaceful, then Khrushchev should be willing to perform a peaceful act.

The American people do not trust Khrushchev's words and neither do I. The treaty to be signed next week is words. Heaven help us if Khrushchev's actions under the treaty are as treacherous as his other actions.

Let Mr. Khrushchev give to the world one act of good faith, and I believe that Americans will be less skeptical of a treaty.

Khrushchev is asking for a nonaggression pact. Before we agree, we should have a nonaggression act.

There are a number of opportunities for an act of good faith by Khrushchev. I, for one, could not support a treaty with the Soviets until after, and only after, one of the following acts by Khrushchev:

First. Let Khrushchev withdraw Soviet personnel from Cuba and carry out his promise for U.S. on-site inspections in Cuba to prove the Soviets are gone.

Second. Let Mr. Khrushchev tear down the Berlin wall and permit ingress and egress between this Soviet-occupied territory and the free world.

Third. Let Mr. Khrushchev cause the Communists to lay down their arms in Laos and Vietnam and stop the Communist war of aggression in southeast Asia once and for all.

It would not be unreasonable to ask Khrushchev to prove his good faith by doing all of these acts, for a really peaceful motive by Khrushchev would require these and much more. Surely, however, it is not at all unreasonable to ask for just one of the three. If Khrushchev will do just one of these acts of good faith, I, for one, would be more inclined to vote to ratify the test ban treaty which he offered.

The American people should not be asked to trust Khrushchev on the basis of his soft words. Their trust of Khrushchev should not even be asked unless the Reds come through with an act of good faith.

The time to find out Khrushchev's real motive is before the treaty is signed, not afterward. The only way to find out Khrushchev's real motive is to demand an act of good faith. His words are useless.

TRIBUTE TO THE U.S. ARMY MATERIEL COMMAND

Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, quite often these days, we read of the anniversary of some organization, which, in many cases, has established a long and distinguished record of service to the American people going back to the very beginning of our Nation. An example was the celebration on June 14 of the 188th anniversary of the U.S. Army. Thus, it comes as somewhat of a surprise to find a governmental organization which is noting not its 25th, or 50th, or 75th anniversary, but its 1st.

I am referring to the U.S. Army Materiel Command, which completed 1 year of operations on August 1. Established last year as a result of a major reorganization of the Army, the Army Materiel Command performs the wholesale logistics mission for the Army, including research, development, procurement, production, supply, and maintenance. It is commanded by Lt. Gen. Frank S. Besson, Jr.

General Besson, while commanding the Military Railway Service in Iran during World War II, was promoted to brigadier general, and until the end of that war, was the youngest general officer in the Ground Forces.

Skilled in logistics planning, and one who has pioneered a number of concepts aimed at attaining greater speed and efficiency in the Army's transportation system, General Besson's present position is the same type of job that General Goethels, of Panama Canal fame, had in World War I. His organization was called Services of Supply, aptly abbreviated to S.O.S. In World War II, these functions were again brought together in the Army Service Forces, only to be given back at the end of the war to the Technical Services. The Army Materiel Command, though different in approach from its predecessors, represents this same basic need for unified materiel services.

During its first year of unified operations under General Besson, the U.S. Army Materiel Command has made some significant step forward in Army materiel management, which have been summarized in a recent Department of Defense news release.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, this release on progress of the Army Materiel Command during its first year of operations.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

The U.S. Army Materiel Command, which provides the Army with its fighting hardware, will complete its first year of operation August 1, 1963, with cost reduction type savings of $252 million. It will also begin its second year with 6 percent less personnel and a 7-percent increase in workload as measured by the annual funding program.

In a year-end report of its major accomplishments, the Army Materiel Command under Lt. Gen. Frank S. Besson, Jr., was

LWD - file

R&R Rel.

take the Floor, as was done in criticism of Mr. Neilan and criticize the Life magazine article. Personally, I think it a sorry story, but true, and the truth often hurts as witness the reaction to Mr. Neilan's speech,

DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE REACTION

One of the most telling reactions to Mr. Neilan's admittedly hard-hitting speech was that of Mr. John M. Bailey, chairman of the Democratic National Committee. Mr. Bailey chose to characterize Mr. Neilan as a sort of Rip Van Winkle character who had been asleep for many years and who was not up with the times. Stated another way, what Mr. Bailey was saying was that Mr. Neilan was being naive and just does not understand the way things work today. I would like to point out to my colleagues that there are all too few Ed Neilans in this country, who are willing to stick their necks out and subject themselves to attack for stating their beliefs. This point was well made in a recent article by David Lawrence which appeared in the Washington Evening Star. He said that maybe Mr. Neilan stretched his metaphor too far in his comparison of political immorality and the British sex scandal, but Mr. Lawrence added that it was time more emphasis is given to governmental affairs. In this connection, Mr. Neilan, it seems to me has rendered a real public service.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute to my colleagues on both sides of the aisle who have risen to defend both Ed Neilan as an individual and as the president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. If I may take a thought from the gentleman from Texas' [Mr. FOREMAN] comments last week, while Mr. Neilan's remarks may step on some toes in the Congress so there were cries of anguish, I am convinced that he expressed an opinion that is widely shared around the country and that it may be well for all of us to consider as future votes come up on such programs as the ARA. Perhaps also some members of the press will help settle this argument by evaluating the voting records of Members of Congress in relation to the pork barrel bills which contain self-interest legislation. How many of us are in a position to throw the first stone or challenge the outspoken allegations of President Neilan and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce? Not very many and with continuing and planned Federal deficits it is time the facts came out.

---

A NEGRO ALLIANCE FOR PROGRESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. MCFALL] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. MCFALL. Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Margaret L. Washington is a teacher in the Stockton, Calif., schools system. Stockton is the largest city in the 15th Congressional District, which I am privileged to represent.

She has written a thoughtful article which I wish to bring to the attention of the House. Mrs. Washington has suggested the establishment of a Negro Alliance for Progress, which is similar in concept to the proposed National Service Corps.

May I point out that the general plan is something which could be made applicable not only to help Negro families who leave rural areas to make their homes in cities, but also to others, regardless of race, who are faced with serious adjustment problems when they encounter totally new environments in large population centers.

The article deserves the careful consideration of all Americans who are interested in social progress for the people of our great Nation.

I am pleased to insert Mrs. Washington's work at this point:

A NEGRO ALLIANCE FOR PROGRESS

(By Mrs. Margaret L. Washington)

Momentous changes are the order of the day throughout the world—changes that affect every area of human life. But most people are so comfortable with the status quo that they have not taken cognizance of them. The change that people have resisted most is social change. Yet, social change is our most pressing problem—the granting of first-class citizenship to the Negro.

Halfway measures will never do. Although it has been worked at piecemeal for decades, the problem is far from a solution and is growing in magnitude, especially in the Nation's largest cities. A coordinated and concerted attack on a broader front than has ever been undertaken must be made if any solution is to be achieved.

According to the 1960 census, 73 percent of the nearly 19 million Negroes live in cities. One-third of these urban-dwellers live in the 25 largest American cities. Significantly, only four of these cities are in the South, pointing up the fact that decades of Negro migration was and is to northern cities.

Stating the problems of the cities succinctly, Charles E. Silberman writing in Fortune, points out that the chief problem facing the large cities should be given immediate consideration: "When city officials are talking about spreading slums, they are talking in the main about the physical deterioration of the area inhabited by Negroes." Also, he continues, "When they are talking about juvenile delinquency, the burden of welfare payments, or any of a large list of city problems, officials are talking principally about the problems of Negro adjustment to city life."

Negro leaders may give valid answers to this or they may simply say that since the whites got the Negroes into this predicament, they should get them out. Inasmuch as the whites have had 100 years to do the job, and the Negro is still a second-class citizen, the time has now arrived for the Negro to take the lead and work to secure for himself all the rights enjoyed by other citizens.

Since the Negro masses in the city ghettos have to depend upon the business, political, and professional members of their community for leadership, there is a paucity of dedicated, selfless leaders. For the businessmen, politicians, and a majority of professionals have a stake in the ghetto. It is there that they gain their livelihood and prestige. Therefore, the thinking of many Negro leaders about integration resembles that of most white integrationists. The Negro, they feel, should have adequate housing, equal treatment in public accommodations, equal opportunity for employment and education. This clearly is not enough. Equality means full participation by the Negro in everything that goes on in the larger community.

Moreover, a great many Negro leaders are not in touch with the masses in the Negro world, but are concerned principally with their own position in American society. They are busy getting as many status symbols as possible and gaining the acceptance of the whites. Such leaders, in thinking they are securing equality, are merely deluding themselves. Two recent and noteworthy incidents illustrated this delusion. One was the refusal of the Washington, D.C., Cosmos Club to accept as a member Carl T. Rowan, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State. Another was the refusal by a New York tennis club to accept the son of Dr. Ralph Bunche to its membership.

The truth is that Negroes in general do not wish to belong to white social clubs, exclusive or otherwise. It is the fact that those who apply for membership are so often rejected, regardless of their qualifications, that counts. Equality and complete acceptance will be achieved when the value standards, habits, and attitudes of the majority of Negroes approximates those of the whites.

Negro leaders must face up to the challenge of competing in a white world. No Negro business that is sound need fail because of integration. The same is true of the professions. I am not patronizing my dentist because he is a Negro, but because he is an excellent dentist. There is no basis in fact that Negroes would not continue to use the same services that have proved satisfactory for them just because they move out of the ghetto. There will, most certainly, be difficulties to surmount. Negro leaders, however, must rise to the occasion and work for a fully integrated society.

In calling attention to the dualism that obtains in Negro communities, Gunner Myrdal said in a recent address to the graduating class of Howard University, "I should not be fully candid with you if at this point I did not stress another implication of the integration of the Negro in the wider American society; namely, that the Negro professional middle and upper class will have to surrender economic monopolies which they have held, and are now holding, on the basis of prejudice." He then pointed out one of the main roadblocks in the Negro's path to first-class citizenship. "You cannot cry for the breaking down of the walls of segregation and discrimination," he continued, "while at the same time hoping to retain petty monopoly preserves among Negro clientele to give you a comfortable and uncontested economic safety." And, urging the Negro to strive for excellence, he said, "You must have the courage to choose a harder life in which your abilities will be tested against the norms established in the wider American society and, indeed, in the whole world."

As yet, it is only a minority of whites who favor the Negro's total participation in every area of American life, witness the school struggles that are going on in many cities of the North and West. The continued flight of the whites to the suburbs as the Negro communities in the large cities expand, point up the fact that limited integration is all that is desired by most whites who favor integration.

The findings of Professors Harry Sharpe and Leo Schnore, two University of Wisconsin sociologists, have serious forbodings for America's largest cities. Writing in Land Economics, a university journal, they said that nonwhites are well on the way to outnumbering whites in 50 of the Nation's largest cities. They predict that if the pattern continues, our large metropolitan areas may eventually consist of white rings surrounding nonwhite cities.

To halt these trends and solve the Negro's problems will require the undertaking of bold, new, and untried methods by both white and Negro leaders.

One way would be to promote wider communication and better understanding among whites and Negroes. The average white knows very little about the Negro. He not only knows practically nothing about his social life, church, home life, or aspirations, but in far too many cases, entertains an entirely erroneous conception of them.

An indication of misunderstanding and poor communication is shown in a study of racial integration made by the Connecticut Civil Rights Commission under the direction of Dr. Harry Stettler. This study showed that of the 556 white and 527 Negro respondents, only 10 percent of the whites thought the Negro wanted more integration, while 80 percent of the Negroes actually expressed a desire for more. About 45 percent of the white group thought that "things are satisfactory as they are," contrasted with the figure of 12 percent for Negroes. Also, 84 percent of the Negro group thought there should be more contact between the races. The corresponding figure was 35 percent for the whites.

It is the Negro's responsibility to invest in his own future. If he would be free he must take the initial action in his community. He must show that he has both the discipline and the ability to carry on in his own behalf, even though he cannot do the job alone. Help must come from the local, State, and Federal agencies. The agencies' help, however, to do the most good for the greatest number, must be administered in cooperation with or through Negro self-help organizations.

The U.S. Civil Rights Commission observed in its 1961 report, that the Government should not bear the exclusive or even the initial responsibility for the achievement of equal opportunity for all. "Nevertheless," says the Commission, "it bears a heavy responsibility, and one that—despite great strides—it has not yet discharged."

There is an immediate need for the Government to use some of its undischarged responsibility to help raise the standards of millions of disadvantaged Negroes who are crowded into the ghettoes of our large cities. In order to give effective help, I propose the Government set up a Negro Alliance for Progress. It should train people just as if they are to serve in the Peace Corps; train them to go into Negro communities to help in each such district to work with the masses in the slum areas, to give them purpose, motivation and incentive to improve their lot.

A Negro Alliance for Progress will not conflict in any way with the work of the NAACP, CORE, or the Urban League. It will be a self-help organization. Its leaders will work with the masses to help them prepare to use the rights that have been won for them, and to inform them of present and future opportunities. In some instances it would probably supplement some phase of work being done by other established organizations, especially the Urban League.

Dr. Eli Ginzberg says in the Negro Potential that Negro leaders must somehow convince the members of the race that equality cannot be bestowed; it must be earned. "Negroes must learn," he says, "how to utilize the opportunities now open to them. Only if they do so will they achieve the equality they seek." A community organized under a Negro Alliance for Progress will afford the average Negro slum-dweller the opportunity to earn equality.

A community Negro Alliance for Progress organization should be widely based. To form its official family, the leaders must reach out into the Negro community for representation from as many clubs, institutions, and organizations as possible. It must operate in community centers—those that are in existence now and those that should be set up by the Alliance. Its financing must come mainly from the participating organizations and the community at large; but the government should contribute to maintenance of staff and experts. It must carry on its work through a number of departments and committees. It must have an executive officer.

There should be departments of education, civic affairs, family life, child care, culture, and recreation. All workers must give volunteer service; its professional help being drawn from teachers, counselors, social workers, and college students within the community.

Since education is the surest way out of the slum, special stress must be put on this phase by the Alliance. At least two evenings per week should be given over the basic instruction in reading, arithmetic, and English, for those who cannot profit by attending the established adult education schools operated by city school boards. In this connection, the Alliance can give to the individuals counseling and guidance about the type of training that they need to secure technological employment and about the place to get such training.

The departments of the Alliance should carry on activities designed to help raise the standard of the community by promoting voter registration and neighborhood cleanup and beautification campaigns, family night get-togethers at the center, workshops and group discussion on housing, employment, education and respect for the law. Plays and talent shows should be sponsored, as well as a year around recreation program in which community youths can participate in wholesome activities.

The Alliance should sponsor a cooperative child-care center staffed by volunteers so that more able-bodied women, whose only reason for not working is caring for one or more small children, can participate. As there are many broken homes in the Negro community where boys, in particular, who need a father are growing up without one, the Alliance should sponsor a "big brother" guidance program in which men of good community standing take the responsibility of guiding a boy who has no father in his home.

An important function of the Alliance should be to give help to individual families. For example, a true instance which came to the personal attention of the writer involved a family of eight who moved to a western city from the rural South last year. Not only did they find many of the problems that they had hoped to have left behind, but they also found new and even more complex ones.

For 2 months they were obliged to live with relatives in an already overcrowded tenement apartment. At the end of that period the father, who has only a fifth-grade education, found work as a laborer with a construction company. He immediately moved into a four-room apartment in the same slum area. The children, five girls and one boy, range in age from 3 to 14. Four of the children attend school.

After 3 months the father was laid off from work and is now on State aid. The Alliance could bring this family into a self-help program by getting the father to take its basic training which would prepare him to get a skilled or semiskilled job. It could also assist him in finding a job that he could perform and thereby getting the family off relief.

They could then be guided in getting adequate housing in a low-rent housing project. The mother, through the homemaking classes of the Alliance would become a better and more economic manager of her household. Having finished elementary school, she could give assistance in child care as a matron on a part-time basis. She would be taught how to handle groups of children and how to maintain the program.

In this family, which serves here as a demonstration of many in various states of being, it could give the 14-year-old boy the counseling which he so badly needs. (He has been sent home from school twice for misbehavior and is becoming a problem.) He could through the Alliance be found an after-school job to assure him that he is a needed useful person. The lack of such assurances is the cause of much of the delinquency among Negro youth. He could be brought into the recreation program of the Alliance through membership in a youth club of his own age group, and the Alliance could provide youth sponsors to get the three school age girls into recreation clubs.

This family has not united with any church. An alliance to sponsor them would provide a welcome into the church of their choice. If the family has no choice, the family sponsor could introduce them to representative members of community churches, thereby helping them to become a churchgoing family with new ideals and aspirations. It can through the family sponsor get the father and mother to become registered voters, to join the PTA, and to become members of some of the departmental committees.

In this manner all families such as this one just cited could gain a sense of belonging not only to the Negro community, but also to the larger community. In that way the Negro would be solving his own problems.

It would not be the purpose of the Alliance to isolate the Negro community; the leaders must cooperate with white leaders in keeping the channels of communication open and work for Negro participation in all the affairs of the larger community.

The major solution to the Negro problem lies in the cities. Indeed, the major new frontier for civil rights today is in the Northern and Western cities. It is in these cities that the Negro Alliance for Progress should begin its fight against segregation and discrimination, by helping the masses to help themselves.

The Negro-city problem is America's problem. The extent to which its solution is hastened has implications for our well-being at home, and our success or failure as the leader of the free world.

---

END THE WORK MEASUREMENT SYSTEM IN THE POST OFFICE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALPERN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, the work measurement system imposed by post office officials on postal clerks has caused a furor, and rightly so. Postal unions and individual employees have protested strongly to me and to many other Members of the Congress concerning the stress caused by this speedup program. I am convinced that these protests have merit and have introduced H.R. 1799 which would prohibit continued use of this type of system. Many of my colleagues have introduced similar measures.

We are all concerned with the adverse effect this onerous system has had on the health and morale of postal clerks. It is an attempt to speed up the work of distributing the mail to arbitrary levels, to levels that should not be expected to apply to all individuals under all circumstances. It is an attempt to apply an

SPECIAL REPORT

YOUNG PEOPLE WITHOUT JOBS: HOW REAL IS THE PROBLEM?

Hordes of idle teen-agers unable to find work—

Such is the situation portrayed by official statistics.

Dig into the trouble, however, and you get a different picture.

Many jobs are available. Idleness often is preferred to work considered "menial."

Unions bar many young workers. So do child-labor laws. Here is the story—in actual cases.

Reported from
NEW YORK, WASHINGTON, DETROIT and SAN FRANCISCO

Nearly a million teen-agers—about 1 out of 6 of those in the nation's labor force—are looking for work and unable to find it.

That's 1 out of 7 white teen-agers; 1 out of 3 Negroes.

Yet jobs for the unskilled are going unclaimed from one end of the country to the other. Restaurants and hotels complain of chronic shortages of help. Farmers do, too, in harvest season. Home owners constantly are forced to do jobs that they would like to hire someone to do. Streets of almost every city are a mess.

Talk to Government officials handling employment problems, to employment agencies, job counselors, businessmen and others and you quickly find a wide range of explanations for what appears to be a paradox.

In some cases, union rules prevent teen-agers from getting jobs. In others, federal, State and local laws against child labor are a factor. Minimum-wage laws put pressure on employers to hold down on use of unskilled labor. Laws in many communities bar youths from working in excavations or from using power tools – including power lawn mowers.

Parents are singled out for blame by many in the employment field. Says an official of a New York agency:

"Today there is no such thing as telling a youth to get a job this week or else. Instead, parents often tell their children there is no rush to get a job—especially during hot weather. During a hot spell our traffic falls off 75 per cent.

"Many teen-agers would prefer to 'bum off the old man' rather than take jobs that are considered menial or that require hard physical work."

Another in the job-placement field said: "Today's teen-agers are functional illiterates. Even those who complete school lack real training or skills."

Case histories. Examples abound to illustrate what is going on.

Recently, several jobs opened up in Washington, D. C., for grounds keepers – cutting grass, weeding, tending bushes and shrubs. Difficulties in filling the jobs are cited by a U. S. Employment Service official:

"A half dozen youths, out of work for months, turned down the job. They told me: 'That's field work. My folks did that down South and I'm not going to do it here.' Instead, they prefer to hang around street corners."

From a job-placement official in New York: "Newspaper ads show the great demand for kitchen and dish-washing help. Many white and Negro youths won't take the jobs. They feel that such work is only fit for Puerto Ricans."

A company in Detroit advertised for 50 salesmen to peddle ice cream from bicycle carts. Up to now, only half the jobs have been filled.

Says an official of the Michigan employment service: "We've got commis-

WHY TEEN-AGERS LET A LOT OF JOBS GO BEGGING

YARD WORK is considered "too hard, too sweaty" by many teen-agers. A homeowner complains: "I can't get anyone to mow the lawn."

NEW BUILDINGS attract job seekers. Young workers often specify the street and building — and refuse to take jobs elsewhere in the city.

ROUTINE JOBS are spurned by some teen-agers. One girl left, after three days, a filing job paying $60 a week. Reason given: She was bored.

sion jobs—door-to-door selling—running out of our ears. You can't find people to take them."

From the owner of a Washington, D. C., shoe-repair shop: "I can't get any help. Nobody wants to be a cobbler. Kids today just want glamour jobs."

A Maryland lumber executive relates his experience in getting two workers to spread gravel in his driveway. "When I went over to pick up the workers, their mother said they weren't around. I asked why, since they had promised to do the job, and she answered: 'The relief check's just come in. Until they drink that up, you won't find them.'"

From the head of an employment agency in New York: "I recently got a job for a young girl as a file clerk at $60 a week. After three days she stopped showing up for work. She told me that she had gotten bored with the job."

This example of teen-age job attitudes comes from a Los Angeles job agency:

"Not long ago we got a job for a girl as a clerk-typist at $75 a week—$15 a week more than she was making in her previous job. She quit after three weeks. The reason she gave us was: 'They kept me going from 9 until 5.'"

Says a job expert in New York: "Kids today all want 'fun jobs'—like receptionist—and often turn down jobs that require effort."

"Too far to walk." This "choosy" attitude about jobs shows up in city after city. One case is cited of the teen-ager in Chicago who turned down a job because the location required a six-block walk from the subway.

Jobs lacking in "status" often are rejected. A clerk-typist's job, for example, might be passed up. If that same job had the title of "administrative assistant," however, it would be snapped up—even at lower pay.

"Plenty of girls would rather not work than take a routine job," says one job authority, adding: "The trouble is that this attitude doesn't show up in the unemployment statistics that get all the headlines."

"Music, Maestro, please." Just the other day a girl walked into a New York employment agency and asked for "a creative job, one with scope." What did she have in mind? Her answer: "I'd like a job suggesting to Leonard Bernstein what music he should play."

A number of employers report difficulty in hiring office help.

"We have trouble employing young girls unless we can show them that there are other young girls on the staff," says one businessman.

In some places, office workers specify exactly where they want to work. Says an official in New York: "Young workers used to state a preference for an area—say downtown Manhattan. Now they specify the street and sometimes even the building. Just the other day we were asked to find jobs for two girls in the Pan Am Building. They weren't interested in anything else."

Employers report that many younger workers have definite ideas about how much they should be paid.

For example, take the comment of a job-placement director in New York: "If you offer some girls jobs as typists for $65 a week, they will refuse and say that their friends are making $80. They won't settle for $65, even if it means no job."

Says the head of a West Coast job agency: "We get dozens of job seekers who absolutely refuse to go below a certain salary figure."

Parents often are blamed for teen-agers' job attitudes.

A job counselor in San Francisco says: "Parents are overprotective. At the parents' urging, an amazing number of girls who have been working less than a year will quit their jobs to take a three-month vacation in the summer. And these kids are from middle - class homes, not wealthy families."

Says a specialist in job problems of young workers:

"How can you expect today's youngsters to go out and dig for a job? They have been coddled and sheltered all their life."

Another source of job trouble: insistence by parents that their children take college - preparatory work rather than business or vocational courses.

"Most parents won't let their children go to a trade school or take a commercial course," says one youth counselor. "But when their children don't make the grade and are not college material, they have no salable skills and training. Even so, these youngsters equate a high-school diploma with a white-collar job that pays well. They won't take anything else."

When rules bar employment. As for those youngsters who are willing to work, many are finding out that unions bar them from getting a job.

This experience of a West Coast teen-ager illustrates the problem: "I applied for a job the other day at a warehouse, only to find that you have to belong to the Teamsters Union. No union card, no work. It's a lot of red tape to get a card;

(continued on next page)

DOOR-TO-DOOR SELLING stirs little interest among young workers. "We have commission-type jobs running out of our ears," says one agency.

CLOCK WATCHING by youthful workers is criticized by many businesses. Some teen-agers have quit jobs that require working from 9 to 5.

"CREATIVE JOBS" are sought by many youths. One teen-ager's idea of desirable work: selecting music for Leonard Bernstein's programs.

Copyright © 1963, U.S.News & World Report, Inc.

Culinary Emancipator

(epochal advance in prandial scheduling)

Prior to the conception and fabrication of the Robertshaw "cook and hold" control systems for domestic gas and electric range ovens, possible terminal absenteeism from the kitchen was circumscribed. Heretofore, viands prepared under automatic oven control had to be extricated immediately upon completion of the culinary process to preclude thermal over-exposure or desiccation. The new and revolutionary application of chronometric and calorimetric control initially brings victuals to gustatory perfection, then instigates diminution of oven temperature to a lower level, terminating further cooking but sustaining the comestibles at their serving zenith throughout many hours duration. Presently available at your local merchants in your favorite brand-name kitchen range—superlative models primarily.

P.S. The last word in "automatic control" is still Robertshaw

Be a Better You
by Reading The National Observer

In your effort to keep up with what's going on in this world, you know what it is to be overdosed with vice and violence, crime and crisis.

The National Observer got started last year with the idea there must be many people who would welcome some relief from all this turmoil—people who want the truth, without distortion or hysteria, about national and world events, with news of cultural riches and of finest opportunities for relaxation, entertainment and self-improvement. A weekly publication in newspaper form, The National Observer is concise, interesting, full of good pictures. Your "escape" into it helps you be a better you.

The National Observer costs $10 a year, but you can get a Trial Subscription for 13 weeks for $3. Just mail coupon below.

The National Observer C4U819
1015 14th St., N.W., Washington 5, D.C.

Gentlemen: Please send me The National Observer for the next 13 weeks for $3.

☐ Check enclosed ☐ Send bill

Name .....

Address.....

City.....Zone.....

State .....

ADT® Automatic ALARMS Write Dept. U Free Booklet

FIRE · BURGLARY · HOLDUP

Consult ADT for complete protection through automatic detection. Our only business is to help safeguard life, property, profits in commercial, industrial, institutional premises. Offices nationwide. Write or telephone for full information from ADT specialists.

Executive Office: 155 Sixth Ave., New York

MORE PRIVATE EYES USE THE

$3\frac{1}{4}$ oz.

MINOX

camera than "Un-Private Eyes"!

Isn't this your year to own one, too? Brochure? Write:

MINOX CORP.
Forest Hills 75, N.Y.

..a famous camera from camera-famous West Germany

Special Report

[continued from preceding page]

. . . Many laws bar youths from "learning the business"

you have to know someone who knows someone."

Says a New York job-placement official: "Trade-union restrictions are a definite bar. Some craft unions confine their apprentice openings to sons, relatives or close friends of members."

A number of businessmen report that "teen-agers don't have a chance" when contracts contain union clauses—requiring all hiring to be done through union channels. Others blame unions for pricing young workers out of jobs.

An example of the latter is cited by a Los Angeles businessman: "The meat-cutter apprenticeship requires two years—at a starting pay of $90 to $100 a week. This is big pay for a boy who doesn't know very much. Employers are forced to hire experienced workers because they can get more output per dollar out of them."

Laws vs. employment. Work rules set by law—at federal, State and local levels—are cited as another obstacle.

Youths under 18 are prohibited from using power tools in most places. Night work is strictly regulated. So are jobs considered to be hazardous—such as working in excavations.

Says an official in the U. S. Employment Service, "These rules keep kids out of jobs. For many school dropouts, all they can do is dig ditches. Laws should be reviewed."

From the head of a Macon, Ga., hardware and farm-equipment-supply firm:

"Before the restrictive federal laws on child labor, and before the Wage-Hour law, we had at all times a group of young men who were learning the business. Many were high-school boys who worked Saturdays and in summer; others were school dropouts or newly graduated.

"All were paid on the basis of what they were worth, which usually ran 50 per cent of regular wages. Now we cannot do this." The head of this firm goes on to say that there is a "great shortage of trained men in the hardware field at all levels."

And so go the reports—throwing new light on the teen-age job problem.

Many jobless youths, it turns out, could find work if they were not so choosy about the type of job or the pay. Many others, who really want to work, are bumping into bars set by unions or by labor laws.

That's what the experts say is behind the seeming paradox of heavy unemployment with jobs going begging.

U. S. News & World Report 8/19/63 R+R Rel.

Exclusive Interview—

A NEGRO BUSINESSMAN SPEAKS HIS MIND

Will racial demonstrations, now spreading across the nation, solve the Negro's problems? Is the Negro actually a "second-class citizen"? If so, who is to blame—the white man? You get unexpected answers to these and other questions from a leading Negro businessman. He is S. B. Fuller, interviewed in Chicago by a member of the staff of "U. S. News & World Report." His conclusions: A Negro, like anybody else, can get ahead only by hard work and enterprise.

At CHICAGO

Q Mr. Fuller, are the doors of opportunity closed to the Negro in America today?

A No, I don't think so. The Negro has the same rights that other people have in America—

Q In what way do you mean?

A He has a right to vote, he has a right to start a business for himself, and he has a right to find a job, providing there's anybody that he can sell his service to. But he has to learn to use those rights.

Q Did you find it possible to get ahead?

A Yes, indeed. I left Louisiana at the age of 15 years with a sixth-grade education. My people moved to Memphis, Tenn., and we lived there for eight years. Then I hitch-hiked my way to Chicago. I got a job here and found out that I could not get ahead working for somebody else.

In 1935 I had $25, and I took the $25 and bought some soap and started selling soap from door to door. And from that $25, it developed into this business today.

Q Did you find racial barriers difficult?

A No, because I sold my own people my own product.

Q What is the value of your sales annually, would you say?

A This year, it will run about 10 million dollars.

Q Do you have markets in the South, too?

A We have markets in the South for the colored only. We don't have any markets in the South where we sell to the whites. But we have white customers in the North.

Q Has that market grown much in recent years?

A Yes, it has a constant growth. We continue to buy out other companies—if we find a white company having financial problems, we buy it out. Then we keep the white employes and add to the colored payroll.

Q How many employes do you have altogether?

A We have on our direct payroll about 600 employes.

Q How many of those are white?

A About 20 per cent of them are white. And in our door-to-door selling, we have about 3,000 people selling and about 500 of those are white.

Q Is there any friction? Do white persons seem to resent working for you?

A No, the white people here are talking integration more than the colored people.

Q What do you mean by that?

A Here, in our organization, the white people are very sensitive about being treated as inferior in our organization. They are more concerned about discrimination than the Negroes are.

One thing that I find in my organization is this: If I don't watch very closely, the Negro bosses here will discriminate and hire all Negroes and no whites. I'm constantly watching them to see that they hire people on their merit and not on the color of their skin.

Q Would you say, then, that racial discrimination is found among all races?

A It is a universal human trait—and people use it, if they can do so, at a profit. When it becomes unprofitable, they forget it.

Here in our organization, it pays the white people not to discriminate against the Negro, and they don't. But the Negroes will discriminate against the white people because they are trying to get the white people out of some of these well-paying jobs and put some Negroes in them.

Q In what way do they try this?

A If a white man applies for a job, and if nobody else knows it, the Negro supervisor will not hire him. He'll hire another Negro.

Q In general, what do you think is the answer to the race problem in this country?

A Well, the problem is one the Negro has to work out himself. Negroes are not discriminated against because of the color of their skin. They are discriminated against because they have not anything to offer that people want to buy.

The minute that they can develop themselves so they excel in whatever they do—then they are going to find that they don't have any real problems.

An example is baseball. There was discrimination in the big leagues. But when the owners of the big leagues found out that Negroes could play just as well as whites, discrimination in the big leagues ended as far as Negro players are concerned.

 Copyright © 1963, U. S. News & World Report, Inc.

—Ernest Dellahoussaye Photos

Mr. Fuller inspects operations at his cosmetics plant in Chicago

S. B. Fuller, at 58, has reached a level of business success attained by few men—white or Negro. In addition to the Fuller Products Company, which produces a nationally known line of cosmetics and allied products, he controls eight other corporations. Among them is a department store in Chicago, a real estate trust in New York, and the "Courier" chain of newspapers serving Negro readers in Chicago, New York, Detroit and Pittsburgh.

Born of poor parents in Louisiana, Mr. Fuller went to school only as far as the sixth grade. Moving to Chicago as a young man, he started the Fuller Products Company in 1935 on capital of $25. Today its gross sales come to more than 10 million dollars a year. While he opposes the views and tactics being used by "militant" Negroes, Mr. Fuller describes himself as an "integrationist"—pointing out that many of his employes are white.

Q Is there any justification, then, for Negro complaints about their lot in life?

A They have some legitimate complaints, but not very many. They will find that you cannot sue a man and make him want to live next door to you. You've got to sell him the idea that you are just as good as he is, by performance. You must perform well in your job. You must train your youngsters. You must keep your community as clean as the white man's community. You must keep up the home as well as he does.

Q If the Negroes have not done these things, why is that?

A I don't think that the Negroes have been taught enough concerning this. Remember this: The Negroes have been free for 100 years, but, during that time, the white man has not told Negroes the truth. He has always taught the Negroes that they were at a disadvantage. He never told Negroes that they should do business for themselves, that they should clean up their own community and that they should accept community responsibility.

They have never told him this in plain English. Nor has the white man told Negroes what the white people say about the Negro when the Negro is not present. This is what they should start doing—telling Negroes in their presence what they say about them in their absence.

Q Do you mean mention the unfavorable comments about Negroes?

A Yes. If it's bad, then tell them.

Q Are the racial demonstrations doing any good?

A The demonstrations have made the white man know that the Negroes are dissatisfied. But he knew that in the first place. Beyond that, I don't think they have done any good. In fact, they have done harm in the picture they give of Negroes.

Q Will the demonstrations continue, do you think?

A Oh, they will go on as long as they get publicity from it. When they don't get any publicity, they will die out. I don't think the demonstrations will go on as much as 18 months longer.

Q Do Martin Luther King and others of his views speak for the Negro people as a whole?

A No, they speak for certain small groups of people. If they were speaking for the Negro people as a whole, you'd find more Negroes demonstrating. As it is, those who are demonstrating and "sitting in" are a very small minority of the Negroes.

Q Are the Black Muslims really important in the Negro community?

A No, they are not. The Black Muslims have a very small organization. It is tightly organized and its members are loyal to their cause, but their number is very small.

Q Why is it that we hear so much about the frustrations of the Negro?

A It's because they have been played up so much on the television, on the radio and in the newspapers.

Q Do you ever hear of militant Negroes calling you an "Uncle Tom"?

A No Negro calls me an "Uncle Tom." He can't call me "Uncle Tom" because I employ white people. And "Uncle Tom" never employed any white people.

Q What about the charge of some militant Negroes that Negro moderates are subservient to whites?

A I think that this is very dangerous—it is an attempt to muzzle free speech. I think that every man should have a right to his own opinion. I may disagree with him, but I defend his right to say it.

There are more moderates than we hear of, but some are afraid to give their opinion. They are being muzzled, they are somewhat fearful of speaking out.

Q Do you find any other Negro businessmen getting ahead in the same way that you did?

A I find a few, but I don't think that enough Negroes are doing so, because no one has sat down and told them of the possibilities of doing something for themselves.

Q What about the argument that it is the white man or "society" that is to blame for the Negro's problems?

A The crimes that you find in Harlem, for instance, are caused by the people of Harlem, and it's nobody's fault but that of the people of Harlem. I came from a very poor family and, in those days, there was not the crime that you have today. When I was a boy, they kept us busy doing something. Today it's hard to find a boy in Harlem to sell newspapers.

(continued on next page)

. . . "I don't think that any law can make me second class"

Q Do most Negroes, in your opinion, want integration?

A I think that Negroes want integration—but not as the white man thinks they want it.

Q In what way do they want it?

A I think Negroes want to know that they have the opportunity to go wherever they want to go and live wherever they want to live. Whether they go there or not, they want the privilege of going there.

Q Once this is obtained, do you think Negroes then would tend to stay together?

A They would—they would follow their own patterns.

Q Do Negroes today have the same ambitions in life as white people do?

A They have the same ambition in life that white people have, but they don't know how to go about satisfying that ambition. They think that they can succeed by working for other people. The thing is, if all the white people worked for somebody else, then the white people would not be in the position that they are today.

Q Will Negroes work just as hard as anybody else to get ahead in spite of all obstacles?

A They will, once they have been shown the way. You see, Negro people do not understand that they must own their own businesses. They must give jobs—not just ask for jobs.

They have as much right to employ the white man as the white man has to employ them. They must remember that every one of us is born with a spark of divinity, but it's up to the individual to fan that spark.

REAL "ROAD TO PROGRESS"—

Q Is getting ahead in business and industry, then, an essential part of the Negro's progress?

A It is the really essential part. I think there's no other road that leads to progress.

Let me say this: Negro people spend about 23 billion dollars annually in America. If they controlled 80 per cent of this 23 billion dollars, that would be about 18 billion dollars. Now, let's say they had 10 per cent profit. That would be 1.8 billion dollars as capital that they would have to work with every year. This would be power in their hands. And two things are power in America—the vote and the dollar.

Q Has there ever been, in your knowledge, any race that has gotten ahead in the world without this ability in business and industry?

A No, I never heard of any racial group in this country or any other country that was able to get ahead without participating in business.

Q Are there Negroes supplying the Negro market for clothing and for food, that you know of?

A A few.

Q Are there Negro automobile dealers?

A None that I know of.

Q Are there Negro construction men—builders?

A Very, very few.

Q Who are some of the other successful Negro businessmen like yourself?

A Well, John H. Johnson here in Chicago—he's a very successful magazine publisher.

There are a number of Negroes in the insurance business.

Q Have Negroes done everything they can do to help themselves?

A No, I don't think they have. They have failed to go into business. I'll give you an illustration: In Chicago alone we have millions of dollars invested in church property. I know of one church in Chicago that cost over a million dollars. But we have not had that kind of money invested in business.

Now, if those people could put a million dollars in their church, they could have taken another million dollars and started a business. And this would have helped them employ themselves and others, too.

Q Do you find Negroes thinking about ways to take advantage of that market?

A No. Too much is being said to them about civil rights and too much has been said about their being second-class citizens. I don't consider myself a second-class citizen.

Q Can Negroes, do you think, consider themselves first-class citizens?

A Yes—if they work at it. I don't think that you legislate quality in the man. Quality is developed from within. And INTEGRATED OFFICE. Mr. Fuller tells his supervisors to "hire people on merit and not on the color of their skin."

I don't think that any law you pass can make me second class, because I am what I think I am.

Q Did white people try to keep you from succeeding?

A No more than they would any other competitor. In America, it's a capitalistic system and it's competitive. Of course, they are going to give you competition. When I started selling among my own people, there were white people out there selling to them, too. But there was no barrier because of my race.

Q Looking at your own success, what is the secret of it?

A First, a man must have determination. He must be ambitious. He must be enthusiastic over doing things for himself. He must have confidence in himself. I have confidence in myself. I have more confidence in myself than I have in anybody else. So I would not trust anybody to set a salary for me, because I realize that I will pay myself more than anybody else would pay.

I have a sixth-grade education. But last year I paid an in-

. . . "Negroes must learn to risk their capital"

come tax on over $100,000. How else could a sixth-grade scholar have a job in America that paid him over $100,000 a year unless he was in business for himself?

Q Why are Negroes reluctant to get into business? Are they afraid to assume responsibility, do you think?

A Yes, I do think so. There have been some failures in Negro business; there are failures in all businesses. But Negroes must learn to risk their capital—not put it in other people's banks and draw 3 or 4 per cent on it, when they could use it among themselves and make 10 or 15 per cent.

Q Would you say that today it is still possible for a Negro with a high-school diploma to make good?

A Oh, yes. It's still possible for a Negro with a grammar-school education to make good. I have a young Negro who sells—he's 24 years old. He came from Lexington, Miss., and I've taught him to sell, and he's averaging now from $10,000 to $12,000 a year selling from door to door.

"LAWS DO LITTLE GOOD"—

Q Will laws passed in Washington assure the Negroes the things they really want?

A The laws are going to do very little good, because in the North the Negro has every legal right that anyone else has. In the South, there is legal segregation—but in the North we don't have it. So when the white people in the North keep away from the colored people, it is because it's not an economic advantage to get together.

Q What about the Negroes in the South?

A The only way the Negro in the South can solve his problem is to continue to press for the ballot—not for sit-ins and not for eating at the lunch counter and not for the other rights. First, there must be the right to vote. Once he starts voting, you will find the racial issue in the South will disappear.

Q Is the racial conflict in this country going to spread? Will it result in bloodshed?

A No. I think the racial conflict in this country is at its height right now. From now on it's going to have a trend downward.

Q Do Negroes still tend to feel inferior?

A Yes. Negro people are just as good as anybody else. This they must know. But they cannot convince others until they convince themselves.

I have found no barriers to me in business. I am a member of the National Association of Manufacturers, of the Chicago Association of Commerce and Industry, of the Illinois State Chamber of Commerce, of the National Association of Direct Selling Companies. I serve on committees, I can be elected to any office that I aspire to in these organizations. There is no discrimination that I find in these organizations.

Q What about the charge that well-to-do Negroes tend to ignore the rest of the Negro community and its problems? Is there any truth to this?

A No, I don't think so. I am working with the churches and all the civic organizations in Chicago. I am a member of the board of the Chicago Association of Commerce and Industry, I'm a member of the local Chamber of Commerce, I work with the YMCA, I work with the Urban League, I work with all of the civic organizations in the community.

I am trying right now to organize a group to buy a hospital in the Negro community, and I'm also the treasurer of the Midwest Baptist Home for the Aged. I am in civic affairs and I find all the other Negroes here in business are doing the same thing.

Q What would be your advice today to a young Negro coming out of school?

A My advice today is, first, go to school and get a good education. It's not up to the teacher to see that he gets it. It's up to the student. When a Negro child goes to school, he must concentrate on his work.

Then, when he comes out of school, come out with something to offer, a talent that he can sell.

Q But we hear that the schools available to Negroes often are inferior, that they don't offer a good education—

A Well, I think that the schools that the Negroes attend here in Chicago have about the same facilities as other schools. Anyway, it's not so much the facilities of the school that count as the attitude of the student.

Q Will demonstrations encourage Negroes to work harder, become more self-reliant?

A No. I find that the Negro today does not have as much ambition as he had 25 years ago.

Q Why is that?

A I think the trouble is that no one tells the Negro that he's responsible for himself—being unemployed. When I was a boy nobody helped us. You had to help yourself, and you had to learn to "do." You had to have the know-how plus the do-how.

My mother died when I was 17 years old. She left six besides myself. The relief people came and offered us some relief, but we did not accept it, because it was something of a shame for people to receive relief in those days. We were embarrassed just because the relief woman came to talk to us. We did not want the neighbors to know we couldn't make it for ourselves. So we youngsters made it for ourselves.

Q What kind of work did you do?

A I sold from door to door. I started selling from door to door when I was 9 years old, and have been selling ever since.

Q Do you feel that some races have more of an aptitude for business than others or more of an ability to sell?

A No. It's all in the desire. Any time that you can create a desire in the Negro to sell, he's just as good a salesman as anybody else.

Q Do you have Negro salesmen serving white customers?

A Yes, in some places we do.

WHY OUTLOOK IS BRIGHT—

Q Are you generally optimistic on the future of the Negro race in this country?

A Oh, yes.

Q Is America, do you think, a good place for Negroes?

A America is the best place for the Negro in the world. America is the best place for any man in the world.

Q Is the Negro basically unhappy, do you think?

A I think the Negro is very unhappy, but it's not from segregation. He's unhappy because he is unemployed.

Some of the leaders will tell him he's unemployed because he's a Negro, and that segregation is the cause of his being unemployed. But that is not true. We have unemployment in America, and the Negro is the last hired and the first fired because he doesn't do any of the hiring or the firing.

Q What is the answer, then, to the Negro's future?

A Work. And not only that: He must work and he must save his money and he must pool his money. If he wants integration, he must hire white people just as he wants white people to hire him. [END]

Newsweek Aug. 19, 1963

LETTERS

When the editors of NEWSWEEK asked public-opinion analyst Louis Harris to conduct a survey of American Negroes, it was with the hope that by giving thoughtful people the facts, the magazine could make a contribution to greater understanding in the current racial crisis. The response was immediate and gratifying. "The Negro in America" has elicited more interest than any article in the magazine's history. It is unusual for NEWSWEEK to devote its LETTERS section to the same subject for two weeks running, but then, so was the size of the response.

My congratulations on a stunning achievement. After these many years of tenth-removed speculation on the color question, it is a relief and a revelation to read NEWSWEEK's factually grounded, excitingly written account of it. All who worked on the article deserve the general reader's gratitude and warmest wishes.

Norman Cousins, Editor
Saturday Review
New York City

Even the most hard-bitten segregationist must have had a twinge of conscience after reading "The Negro in America."

Robert L. Daniels
Des Moines, Iowa

The American Negro's drive for securing the equal rights and opportunities denied him so long is certain to culminate in the removal of all existing racial barriers. Policies of discrimination and segregation directed against the Negro in the past solely because of his race must inevitably yield under the weight of the Negro's present militant march toward full citizenship.

A lack of information about the aspirations and goals of the Negro has resulted in much fear and misunderstanding of the Negro's social revolution. Your special report will most certainly help to dispel much of this fear, while at the same time aiding both white and Negro citizens in gaining a clearer insight into the significance of the current civil-rights movement.

John E. Babiarz, Mayor
Wilmington, Del.

I want to commend you and your organization for what is, in my humble opinion, the most objective appraisal of the fundamental factors which determine the basic drives of the contemporary American Negro.

Marquis L. Harris, Resident Bishop
The Methodist Church
Atlanta, Ga.

I can no longer have NEWSWEEK come into my home. Twenty pages of Negro propaganda are too much. If I wanted to know all the Negroes' wants without any information as to their obligations, I would subscribe to Ebony.

(Miss) Mary S. Yoste
Vicksburg, Miss.

Your survey of the Negro situation is typical of your thorough coverage of a difficult subject. I have read it carefully and feel that you have rendered a real service to your readers and to the entire cause of racial understanding.

David S. Cook, Assistant to the President
General Dynamics
Rochester, N.Y.

The wonderful job you did in your issue on the American Negro is something you can be mighty proud of, and I congratulate you on it.

Walter W. Heller
The Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers
Washington, D.C.

I would like to congratulate you for your excellent report on the American Negro. I think that I am qualified to rate this report since I myself am an American Negro who lives in what I and the city of New York term as one of the greatest of all depressed areas, the Bedford-Stuyvesant area in Brooklyn.

But I don't blame the people themselves for what this section has become; I blame those American whites who herd us into ghettos and tell us that we have the right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." And in a funny way, we do have these rights. We have them as long as we don't move into white neighborhoods or marry whites or try to take their white-collar jobs.

But then I can't blame the whites for not wanting to be equal to an American Negro. Who would want to be equal to a person who can't get a halfway decent education because of the color of his skin and is doomed to be a third-class person in a nation where there is no class distinction?

Naturally, I do not expect this letter to radically change the status of the American Negro, mainly because I am only 16 years of age. But I do think that those whites who openly and privately discriminate against us should think about my age and the way I feel toward them. Because there are millions of American Negroes my age; and in at least ten years we will all have children; and we will teach them a little lesson we learned while we were growing up: that "prejudice means hate, and hate is a universal word."

(Miss) Elsie Bennett
Brooklyn, N.Y.

If I know my fellow Americans—whatever their color—the majority will want the facts and will be willing to form new judgments in accordance with those facts.

It is harder to convince a man who is prejudiced than one who is merely ignorant; but patience and prayer will eventually prevail where prejudice exists, I am sure.

If we all could enter sympathetically into the hearts and minds of our colored brothers-in-Christ, if we could make their humiliations and frustrations our own—if only in imagination—no American would rest until equal rights had been guaranteed them.

Sister M. Venard, C.S.A.
Fond du Lac, Wis.

It distresses me deeply to witness the spectacle of a nation dedicated to equality, yet considering our minority groups as permanently inferior. I am not ashamed to admit I shed tears of humiliation and resentment as I read "The Negro in America." I am going back to my elementary-school classroom this fall with renewed determination to teach as never before those democratic attitudes and values in the hope that future generations will consider all human beings as members of the human race.

(Mrs.) Jean E. Cook
Yucaipa, Calif.

My newest resolve, as a result of reading your July 29 issue, is to start saving money to be able to migrate back to Europe—Ireland or Scotland—where my offspring must not be eventually colored.

If 2 per cent of the American Negroes wish to return to the homeland of their ancestors, to whom they are racially homogeneous and where they would have equal status, I being white wish to return to Europe; and this is beginning to become a longing.

Ralph McKinnis
Ashland, Ore.

I am black, an active Episcopalian, and a retired Air Force officer. I was born and NEWSWEEK, August 19, 1963, Volume LXII, No. 8. NEWSWEEK is published weekly by NEWSWEEK, INC., 350 Dennison Ave., Dayton 1, Ohio. Printed in U.S.A. Second Class postage paid at New York, N. Y. and at additional mailing offices.

Editorial and Executive Offices: NEWSWEEK Building, 444 Madison Avenue, New York 22, New York.
Subscription Service: Mail subscription orders, correspondence and address change instructions to NEWSWEEK, 117 East 3rd Street, Dayton 2, Ohio. On address changes send both old (preferably enclosing address labels) and new addresses, allowing four weeks for change to become effective.
Subscription Prices: U.S. Edition: 1 year $7; 2 years $11; 3 years $14; 4 years $18 within Continental United States. Add $1.00 per year postage for foreign countries members of Pan American Postal Union; $3 per year postage for foreign countries not members Pan American Postal Union, and not serviced by our International Editions.
Newsweek-By-Air: Add per year for air speeded delivery $6.50 to British Colonies, Cuba, Mexico, Puerto Rico and U.S. Possessions; $9 to Central America, Colombia, Dominican Republic, Dutch Possessions, Ecuador, French Possessions, Haiti, Peru and Venezuela; $14 to Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Paraguay and Uruguay.
Newsweek International: $8 to Western Europe, Japan, Korea, Okinawa, Guam, U.S. Military APO's and FPO's; $10 Mideast, Eastern Europe, Australia, New Zealand, India, Pakistan, Southeast Asia; $12 to Africa, Philippines.
The Associated Press is entitled to the use for republication of the local telegraphic, and cable news published herein, originated by NEWSWEEK or obtained from The Associated Press.
Copyright © 1963 by NEWSWEEK, INC. All rights reserved. Copyright under the Universal Copyright Convention and International Copyright Convention. Copyright reserved under the Pan-American Copyright Convention.
Registrado como articulo de segunda clase en la Administracion Central de Correos de esta Capital, con fecha 17 de marzo de 1944, Mexico, D.F.
Inscripta como correspondencia de segunda clase en la Administracion de Correos de la Habana, en marzo 18 de 1944.
POSTMASTERS: Send form 3579 to NEWSWEEK, 117 East Third Street, Dayton 2, Ohio.

raised in the crime-infested slums of Detroit, Mich. I have known despair, but I simply refuse to be defeated. I have been integrated for fourteen years, and I am not impressed with the so-called white world. I have served in the Episcopal Church and in the Air Force to make this a Christian world. I identify myself with the new Negro who has emerged since the Korean War with a fierce pride in his black heritage; and I, therefore, identify myself with the struggle and challenge of the new nations of Africa; for this is the source of my pride.

Cornelius Milner
Columbus, Ohio

Your staff and Mr. Harris's interviewers deserve a vote of thanks from those of us who have been concerned, but only superficially informed, about the civil-rights crisis now engulfing this country.

Thank you for undertaking this project and publishing such a comprehensive analysis. I now have a much better understanding of the problem, as I am sure many of your other readers do ... and this is a prerequisite for solution.

Gene R. Schaefer, *Director
WABCO Mass Transit Center
Pittsburgh, Pa.

Every American should read your July 29 issue, reread it, and then read it again.

Sen. Daniel K. Inouye
Washington, D.C.

When you chose interviewees, you missed us: the Negro youth of the nation. Because it is what we believe and fight for that will greatly determine the future of the U.S., I feel sure you will want to include our voice.

We are not fighting to live next door or go to school with whites. Our leaders do not run for office to sit next to whites in Congress and on committees. We couldn't care less whether or not we work next to whites.

What we will have is: the right to go to the schools which offer the best teachers and facilities; to live where we want to live; to work on jobs which are satisfying, allowing us to use and develop our skills; to join with others in deciding our national fate. We intend to enjoy this country we have helped to build. We intend to see that people like Wallace, Barnett, Faubus, and other fear-driven whites do not deprive this nation of the rights and justice our Constitution guarantees. We are terrified that irrational, ignorant men like these also sit in Congress. We are humiliated that their voices are heard overseas and that our country and way of life is thereby judged.

We are proud that we—who are accused of being Communist-inspired—and those who join us in this fight for justice, freedom, liberty, and human dignity are instrumental in reminding stagnant, indifferent Americans what it really means to be a free citizen of the U.S. When President Kennedy asked us what we could do for our country, we heard him.

Beverly Coleman
Los Angeles, Calif.

Let me congratulate you for a highly significant contribution to the discussion of one of the major issues of our time. I have read the article more than once. From a research standpoint, the Harris study is an excellent and penetrating one.

Glen W. Trimble
National Council of the Churches of Christ
New York City

Yours was a thorough, objective, heartening piece of reporting, and one much needed in the present crisis.

Years ago in the first world war, I served for a time as a white chaplain in a Negro regiment in France. My eyes were opened to the vast chasm between our boasted defense of democracy and our denial of it to one-tenth of American citizens, many of them offering their lives for this country.

On my return to the United States, I joined the NAACP and have been a director for twenty years. We white citizens wrote the Declaration of Independence, the Bill of Rights, and the Constitution. All our Negro citizens ask is that we practice what we pledged "our Lives, our Fortunes, and our sacred Honor" to in the Declaration.

Newsweek—Vytas Valaitis

It is a long hard fight, but we fight to win, for we fight with God for His children. Yes, thank you, for this great issue of NEWSWEEK.

S. Ralph Harlow
Oak Bluffs, Mass.

Perhaps what will remain on my mind the longest was Vytas Valaitis's thought-provoking cover photo.

Vicki Harlin
Phoenix, Ariz.

The Negroes are not and were not dissatisfied. Neither were they mistreated. They did not think so until you Communists fanned them into this hatred.

Lisa Keeling
Albuquerque, N.M.

Your issue on the Negro was outstanding.

Sen. Abraham Ribicoff
Washington, D.C.

The Montgomery bus boycott was conducted brilliantly by the Reverend King but was not a complete success until the NAACP won a case before the Supreme Court declaring segregation on buses unconstitutional.

Also, while Negroes are demanding their rights with greater vigor, many Caucasians and predominantly white organizations also are taking a stronger stand.

Alfred Baker Lewis, *Treasurer
NAACP
Old Greenwich, Conn.

NEWSWEEK has rendered a real service to the nation and to the Congress.

Rep. William S. Moorhead
Washington, D.C.

I am in strong sympathy with the Negro cause. All citizens of this country have the same rights and should be able to exercise them. These rights include the right to live where one pleases, eat where one pleases, and work at any job which one is capable of performing well. However, they also include the right to associate with whom one pleases, and even the right to be stupid, and the right to be bigoted. Therefore, I believe that while laws prohibiting discrimination in public places owned by everyone are fully justified, I feel that public laws prohibiting discrimination in private businesses are as wrong as the discrimination itself. There is here a conflict of rights.

But a boycott, as you point out, can be a powerful and perfectly moral weapon. I think that if a responsible organization (such as the NAACP) were to publish a list of firms which they were convinced deliberately practiced racial discrimination, many people would join in a boycott. I know that I would.

Joseph R. Hearst
Danville, Calif.

As you have stated, facts are needed by a democratic society in its search for solutions to complex problems; and we are grateful to NEWSWEEK for this report. My hope is that many of our ministers will read this issue as they work for justice and understanding.

Yoshio Fukuyama, Ph.D.
United Church Board for Homeland Ministries
New York City

You have rendered the nation a great service. You have made a contribution to the whole cause of human rights and race relations that no other magazine has made.

Benjamin E. Mays, *President
Morehouse College
Atlanta, Ga.

I believe that most Americans want the Negro to have a try at the numerous equalities he desires. I wonder, however, if the public realizes that the Negro will have to give up all the fun of being a Negro. There may no longer be a white person around to bail him out of jail, no one to give him his clothes, no one to pay his doctor bills, and maybe the Internal Revenue Service will crack down on him and make him declare his income. Together with equal rights will come equal responsibilities, which will be hard on the Negro. He will soon find that the life of white folks is much tougher than the free and easy one he had been used to; and when he gets drunk and doesn't turn up on the job, his boss may not accept his time-

Dun & Bradstreet
survey* finds
Golden Jet
Economy Coach
"Very Good"

"(They offered) special service to all who requested it"

—actual comment from Survey

*Unknown to Continental Airlines operating personnel, Dun & Bradstreet's trained researchers flew 68,382 miles over our routes. They checked every phase of our passenger service. The above finding is part of their report.

CONTINENTAL AIRLINES

SAN JUAN
PUERTO RICO-SHERATON HOTEL

OPENING OCTOBER the most exciting new resort hotel in the Caribbean. Its charms are dazzling! Deluxe guest rooms with private balconies, haute-cuisine dining, fascinating lounges, a sumptuous supper club with top-talent entertainment. Its pleasures are glittering! Magnificent private beach, garden swimming pool with cabana colony, tennis courts and great golf nearby. It promises the vacation of a lifetime! For reservations, see your Travel Agent or call your nearest Sheraton Hotel.

worn excuse that he had to go to his grandmother's funeral. When he fails to make a few payments on his nice house in a white community, he will find himself back in colored town again. But I wish him luck.

John H. Allen
Ormond Beach, Fla.

A most comprehensive review of, perhaps, the most basic problem of our time.

Wallace Johnson, Mayor
Berkeley, Calif.

Genuine peace and goodwill among the whites and Negroes will come only when the white decides to stay in the community rather than run out of it after the Negro family has moved in. To say it will come before under any other circumstances or conditions is irrational and unrealistic.

David C. McNair
New York City

The results of your survey are most thorough and informative and have the ring of authenticity. Your appraisals may well serve as a guide for our future course in this vital issue, so important to the concepts of freedom and equality in our country and our relations with half the nations of the world.

Arthur Dore
Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of North and South America
New York City

The civil-rights question is of grave importance to this nation, and it is imperative that the public be given an understanding of its motivations and goals.

Rep. Louis C. Wyman
Washington, D.C.

Your poll on the modern Negro in America floored me (not knocked out, just stunned). Your honest approach, thorough preparedness, and symbolic conclusions matched all I have experienced in the last 40 years of my life in New York City and in the Navy.

David Weisman
Little Neck, N.Y.

The Negro does not want equal opportunity. He wants privilege, and he wants it legislated for him.

Kenneth L. Swantz
Los Angeles, Calif.

Your issue on the American Negro was extremely well done. I was particularly pleased that you contacted the grass-roots people for their views. It is my conviction that while it is important to contact those who are regarded as leaders, it is equally important to get the opinions of the people who make the leaders strong.

I have never aspired to leadership in a formal sense. It makes me feel grateful that there are some people who appreciate my concern about civil rights and the strengthening of our national democracy.

Although not everyone will agree with the results of the poll or some of the conclusions, I believe all must admit you have done an outstanding public service.

Jackie Robinson
New York City

SEE BACK for Letters to the Editor concerning this story.

R & R Rel.

Newsweek
THE MAGAZINE OF NEWS SIGNIFICANCE
7/29/63

THE NEGRO IN AMERICA

HISTORY would mark it: the summer of 1963 was a time of revolution, the season when 19 million U.S. Negroes demanded payment of the century-old promissory note called the Emancipation Proclamation.

For white Americans, the events are plain enough: Negroes marching against police dogs and fire hoses. Negroes overflowing the jails, singing as they ride off in paddy wagons. Negroes lining up for the vote in the long-taboo registrars' offices of the Mississippi Delta. Negroes sprawling inside New York's City Hall in an around-the-clock lie-in. Negroes pausing to mourn a fallen leader named Medgar Evers—and taking to the streets again as soon as they had buried him.

But where did the revolution come from? The wellsprings of the river of Negro protest lie in a world as remote and as unfamiliar to most white Americans as the far side of the moon—the dark side. Who are these revolutionaries? What do they want? How deep is the tide of protest? How will Negroes fight—and how hard?

Revealing answers emerged last week in Louis Harris's first national poll for NEWSWEEK—an unprecedented anatomy of a revolution in full stride. While NEWSWEEK reporters exhaustively interviewed 100 Negro leaders, a Harris task force asked the same questions of 1,157 Negro men and women carefully chosen as a cross-section of the Negro community across the nation (page 17).

Their findings:

▶The wave of protest is an authentic, deep-seated, broadly based revolution. It has won the allegiance of vast majorities of Negroes wherever they live and whatever their age or economic lot. Its leaders are militant partly by choice—and partly because they have no choice.

▶The Negro wants no less than an end to discrimination in all its forms. He wants a better job, better pay, a better home. He wants the right to join the white man—to live next door if he chooses, to work beside him, to send the kids to school with his, to eat at his restaurants and stop at his hotels and pray at his churches. And the Negro is hungry for a bigger share in the plenty—for dishwashers and clothes driers as well as human rights.

Ebony

▶The first-rank heroes of the revolution are Martin Luther King Jr., the NAACP —and, to a degree stunningly close to unanimity, John F. Kennedy. Nine out of ten would vote for Mr. Kennedy against any of the GOP front-runners—against liberal Nelson Rockefeller as well as conservative Barry Goldwater.

▶The revolution is anti-Jim Crow—not anti-white. Negroes have their doubts about the white man; two in five think he wants to keep them down, and one Negro in five is so deeply alienated he is not sure he would fight for the U.S. in a war. But Negroes overwhelmingly reject the anti-white separatist doctrine of the Black Muslims. Most think the white man is better than he used to be and will get better still.

▶The revolt is committed to non-violence —though one Negro in five thinks some violence is inevitable. Negroes would far rather work at the bargaining table and in the courts than on the streets.

▶The Negro will, nonetheless, do what he feels he must to win. Three in five would boycott a store if asked, and roughly half say they would join a demonstration or go to jail for the cause.

▶Above all, the revolution is one of hope. Even in a toe-to-toe facedown with whites, a majority of Negroes—trusting in God, justice, or their own talents as street fighters—feel they could prevail against 10-to-1 odds. But Negroes don't think it will come to that; in any event, they certainly will not call off the revolt. They think things are already getting better. They are playing to win. They think they can.

The revolt has deep roots in the world of the American Negro. That world was born in the rural South, where Negroes still live in old, unpainted shacks with collards in the garden, petunias in a coffee can on the front porch, a slab of Hoover ham frying on the stove at daybreak, a dime-store picture of Christ or an almanac ad for Sweet Railroad Mills Snuff tacked on the wall.

But the Negro has been moving steadily from the country into town, into the cluster of railroad-red houses in the section just beyond the tracks known to whites as Catfish Row or Baptist Town or maybe Niggertown, into Birmingham or Raleigh or Buttermilk Bottom in Atlanta, where a lucky man can find a decent job. The Negro has been moving North as well—an exodus that will continue. Southern Negroes are no longer so sure the North is the other side of Jordan, but two in five would go if they could.

Sometimes the Negro escapes the worst of the ghetto—if not to a $50,000 house with a pool in Atlanta's Collier Heights or a terraced luxury apartment in Harlem, at least to that citadel of the American dream that nearly every Negro now shares: a home of his own.

If he is not lucky, a Negro winds up in the slums, where the unemployment rate soars to 25 per cent, where families crack and break, where one family in eight sees its kids forced out of school by need or lured out by the streets, where even the crime rate, though rampant, pays poorly ($5 for a stolen $90 suit), where numbers runners sell hope, saloons and narcotics pushers peddle oblivion, and nationalist street-corner orators fan the coals of alienation.

Why Now? Yet Negroes think they can make theirs a better lot. But why are they striking out now? Not, ironically, because things are so desperate but because they are more hopeful than ever. The Negro breakthrough into action after a century of grievance is propelled by the cumulative impetus of his own economic gains, his advances in education and leadership, and the shining temptations of a white man's prosperous world. The fight is not so much a revolution of despair—Negroes tend to feel they are doing better all around than they were five years ago—as a revolution of rising expectations. It is, in a sense, a television revolution. There is a TV set in nine Negro homes out of ten, poking out an antenna that senses the white world and its ways as never before. In a world of hungering men, even a soap commercial can throw sparks of revolt if its setting is a modern suburban kitchen.

Perhaps the American Negro has always been in revolt, since the churches first set his eyes over Jordan and his heart on freedom, since the field hands swapped the first subversive tales of how an underdog named Br'er Rabbit had put one over on Br'er Fox, since the first Underground Railroad escapes in slavery days and the first recorded sit-in in 1871. But the milestones in the march toward 1963 were World War II, the desegregation of the armed forces in 1948, the emergence of an independent Black Africa, and—most important of all—the Supreme Court desegregation decision in 1954. Three Negroes in five doubt the revolt would have come so far without that ruling.

'We have beseeched. We have implored. We have supplicated. We have entreated. My definition . . .

In the years since, Negroes have built up a new leadership cadre—young, talented, articulate, educated, middle class, and, most of all, militant. The Montgomery bus boycott of 1956 thrust Martin Luther King Jr. into the front rank—and, with him, the strategy of nonviolent mass protest. With that strategy erupting and spreading from Birmingham this spring, leaders and followers alike have forced even Northern Negroes to revise their old image of their Southern cousins as sleepy-eyed, countrified Uncle Toms.

"We the Negro people are now not afraid," says Mrs. Carrie Allen, who runs a grocery store in Union Springs, Ala. "We have woke up." And a New York writer remarked: "For the past 35 years or so, the country has been talking about the New Negro. The New Negro is here. The New Negro is not afraid, and he will not quit."

The question, actually, is not why he is now protesting his past and fighting for the future. The wonder is that he kept his silence for so many years.

Bob Adelman

. . . of now is yesterday'

How the Newsweek Poll Was Conducted

Newsweek—Magill

THE findings of this NEWSWEEK Poll of the Negro in America are based on more than 1,250 interviews made earlier this month. The interviews took an average of two and a quarter hours each to complete, and their sum is the most comprehensive national X-ray of the minds and hearts of Negroes, from laborer to lawyer, done in the last quarter century.

The study began in the New York offices of public-opinion analyst Louis Harris. There Harris's staffers applied the statistician's "random selection" methods to cut a cross-section of the Negro population through the country. Beginning with census tables, they broke down the racial map of the US. into the states, cities, counties, and finally the city blocks and rural routes where interviewers would go to record the voices of the Negroes.

In the beginning, every Negro 18 years old and over had an equal statistical chance to be polled. To keep the validity of that cross-section, the random drawing continued down to the level of each sharecropper's cabin or slum dweller's rooming house, with controls continually applied to ensure a representative balance of sex and geographical location. In the end the statistically valid sample of Negroes was more than six times greater than the normal Negro representation in a standard national public-opinion survey. The result is the most systematic, complete total national probability sample of Negroes ever taken. To it, NEWSWEEK added a carefully selected list of 100 Negro leaders.

The questionnaire itself was just as carefully drawn. Harris deliberately designed it to touch some of the raw nerve ends in the Negro psyche but not so hard as to distort the rest of the interview. The 252 questions were worded and put in finely drawn sequence—again to minimize distortion in the answers. Interviewers were instructed to read the questions as written, then record the answers verbatim.

Then, as a steaming heat wave hung over the U.S., 158 trained Harris interviewers pounded through the chosen Negro sample areas from the South Side of Chicago to Riviera Beach, Fla., from French's Creek, N.C., to Oakland, Calif. All of the interviewers—except for a control group of six—were themselves Negroes, a deliberate Harris-NEWSWEEK decision aimed at freer, franker communication between poller and subject. Each interviewer, moreover, answered the questionnaire personally and the results were screened to eliminate activists whose own militancy might distort the poll's results. Most pollers were teachers, principals, or graduate students; several were clergymen.

Before any of the interviews were counted, they were validated—a process under which some 50 supervisors went back to the subjects and confirmed that the interviews had actually been completed. In one case a Harris supervisor even hired an off-duty policeman to check interviews in a tense Houston slum. Another supervisor was warned away from Jackson, Miss., when a house bombing raised racial tension to fever heat.

Nightly, the questionnaires were airmailed back to New York. Negro voices were put on IBM cards, checked twice for accuracy, then fed into the first IBM computer, which made a magnetic tape for the giant 7094 computer. The 7094 counted the results of more than 3,000 man-hours of interviewing in eighteen minutes.

As the tables piled up for Harris's analysis, it was clear that the poll had worked. Questions carefully designed as cross-checks on each other had produced closely comparable results. From column after column of IBM figures clear patterns of Negro attitudes emerged. At the end, no one was more excited by the results of the poll than analyst Harris himself. "It is as though we were able," he said, "to photograph at split-second intervals an earthquake as it was taking place."

Definitions of Discrimination

To most white Americans—even to many who practice it—discrimination is just a word. But to the Negro in America it is a fact of life—the central fact. And discrimination is what the Revolution of 1963 is all about.

Question 25e in the Newsweek Poll sought to determine the nature of discrimination as the Negro sees it: "During your whole lifetime, as far as you personally are concerned, if you had to name one thing, how has discrimination affected you the most?"

The answers came in a torrent of personal, poignant, and explicit recollection.

Discrimination starts young. "As a kid I hated myself because I was black," said Richard Macon of Detroit, "because black to me meant the other side of the tracks, third-class citizenship, [taking] the brunt of the jokes." One doctor recalled: "I had to walk 5 miles to school. I passed three white schools on the way to this broken-down school."

Discrimination marches off to war. "In military service," said Charlie Jones of Chicago, "I had whites spit at me and scream 'Nigger.' I was headed overseas, and the thought of fighting and possibly dying for nothing made me feel that I was fighting without a cause."

Discrimination is served up at mealtime. It "sears you and burns you," said Mrs. Ruth M. Batson of Roxbury, Mass. "When I was 10 years old, I went to buy lunch at a restaurant in Boston, and they served me raw hot dogs. I will never, never forget that humiliation, of paying for those raw frankfurters."

I Didn't Do It: Discrimination encompasses. It is "the feeling of being choked," said one of its 422,000 Harlem victims. And discrimination doesn't discriminate. "It feels like being punished for something you didn't do," said a railroad yardman in New Orleans.

Discrimination is not an easy thing to measure statistically. The Newsweek Poll found, for example, that 12 per cent of Negroes are unemployed (more than twice the white unemployment rate)—and some of them have been out of work since 1932. But how much of this can be traced to discrimination, direct or indirect? Of those who do have jobs, one in three works in some such low-echelon category as unskilled labor or domestic service. But is this because of outright discrimination by employers or labor unions—or does it reflect the more deep-seated results of discrimination in schools? The statistics cannot say precisely, but they can report how the Negro feels about the matter.

At the top of the Negro almanac of blame stands white business, charged with salary discrimination; only one Negro in three feels he would get equal pay for equal work performed. Next, Negroes single out real-estate companies for restricting housing and for charging them higher rents. More than half of U.S. Negroes (68 per cent in the North) feel they would pay higher rents than whites for the same housing. Negroes put major blame on state and local governments for denying them public jobs. One Negro in ten blames unions for keeping them out of skilled jobs, especially in the building trades and in the North.

'We Want In': "Break the unions," says one Northern Negro. "Convince them to accept apprentices regardless of race. Even our skilled tradesmen are excluded from the better jobs because they are not union members."

Traditionally, minorities in America have recognized education as the ladder to equality, and the Negro is no exception. A whopping 97 per cent want their children to complete high school, but the realities of discrimination have intervened. The Newsweek Poll found one out of five Negro families had a child drop out of high school—one out of three drops out for financial reasons. Almost half (47 per cent) of U.S. Negroes feel that even without dropouts, their children are not getting as good an education as whites. Only a third (35 per cent) think their children get an equally good education. In the South, 59 per cent of the Negroes think their children get an inferior education, and only one-fourth think their kids are getting as good an education as whites. One Southern Negro mother summed up: "When a white child comes home from school he carries four or five books, but the Negro has only one notebook and maybe a TV Guide."

One of the most telling hallmarks of discrimination is its tendency to feed on itself. The person most discriminated against has the worst-paying job and therefore the least money and therefore the poorest housing and the least chance to get the education required to climb the ladder out of the ghetto into the better jobs. Discrimination breeds despair—and nowhere is this more dramatic than in the answers to Question 29d: "If the United States got into a war today, would you personally feel this country was worth fighting for, or not?"

Most Americans shared Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy's incredulity when author James Baldwin told him in May that some Negroes would not fight for the U.S. Baldwin overstated his case, but he knew what he was talking about.

Associated Press

'Man is not non-violent . . .

One out of five Negroes says he wouldn't fight or is not sure he would.

Nine per cent stated flatly, and often bitterly, that the U.S. is not worth fighting for (more in the low-income North, but even among the educated leadership, 5 per cent said they would not fight). "There's no stripe in the flag for a Negro," said an unemployed man in Wichita. "If he fights for his country he should have a stripe."

But despite all this deep-seated bitterness, despite the all-pervasive feeling of discrimination, nowhere was the Negro voice more eloquent than in expressing his love for America and his willingness (81 per cent) to fight for his country:

▶"I guess white people wouldn't fight if they were us, but we love America. It's our country, too . . . We love it."—Frances Rembert of Detroit.

▶"In '44, I took the oath with my mouth. In '54 I took it with my heart, because the armed forces had been integrated and I was no longer a colored lieutenant, but a lieutenant in the U.S. Army."—Dr. Byron Briscoe of Oklahoma City.

And despite "White Only," signs, despite the raw hot dogs, despite the ghetto life, Negroes choose America 4 to 1 over any other country as the place where Negroes and other minorities get the fairest break. Twenty-one per cent picked America, and the next closest were France (5 per cent), England (3 per cent), and Africa (2 per cent). No other country got as much as 1 per cent—and only 5 per cent bought the Communist claim that there is no discrimination in the Soviet world.

Fred Blackwell—Jackson Daily News

Associated Press

Jack Thornell—Jackson Daily News

. . . the world's all right. It's just the people in it make it so bad'

Complete Equality, Nothing Less

My mother bore me in the southern wild,
And I am black, but O, my soul is white!
—William Blake 1789

For far too long, the American Negro is convinced, he has been the underprivileged urchin with his nose pressed to the window, longing for the goodies inside. What he wants now is to open the door firmly, walk confidently inside, and partake of them himself.

This is the real nature of the Negro revolution, expressed in terms of what he hopes to gain from his struggle in the streets and in the courts. The NEWSWEEK Poll clearly shows that he does not want to take anything away from the whites. He doesn't want the white man's job, or his home, or his school. And it isn't just that he wants a better job, a better home, or a better school. What he really wants is to join with his white brethren in the good things of life. What he wants, in short, is real integration with the vast mass of middle-class America—not just legally but in the everyday mode of his life.

But there is no mistaking that, to the Negro, joining the whites means literally that. Sixty-six per cent of all Negroes, and that is more than 13 million of them, say that if they could live anywhere they want, they would prefer to live in mixed neighborhoods with whites. The figure is even higher—75 per cent—among lower-income Negroes who are now the most segregated.

Moreover, 42 per cent of all Negroes living in the South say that they would now rather live in the North. Since this means some 5 million Negroes, it is quite clear that the cities and suburbs of the North would be overrun should such a migration take place.

'Mean and Hard': The voices of the Negroes when they talk about integrated living are strong and clear. True, there is a minority who have no desire to move into white neighborhoods simply because they are more accustomed to their own race. "I wouldn't know how to act in a white neighborhood," says William Thornton of Dallas. "I like to be around my own people. I'm used to them," says Willie B. Ellison of Oklahoma City. Some Negroes also seem to fear the consequences of moving in with whites. "They probably would burn down my house if I lived around whites," says a Mississippi schoolteacher. "White younguns are so mean and hard to get along with," adds Grady G. Stowe of Selma, N.C.

But there are far more who want to move to White Town. Among these some—curiously—turn on their own race. "Some of our colored people are terrible," says a Chicago housewife, "the way they live, their mouths, their actions." "Living in an all-Negro neighborhood, it is dirty," says the wife of a postal clerk in Illinois. And more bluntly: "I don't like niggers!" says Lucy Howell of Memphis. But by far the most Negroes want to live with whites simply because this, to them, is what integration is all about—coming together and getting to know each other. On the lower end of the economic scale, this feeling is expressed in earthy terms. "If they get to know us," says Esther Simpson of Mount Vernon, N.Y., "they'd find out we don't all carry knives and are just as good as they. In fact, I know some I feel I am better than they are." One Midwestern Negro says: "We want to show whites we are not inhuman."

At the higher end of the scale, the response becomes less emotional. "I think I am intelligent enough to be able to communicate with any of them," says Mrs. Samuel M. Hill, a housewife from Wichita. "This is one of our largest problems." Carmen McGill, a social worker in New York City, shares this view: "I feel there is no sense in segregating ourselves when we are seeking for integration."

The Open Door: Just as the majority favor mixed living with whites, so do they favor working with whites and sending their children to mixed schools. A hefty 75 per cent would prefer to work alongside whites at their jobs, and this figure rises to 88 per cent among middle- and upper-income Negroes of the North. Similarly, 71 per cent say they would like to have their children go to school with white children.

When it comes to the vital matter of jobs, the great cry of the Negro is for

Henri Cartier-Bresson—Magnum Ted Williams

'If they get to know us they'd find out we don't all carry knives and are just as good as they are . . .

equal opportunity, for he knows full well that in many cases he is denied a job or kept in a servile position because of his color. "I ain't got no job and can't find one," says Joe Lee of Jackson, Miss. "I get one and they lay me off to have a white." A Midwestern laborer says: "A Negro has to dig the holes while the white man lays the bricks."

Some Negroes also recognize that, because of their long subjugation, many may not yet be ready for better jobs, or able to deliver if they finally land one. "The Negro has failed on his part to be qualified for promotion," says a businessman from Louisville, Ky., bluntly. "Once you are accepted," says Jesse Hawkins of Houston, Texas, "you have to prove you are capable of following through on what you demanded."

Even so, the NEWSWEEK Poll shows that Negroes aspire to almost unrealistic heights. Fully 30 per cent of the rank and file think they are qualified to rise to the professions or white-collar business, which is considerably more than the national average of 24 per cent in these categories. Twenty-eight per cent of rank-and-file Negroes think they are qualified to become skilled laborers (10 per cent already are).

School Bus: While 71 per cent of Negroes would like to see mixed schooling, not that many are sure they would want to have their children picked up by bus and transported to a white school, if that were necessary. Only 51 per cent favor bus pickup, while 30 per cent think this process would be too much of a hardship on their children. Not many Negroes, however, have any real doubt that their educational facilities, their teachers, and even their textbooks are often inferior to those in the schools where white children go.

These are some typical comments on inequality in the schools:

▶"The schools are overcrowded and they have two and three shifts—our children can't get as good an education as white children"—Lucia Jones of New York City.

▶"Some of the Negro teachers are not trained properly. The young girls today go into teaching because they are in demand and are guaranteed a job"—John H. Smith of Chicago.

▶"Children that come around me, there is something wrong. Their English is so terrible"—A pensioner from Chicago.

There can be little doubt that mass communication and mobility have to a very great extent whetted the appetite of the Negro for the good things of life—the modern kitchen the Negro housewife sees on TV or the pleasant white suburb the family spots while out driving. Among low-income Negroes of the North, for example, 80 per cent own television sets while only 31 per cent have a bathtub, and only 21 per cent have central heating. These same ratios hold true very largely for the poorer, farming-class Negro of the South. And over-all, 92 per cent of Negroes own TV sets.

Additionally, 61 per cent of them own cars. The low-income Northern Negro fares worst in car ownership with 38 per cent, but the rural Southern Negro can boast of 62 per cent ownership, and among middle- and upper-income Negroes of the South the figure rises to 94 per cent.

While the Negro has his eye firmly

In the Bull's Eye: Housing

| | Rank and File | Non-South | South | 100 Leaders |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| In living in a neighborhood, if you could find the housing you want and like, would you rather live in a neighborhood with Negroes, or in a neighborhood that had both whites and Negroes? | | | | |
| Negro neighborhood | 20 | 11 | 27 | 6 |
| Mixed neighborhood | 64 | 75 | 55 | 86 |
| Not sure | 16 | 14 | 18 | 8 |

Newsweek—Bob Mitchell

. . . our day will come'

fixed on the larger goals of integration, he also is greatly concerned with everyday wants. Today most Negroes have running water (93 per cent) and electricity (99 per cent). Sixty-two per cent also have clothes washers of some kind. But among rank-and-file Negroes, only 14 per cent have a clothes drier and only 5 per cent a dishwasher. And they make it plain they want these, too—the comforts of an affluent society.

Clean Up, Paint Up: In fact, responding to a question of what improvement they would make in their living accommodations, most Negroes say that they simply want what they now lack. Among the lower-income groups, that may be more room if their quarters are now cramped, redecorating, fresh paint, another appliance. "I'd paint the walls and wash up everything, including myself," says William Turner of Chicago. Since they have most of the basic necessities, the wants of the upper-income groups get a bit fancier. Some told the NEWSWEEK Poll they wanted central air conditioning, and one said he would like a patio and a swimming pool. Rich or poor, however, the overwhelming majority of Negroes (85 per cent) say that if they had their choice of any kind of living quarters, they would prefer a private home.

Of such things is the Negro revolution made. For the Negro feels that nothing should be denied him—not homes, not jobs, not schools, not anything else—simply because of the color of his skin. He feels that if you strip away his black skin, underneath, in reality, his soul is the same as the white man's.

Four Faces Out of 19 Million

FORTY-SEVENTH Street, just west of Cottage Grove on Chicago's South Side, is the heart of one of the largest black ghettos in the whole U.S. Some 80,000 Negroes live there in raucous noise and rotting filth, in teeming misery and grinding poverty. At the corner of 47th and Langley, a dingy record shop blares nonstop jazz. Down the street is a shoe repair shop, but everybody knows the back room is a bookie joint.

By day, 47th Street swarms with kids in tattered cotton trousers and grimy T-shirts. They play on the side streets under the porches of the tumbledown shacks or in the gaping doorways of the ancient tenements, where the broken windows are stuffed with rags and newspapers. By night, 47th Street is a grown-up world—tired old men leaning against the parking meters talking idly of nothing, younger men and women heading for the gaudy, neon-bright bars, where a prostitute can be picked up for $4. (A few blocks farther west the neighborhood gets a bit better, and the price is $5.)

Life is mean and hard in the Negro slum, yet it is home to James Wright, 43. It is, in fact, almost the only home he has ever known.

A slight, sinewy man, Wright has a thin mustache and a gold tooth that shines when he smiles. He doesn't smile often. For Wright is a bitter man—bitter at his lot and bitter at his race.

"The hell of it is," he cries out, "this could be a great world and a great city. Chicago is a great city, but it's blighted and cancerous. And the Negro is helping to kill it. They misuse freedom. They think getting drunk and having a good time is freedom."

On the Side: Wright's own share of the world at the moment is a dingy little barbecue shop on 47th Street where he serves up spareribs and sausages—with a side of cole slaw—to a thin trickle of take-out customers. One evening last week, when business was slow, Wright poked at the charcoal coals glowing in the grill that fills the front window of his store and told a visitor of his life as a slum dweller.

"I was born to a man named James Julius Caesar Wright," he said slowly and rather dubiously, "but they always said I favored Will Turner." He doesn't remember either man, and has only the most fleeting—and not very pleasant—memories of his mother. In 1928, when Wright was 8 years old, he was sent to live with his mother's parents in Des Moines and he stayed there, through the terrible first years of the depression. "We used to make many a meal off the city dump," he recalls.

When he was 14, Wright ran away, back to the slum and his mother in Chicago. "My only ambition," he says, "was to be good and stay with my mother, while everybody else was stealing milk bottles and snatching purses." It was no go. His mother had been a

Newsweek—Jeff Lowenthal

Slum dweller Wright (with Rodney): 'This could be a great world'

domestic, but Wright remembers: "Then she met a young man and he taught her how to sell whisky and run a good-time house." Like so many thousands of Negro youths before and since, Wright, who had progressed to the first year in Chicago's Wilson Junior College, quit school and struck out on his own.

A Thief Am I: Wright soon learned to steal from his employer. It began when he was working for $10 a week at a liquor store and paying $3.50 of that for a room for himself and his wife—the first of four he was to marry, not always with the benefit of divorce.

Wright frankly stole to live better—"like a king," as he puts it now—but he eventually got caught and had to make restitution to escape the police.

"I was just cocky enough not to realize what I had done," he says. "Everybody encouraged me to do wrong. I had no compunctions about stealing, so I thought I'd go to work for the telephone company and steal some of their nickels." But his reputation had followed him. The telephone company wouldn't hire him and neither would the electric company, the bus company, or other liquor stores. Wright hasn't stolen since. Instead he has tried to make a living on his own—with a motorcycle and sidecar, as a hot-dog peddler on the streets, then with a barbecue shop on 63rd Street, another pulsating artery of the ghetto, and finally with the shop he opened on 47th Street this month.

Wiping his hands on his apron, Wright drifts to the back of his store, pleased that he has cleared a few dollars on the day's business. "I'd like to move up to Evanston [a pleasant northern suburb of Chicago]," he says, waving his hand at his squalid living quarters. "It's quiet up there. I like that. But moving out of here is just turning your back on it. I'd rather just stay here and fight."

Let Them Die: Yet Wright seems to sense that even at 43 he is part of a generation that may be lost beyond redemption. "The sooner the old crop dies off the better," he says. "The kids will be better—they will be better."

Wright's greatest despair is that he no longer sees any of his former wives or the three children he fathered, and lives in his bitter world alone. "You have to have something to love," he cries, "something and someone to work for." And then, he throws his arms across his face and breaks into sobs.

A bit later, when James Wright has recovered his composure, he confides that he has found someone to love and work for in Rodney Scott, a little boy who lives across the street in a rundown tenement with six other kids and a father who doesn't work. Rodney is 9 and in the second grade, but he can just print his name and knows only the simplest words. It has become Wright's self-appointed mission to teach him to read.

This evening, pinch-faced little Rodney, clad in faded gray overalls and a soiled blue and yellow shirt, comes into the barbecue shop, lured by the glass of milk that Wright offers him if he will study. Wright sits him down at the kitchen table and asks: "What was that big word I taught you yesterday?"

Rodney, rubbing his finger in his collar, doesn't remember.

"It began with an S," Wright prompts. "S-s-s-s-s-segregation. Now what does it mean?"

Rodney tugs at the laces of his tattered sneakers and giggles.

"Segregation?" the little boy ventures. "Is it like a parade?"

FROM the grim slums of Chicago to the steep foothills of the Piedmont of South Carolina is roughly 680 miles by air and at least several light years in the life-mode of the Negro. There the Southern sharecropper scratches out a bare subsistence from the undernourished loam of gray sand and hostile red clay. In this peaceful rural setting, segregation touches the sharecropper very little or not at all, except perhaps when he goes to town and can't eat in a restaurant. Yet, as James Wright is chained to the slum, so is tenant farmer D. Frank Cobb, 54, chained to the soil, and longing wistfully for a better life.

Newsweek—Doug Mauldin

Cobb: 'Land of my own'

Cobb is a dark Negro, gnarled from a lifetime of hacking a hoe against the stubborn soil or wrestling a plow behind a mule. He tills 12 acres of land in Oconee County. His home, with its narrow wooden steps and rickety handrail, stands drably on pillars of flat stones, thinly shaded from the burning summer sun by a lone chinaberry tree.

Cobb toils in his fields from dawn to after dusk, yet he also reads a daily newspaper and keeps up with the continuing struggle of his race to escape from segregation. Without a trace of rancor he says: "The reason they are demonstrating is they see the white man ride by in his fine cars and they want some of that, too. The white man has got all the money and he keeps the Negro pushed down."

Swatting Flies: A visitor to Cobb's home is shown politely—and a bit self-consciously—into the living room, where strips of flowered wallpaper are tacked to the walls and sunlight pierces through holes in the ceiling. In faded overalls, bare feet thrust into weatherbeaten shoes, Cobb sits stiffly on a sheet-covered sofa and slaps at flies with a homemade swatter fashioned from a stick and a piece of wire screening. He tells you that not too long ago he was pretty discouraged with farming, but that he has bucked up lately.

"I feel better than I did about it," he says in his slow, deliberate speech. "If I can raise my stock, I can make it. But I'd quit if I could get a better-paying job."

Cobb raises enough tomatoes, okra, beans, squash, and corn to feed himself and his wife in season and to store in a freezer bought from Sears Roebuck and Co. on time, against the winter. Wheat he swaps at a local mill for flour, and his sixteen hogs and 30 chickens supply meat and eggs. As rent he pays half of the field crops he harvests, and to bring in a little money he takes odd jobs. But Cobb laments that the things he must buy are so much dearer now than they used to be when he and fifteen brothers and sisters grew up on the tenant farm of his father nearby. "It wasn't so awfully bad then," he says. "You could take 50 cents and get you half a side of hog, nearly."

Oh, for a TV: The Cobbs have no central heating, no running water, no inside toilet, and their only entertainment comes from a six-tube, table-model radio. They would dearly love a television set. Cobb's pleasant, smiling wife Eunice insists that she doesn't mind cooking on her cumbersome Home Comfort-brand wood stove. She likes it, in fact, "because it makes the food taste better." But from the kitchen she volunteers: "Us colored folks like conveniences as much as anybody."

Cobb, who went to a log-cabin school but had to quit in the fourth grade when his father died, feels strongly that Negro youth must have an education and a chance for a better life. He and his wife saw to it that their only child—an adopted son—went through high school. He went on to college and is now a schoolteacher at Batesburg, S.C. "You can't hardly walk down the road now without a high-school education," Cobb says.

As for himself, Frank Cobb still clings to a long-held flickering hope so many Negroes share: a place of his own. "If I just had me about 15 acres of land of my own and a house on it, I'd be doing all right," he says. "As long as I could call it mine, I'd be doing all right."

Yet, deep in his heart, Cobb knows—or at least suspects—that it is only a dream. Shuffling out to his porch, with its gaping cracks between the floorboards and two old automobile seats serving as makeshift sofas, Cobb peers out at the land.

"If I don't make it here," he says simply, "I don't make it."

THE hot mid-afternoon sun filters through the starched white curtains of the stuffy living room and throws into sharp relief the slender figure of Cornet Tyiska, a 46-year-old Los Angeles Negro. Tyiska runs a trash-collection business of his own, and that moves him up several rungs on the economic ladder from the sharecropper and the slum dweller. In a good week, with his 1946 Chevy truck, he can make as much as $125, and his wife takes in another $90 or so with the small beauty shop she runs in their home. Tyiska does not seem too concerned about civil rights, and besides, Los Angeles is a far-away place where the drums of racial strife seem dim and distant.

"Being frank, I don't think I'd get out there and mix around with demonstrations and such," Tyiska tells a visitor, speaking softly between badly spaced teeth. As he views the struggle, "all they need to have is a meeting and they'll come to some kind of agreement."

"Way I see it," Tyiska goes on to say, "the government—the President and his brother and so forth—oughta sit down and work out all these problems without all that fighting. I don't go for sicking dogs on people and kicking colored folks. There's a better way to settle things, like you and me, we is talking now. That's the way to solve problems."

But while Tyiska sees himself largely divorced from the struggle, he is able to sympathize with the aspirations of his fellow Negroes battling discrimination in the South, and to make those aspirations his own.

He's All Wrong: "Down South, things look a bit bad," he says. "You can't blame them for wanting schooling. I think it's right to want to vote and get education. That Governor Wallace is wrong. I saw him on TV, and the things he was saying was wrong. That's no way for a governor to act. You got to give them people down there a chance to improve."

Tyiska lives about 6 miles south of

Newsweek—Bob Grosh

Trashman Tyiska: 'Rough on jobs'

downtown Los Angeles on busy four-lane Normandie Avenue. He bought his three-bedroom home about two and a half years ago for $14,500, with $10,500 of that still owed on the mortgage. And though the house is faded and worn, it is clean and marked with hard-won comforts—plenty of furniture, an upright piano by the living-room door, a TV set in the corner. Tyiska's son, Cozayne, 16 (he also has a daughter, Veronica, 14), plays the piano, and his father says with a proud wide grin: "He been playing piano since he was 7 years old and he's good. Every time he walks by that thing he just has to touch a note."

A Certain Expertise: Tyiska, who moved to California from Overton, Texas, in 1941, never got beyond the eighth grade, but to survive in business he has picked up a certain expertise in the ways of his trade. "I got to know how to bid," he explains. "You know, hauling rubbish you got to figure gasoline and dumping costs into the price, but you can't go overboard."

Tyiska professes to find little segregation in Los Angeles and none at all in the restaurants he can afford to patronize. A grieved voice floats from the kitchen, where his attractive wife, Elease, is preparing a supper of liver, corn bread, candied yams, and salad. "I don't ever get to go out," she calls. "We're always eating at home."

Yet, safe in their little home, the Tyiskas can be touched by the blight on their race, even if the effects are indirect.

"Around here, it's a little rough on jobs," Tyiska says of his adopted hometown. "There's signs out all over, but my brother-in-law went out to this tire factory today and they gave him an application, but he saw only white races and Spanish people working."

Just then the phone rings and Elease answers it. It's a call from another relative, asking about her brother.

"No," she says, "he didn't get the job."

CHARLES D. SAXON SR. is an erect, handsome, distinguished-looking man with curly salt-and-pepper hair and just the faintest touch of gray beginning to creep into his neat mustache. At 50 he is the father of three lively, sports-minded sons, a 22-year employe of the Atlanta Post Office, and an enterprising building contractor on the side. With a family income after taxes of $9,300 a year, Saxon falls into the upper-middle-income group of his race. Except for the color of his skin and his segregated home, he begins to touch the life enjoyed by the vast bulk of U.S. whites.

"We have imitated you very well," Saxon tells a white visitor with a twinkle in his eye.

Indeed he has. Saxon's comfortable six-room bungalow in the southwest section of Atlanta was built for him in 1945 and paid off within 36 months. His lawn is sparkling, freshly mowed Bermuda grass, pleasantly dotted with shrubs and trees, and in the driveway sits a 1962 bronze Chevrolet Bel Air, as shiny as the day it was bought. Inside, Saxon's home is bright and immaculate and filled with handsome furniture—end tables with tooled leather tops, comfortable armchairs and tasteful occasional pieces. On either side of the living-room mantel are built-in bookshelves holding the 5-foot shelf of Harvard Classics. A well-thumbed set of the World Book Encyclopedia is in a hall bookcase. A

Newsweek—Joe McTyre

The Saxons: 'I had higher goals'

PAGINATION INCORRECT

Magnavox record player is stacked with jazz albums, for one of Saxon's enthusiasms is music. "You talk about an Ellington fan," he says, "man, I'm the most Ellington fan there is. Ellington, Count Basie, Les Brown, Harry James—I'm just a big-band man."

Private Enterprise: Although he needs the help of his wife, Marie, who teaches third grade, to reach his ample income, Saxon has other irons in the fire. In 1957 he went into contracting and built his first house, a concrete-block affair which he still owns and rents out, though he says the rent is hardly enough to repay his outlay. Since then he has built half a dozen houses, most of them on contract from buyers, and just recently, with a partner, an eight-unit brick apartment building. He and his partner are retaining ownership of the building, and in a very real sense it is Saxon's hedge against the uncertainties of the future.

Right now, for Saxon, the future looks rosy, though he is disturbed at times by the thought that if it were not for the color of his skin, he might have made it bigger. "I think I had higher goals in life than what I achieved," he says. "I'd like to be a big builder. If the real-estate market in Atlanta was as good as it was a few years ago, I know exactly where I'd be."

Saxon also has a nagging feeling that his progress could have been better at the post office, where he is a window clerk with a GS-4 government rating. "There is definite discrimination in promotion there," he says. But with his long seniority at the post office, he gets along very well with his white coworkers, even joshes with them about the problems of race: "Sometimes I tell them, 'Man, what you need is to get yourself a Supreme Court.' We have a good laugh."

Sports Bugs: Saxon came to Atlanta from Brunswick, Ga., when he was 21 years old with $10 in his pocket. At Brunswick High he had played end on the football team and this left him with an abiding love for sports which he has imparted to his sons. The eldest, Charles Jr., 21, a junior at Johnson C. Smith University in Charlotte, N.C., is a tennis bug, and Robert, 19, a sophomore at the same school, was quarterback of his Atlanta high-school team. The youngest, Eric, 13, is showing promise as a basketball player.

Saxon makes it plain that in the upward struggle of his race he intends to rely on himself more than on anyone else. "I tell my white friends: 'You expect me to know more than you with less education, to survive with fewer political rights, to live better with less economic opportunity.' That's not the specification for an inferior man. That's the specification for a superior man."

The Nature of the Revolution

REVOLUTION is always untidy, and so it is with this one. No one leader or council directs the Negro's fight for equality; chance, as much as anything, determines the site of the next skirmish.

But what the Negro lacks in a Grand Design for Equality he makes up in fervor and zeal and dedication. In their cause the Negroes stand united. Their passivity has ended. In their hearts they believe their moment has arrived. The emotion of millions was expressed by Miss Betty Ann Wilson of West Palm Beach: "All Negroes are tired of waiting for the white man to get ready to give him something that is his."

By its nature, this is a rebellion of both young and old. All have joined together to take the first step of any successful revolution—to dare to challenge the old order.

In intent, it is a peaceful revolution. It began with passive resistance and—so the Negroes hope—will end in victory through non-violence. But nobody yet knows whether great violence can be avoided. For although the Negro is fighting to preserve, rather than overthrow, the existing government and Constitution, he is nevertheless employing all the classic weapons of revolution—petitions, appeals to reason and justice, protest meetings, ultimatums, mass demonstrations, and, where he has had no choice, violence.

The Churches' Role: The foundation of the Negro's peaceable intentions rests on his own religious tradition (96 per cent of all surveyed professed a religion) and the revolutionary role of his own churches. In his present troubles the church has been tactical headquarters and sanctuary. Even in the South the police rarely interfere with the Negro's right of assembly so long as he is in church. What he has heard in church about the brotherhood of man and the justice of his struggle, plus what he has heard outside the church from racists, have given him a deep conviction in the moral rightness of ending discrimination. For Negroes this is a holy war, in which all are joined. Miss Ora Bradley of Jackson, Miss., put it simply: "When you got your hand in God's hand, you got to help each other."

The churches, say six of every ten Negroes, have borne the burden of the fight thus far. "My minister is a great race fighter," said Henry Butler, a waiter in Augusta, Ga. Of her pastor in Philadelphia, Mrs. Edna Mae Murchinson said: "He's a good preacher man. He gives us a lot of wisdom. Now he tells us to get ready because our day will come." From their ministers the Negroes borrow strength, courage, and principle. "The preacher is scared just like the other people are," said a sawmill worker in Mississippi. Givens Bryant, a San Diego truck driver, said: "They teach us not to hate in spite of our problems."

On the Firing Line: With this conviction that God marches with them, Negroes all over the nation have followed their ministers out of the churches and into the streets to employ the most visible of their revolutionary weapons—demonstration. The sit-in, the pray-in, the picketing, and the jailings have caught the imagination of Negroes from Charleston, S.C., to Cambridge, Md., to Los Angeles, Calif. The statistics tell the story: as of now, 40 per cent of Negroes say they have already taken part in a sit-in, marched in a mass protest, or picketed a store. The Negro leadership has been even more intensely involved. Of every ten Negro leaders interviewed, four reported that they have taken part in a sit-in, five have picketed a store, six have marched in a demonstration, and two have gone to jail in behalf of the cause.

Herb Snitzer

'Being a Negro has been dangerous to start with . . .

Have the demonstrations been effective? Some 80 per cent of American Negroes are sure they have. "The demonstrations have done more than anything else to win rights for us," said Mrs. Mary B. Reddon, a Washington, D.C., housewife. "Some of the white leaders wouldn't even consider sitting down with Negroes to discuss the situation before the demonstrations."

The Spur: The questions on the effectiveness of demonstrations produced a flood of opinion ranging from glee at the white man's discomfort to sober comment on the impact abroad. "Got the white folks shaking," said William Turner, an unemployed Chicagoan. "It showed those whites we ain't gonna take that stuff no more," said Mrs. Doretha Aldridge, a Philadelphia housewife. "It shut Faubus's mouth," said Mrs. C.E. Martin, a Houston religion educator. "It has awakened many white and Negro people to the moral degeneracy of apathy, it has opened many public accommodations, and it has instilled militancy among Negroes," said Thomas Burrell, a Chicago advertising copywriter. "The demonstrations have just about upset the whole world," said Albert W. Robinson, a St. Louis house painter. "They have let the white man know we want our rights."

Among a minority of Negroes, some doubt lingers about the wisdom of demonstrating. "Just got a lot of people jail records," said Mrs. Roy Houston, a St. Louis housewife. "I don't see where they have done anything yet," said Odell Mathieu, a Chicago laundry worker in his 60s. "I'm an old man, and you see, when I was down South, they didn't think about all that mess. We had to get off the sidewalk for the white man. We were scared in them days. It's these young teen-agers raising all the hell."

While the demonstrations have grabbed the headlines, the Negro has also been fighting his battle for equality with another powerful but less visible weapon—the boycott. The NEWSWEEK Poll showed that one Negro in four—perhaps 5 million in all—has already boycotted stores and products because of reports that a company was discriminating. "We hear about it in church," said a Philadelphia lawyer. "And wherever the boycott goes into effect, I stop buying." The chief targets, according to the poll, have been Wonder bread, Bond bread, and the dime stores—Woolworth, Kress, and Grant. In the North, Negroes have also shunned Borden's dairy products; in the South, some won't buy Baird's bread, Falstaff beer, or Coca-Cola. It is economically significant that most of the boycotting has been done by the Negroes with the most money to spend. Among the Negroes' upper- and middle-income brackets, more than half say they have refused to go in a store because the owner employed no Negroes.

Bargaining Power: In months to come the boycott may turn out to be a blockbuster of a weapon, for there is growing evidence that Negro leaders are beginning to understand how they can use their economic power to bargain for jobs. Two-thirds of all Negroes with incomes from $5,500 up say they stand ready to boycott any company that practices discrimination.

Yet the Negro's present militant manner conceals what, in more reflective moments, he will frankly admit: he cannot win his battle for equality without white help. Not only is he reasonable, he is more or less persuaded that eventually the white man himself will comprehend the injustice of discrimination. "A person can't go on being wrong all his life," said a farm laborer in Stateburg, S.C. "After the whites have considered that we are human regardless of our color, and that we are praying to the same God, then their attitude will change," said Ezery Jones of Alexandria, La.

The leaders, in particular, understand that ultimately the Negro can get the jobs and education and rights he demands only with the help of a white Congress, a white President, and a white Supreme Court. Actually, Negroes are skeptical of Congress' ability to act. Certainly Negroes want a Federal public-accommodations law, and four in ten believe it will take such a law to get them into restaurants, movies, hotels, and motels. But only one in ten actually expects Congress to pass such legislation. "You can't count on a Congress dominated by Southerners," said a Dallas yardworker.

What they do count on is President Kennedy and the Supreme Court. Two-thirds of all Negroes give the Supreme Court credit for their biggest breakthroughs toward equality. In their words, "The Supreme Court gave us heart to fight," and, "It started the ball rolling." Negro leaders believe the courts will continue to do most to win them their rights. But among the rank and file, almost twice as many put their faith in the President as in the courts. Said Mrs. Willie Jones of Memphis: "The President will keep on protecting us Negroes and he'll send the troops."

Danger Signs: If neither Mr. Kennedy nor the courts can bring the Negro deliverance, then the nature of this revolution may take a new and dangerous course. For although the hope of nonviolence reaches through all ranks of Negro life, the potential for violence is sobering. The Negro is determined; the demonstrations have given him the taste of victory; and he is not frightened of what the white man may do to him. He is certain to push ahead—even if that means bloodshed.

It has been said, in Southern capitals and Northern police stations, that the Associated Press

UPI

'. . . ten Negroes, if they are real men, can chase 50 white men in the lake'

Negroes do not realize the dangers they face in mass protests. Nothing could be further from the facts. The NEWSWEEK Poll contains irrefutable evidence that the Negro is fully aware of the risks he is taking. Three out of every four Negroes questioned said they knew that demonstrations may cause violence, bloodshed, loss of life, damage to property, riots, jail, hatred, even the murder of their own leaders. "It takes all of that to get rights," said Miami's Charlie Roe, unemployed. "Fights, shooting, but it takes that to make the world better." The very same idea was expressed by New Orleans attorney Nils Douglas. "Certainly there are dangers," said Douglas. "The demonstrators quite often flirt with riot. However, this is the price that has to be paid."

In the face of this danger the Negro attitude is a blend of stoicism and defiance. "We always have faced danger," said Ike Hall, a Detroit crane operator. "Being a Negro has been dangerous to start with. We have been beat and lynched and killed anyway." In Negro society, a visit to jail has been transformed from a mark of shame to a badge of honor. The poll shows that a full 48 per cent of all Negroes—9 million Americans—say they are willing to take part in mass protests even if, as in Birmingham, it means mass arrests and jailings. The meaning is clear: Negroes can duplicate the Birmingham pattern in every major city in the country.

From the Slums: The gravest threat of bloodshed today comes from the slums of big cities North and South, where one Negro in five believes he will have to use violence to win his rights. It is here, in the casbahs of Harlem and Chicago and Detroit and Memphis and scores of other cities, that the powder keg is stored. The situation is ominous: though the weight of authority and leadership is on the side of non-violence, once a Negro mob comes out of a slum, conflict and bloodshed may be unavoidable.

For all his effectiveness in mobilizing, marching, and winning some recognition, the NEWSWEEK Poll shows that the Negro has seriously neglected a free society's greatest weapon—the vote. Throughout American history, politics has been the classic method for a minority to gain recognition. The Irish and the Italians, for example, have done well in modern times; so have unions. While the Negro everywhere has been handicapped in political activity by poor education, and while he has been deliberately barred from voting in the South, the fact is that he has displayed great political apathy even where he was encouraged to enter politics. In the long struggle to come, the ballots actually cast could be the most powerful weapon of all.

Politics: It's Kennedy 30 to 1

NO POLITICIAN and no party ever did more for anyone than Abraham Lincoln and the Republicans did for the Negroes by freeing the slaves in 1863.

But 100 years later, the Negro in America has overwhelmingly endorsed John F. Kennedy and the Democrats as Lincoln's heirs.

▶So overwhelmingly that among Negroes it's Kennedy by a thumping 30 to 1 over Nelson Rockefeller, George Romney, or Barry Goldwater (chart).

▶So overwhelmingly that only four Negroes out of 100 feel the Republicans will do more than the Democrats to help Negroes in the next few years.

▶So overwhelmingly that almost one out of two Negroes (48 per cent) nominate Republican Dwight D. Eisenhower as the President who did less for Negro rights than any other President since 1932. (Three out of four—73 per cent—say Mr. Kennedy has done most.)

In short, the debate inside the GOP over how strong a stand to take on civil rights is almost academic to the Negro. In his view, the Republican Party already has become virtually a white man's party.

The short-term implications of this massive disenchantment are plain. In the 1964 election, if the trend holds, it means another 580,000 Negro votes for Mr. Kennedy. (In the 1960 election, this would have meant that instead of squeaking past Nixon by 119,000 votes, Mr. Kennedy would have won with a convincing plurality of 1,279,000 votes.)

For 1964, it will take nothing less than a miracle to change the Republican Party's image among Negroes enough to win their votes to any significant degree. The NEWSWEEK Poll asked Negroes why they felt the Republicans or the Democrats would do more to help them in the next few years. Some of their answers:

▶"Republicans are for power and money," said Laura Turpin, a 32-year-old Washington, D.C., housewife.

▶"The Democratic Party raises wages and makes it possible for everyone to live on a higher level. The Republican Party lowers wages," said Mrs. Juanita Colbert, 43, of Oklahoma City, Okla.

▶"The high aristocratic Republicans think nothing of us," said Mrs. Mary Warren, a Cincinnati, Ohio, housewife.

▶"I feel that the Republicans are for the rich and the white," said a Phoenix, Ariz., domestic.

Negro leaders are twice as Republican as the Negro rank and file, the NEWSWEEK Poll shows; one in five leaders considers himself a Republican, instead of one in ten among the rank and file. Here the Negroes closely parallel other minorities, who tend to vote Republican as they climb up the economic ladder. (One New England politician calls this the "two-bathroom syndrome"—when a poor man adds a second bathroom he changes his party affiliation from Democratic to Republican.) But any Negro leader who tries to deliver the vote to the Republicans in 1964 would likely find himself at the head of a nonexistent army—as John L. Lewis did in 1940 when he tried to take the CIO vote from Franklin D. Roosevelt. Where only 55 per cent of the Negro leaders consider themselves card-carrying Democrats, 74 per cent of the rank and file so consider themselves, and 89 per cent of them think John F. Kennedy has done a good job as President.

Marion Palfi

'The Republicans are for the rich and the white . . .

Paradoxically, there are a number of dangers for both Negroes and Democrats in the almost monolithic nature of the Negro commitment.

For the Negroes, the danger is that they may lose much of their political leverage. On the one hand, the Republicans may decide that the Negro vote cannot be had, and may therefore abandon any thought of helping the cause of civil rights. On the other hand, the Democrats may be tempted to take the Negro vote so much for granted that they similarly will flag in the cause.

Herein, of course, lies the danger for the Democrats. For in the long run, American politics have proved that a vote un-wooed is a vote un-won. Voters, as the old Alben Barkley story went, keep asking: "What have you done for me lately?" If the Democrats don't deliver for the Negroes—deliver big—the Negro voter may well go elsewhere.

'I Can't Vote': When Negroes can't vote at all, the voices are sullen, angry, beaten. "You had to pay a white guy [in order to vote], and if you tried you were threatened," says a 29-year-old Jackson, Miss., painter. "They say I didn't pass the part about the Constitution," adds a Jackson maid. "It's no use; they don't want you to vote here," a 45-year-old Woodville, Miss., construction worker states bluntly. A Woodville tractor driver says: "I know I can't vote if I wanted to." But strangely, this anger is not directed against the people (Democrats) who prevent them from registering or voting.

In fact there is every indication that Southern Negroes are massively hopeful about their chances of persuading or forcing Democratic officials to put them on the voters' rolls in the next five years (none think they will be any worse off). Here again, Negroes are ready to integrate into regular (Democratic) political parties—61 per cent versus only 11 per cent who think Negroes should work independently, outside the regular party organizations.

Most significantly, the NEWSWEEK Poll shows that Negroes are ready to move politically, ready to break out of their traditional inaction and to influence elections importantly. Obviously meeting-oriented in connection with the fight for civil rights, one Negro in three has been to a political meeting; even in the South the ratio is one in four. One Negro in three has asked people to register to vote, and one in four has asked people to vote for one candidate over another. This is tempting arithmetic to Kennedy Democrats, for it shows that if the political torch is thrown to the Negroes, the fire will burn fiercely.

The big question for Republicans: are Southern Negroes so susceptible to a major political drive that eventually they can be won back to the GOP?

Trouble: For the short term, however, the GOP is in trouble—at the moment. Negroes equate their self-interest with the Democratic Party's fortunes. "If President Kennedy wins re-election next year, do you think it will help Negro rights, set them back, or not change things much one way or another?" Negroes were asked. More than seventeen out of twenty Southern Negroes (87 per cent) said Mr. Kennedy's re-election would help Negro rights, and among Southerners most likely to vote—the urban group and the middle- and upper-income groups—the proportion rose to 92 per cent and 89 per cent respectively. (Nationally, 82 per cent of the Negro rank and file thought Mr. Kennedy's re-election would help their cause.) A Kennedy defeat would specifically hurt the fight for Negro rights, according to 43 per cent of Southern Negroes, though more than one out of four (29 per cent) thought the civil-rights revolution was already rolling so fast that a Kennedy defeat would make no appreciable difference.

When the Negroes' self-interest is equated with the politics of 1963, their opinion of President Kennedy is even higher. "How would you rate the job John F. Kennedy has done as President?" asked the NEWSWEEK Poll. Eighty-nine per cent characterized it as either "excellent" (62 per cent), or "pretty good" (27 per cent). For those who fear a Kennedy dynasty, the arithmetic is equally discomforting. When the same question was asked about Robert Kennedy, 82 per cent gave the Attorney General either "excellent" (55 per cent) or "pretty good" (27 per cent), and among 100 Negro leaders, Robert Kennedy even outscored his brother, by 88 per cent to 82 per cent.

President Kennedy's popularity among Negroes places him right after the NAACP and Martin Luther King Jr. in the leadership triumvirate. This fact, more than any other today, dominates the story of the Negro in politics.

The Negro Vote: 1960—And 1964

| | Rank and File | Non-South | South | 100 Leaders |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| How would Negroes vote in the next Presidential election? | | | | |
| Kennedy | 89 | 85 | 91 | 67 |
| Rockefeller | 3 | 4 | 3 | 20 |
| Not sure | 8 | 11 | 6 | 13 |
| Kennedy | 91 | 90 | 92 | 88 |
| Goldwater | 2 | 2 | 2 | 3 |
| Not sure | 7 | 8 | 6 | 9 |
| Kennedy | 89 | 87 | 90 | 81 |
| Romney | 3 | 4 | 2 | 5 |
| Not sure | 8 | 9 | 8 | 14 |
| How did they vote in 1960? | | | | |
| Kennedy | 85 | 86 | 84 | 72 |
| Nixon | 11 | 10 | 12 | 28 |
| Can't recall | 4 | 4 | 4 | |
| What is their political affiliation today? | | | | |
| Democrat | 74 | 77 | 71 | 55 |
| Republican | 11 | 6 | 12 | 20 |
| Independent | 9 | 10 | 9 | 23 |

Bob Adelman

. . . the Democrats raises wages'

Newsweek's 100

In selecting 100 Negro leaders to interview, NEWSWEEK followed the advice of Negroes themselves, did not merely pick front-page names. A handful were unreachable or refused to be interviewed. Those who agreed:

Rev. Ralph Abernathy, Atlanta minister
T.M. Alexander, Atlanta businessman
Horace C. Anderson, Palo Alto engineer
Bernard T. Bailey, Detroit editor
James Baldwin, New York author
Claude A. Barnett, Chicago journalist
Mrs. Ruth M. Batson, Boston social worker
George Beavers, Los Angeles businessman
Edwin C. Berry, Chicago, Urban League
Rev. James L. Bevel, Cleveland, Miss., SCLC
M. Leo Bohanon, St. Louis social worker
Horace J. Bond, Atlanta, SNCC
Thomas Bradley, Los Angeles attorney
Dolores Branche, Chicago social worker
Wiley A. Branton, Atlanta attorney
Edward W. Brooke, Mass. Attorney General
Dr. H.H. Brookins, Los Angeles minister
Gwendolyn Brooks, Chicago poetess
Basil W. Brown, Michigan state senator
Willie L. Brown Jr., San Francisco attorney
Ernest Calloway, St. Louis union official
Kenneth E. Campbell, Chicago alderman
David Carlisle, Los Angeles businessman
A.M. Carter, Augusta, Ga., businessman
Yolande H. Chambers, Detroit businessman
Dr. Kenneth Clark, New York psychologist
William L. Clay, St. Louis alderman
Albert B. Cleage Jr., Detroit minister
Warren R. Cochrane, Atlanta YMCA
Frank Collier, Oakland journalist
William B. Collier Jr., Chicago businessman
Dr. Daniel A. Collins, San Francisco dentist
Mrs. Oliver Crawford, Chicago housewife
Sammy Davis Jr., Los Angeles entertainer
Holmes (Daddy-O) Daylie, Chicago disk jockey
Lloyd Dickens, New York assemblyman
Edward Dudley, Manhattan Borough President
John D. Duncan, Washington commissioner
Rev. Joseph H. Evans, Chicago minister
Joseph A. Faison, Philadelphia businessman
James L. Farmer, New York, CORE director
Rev. Walter Fauntroy, Washington minister
Arthur Q. Funn, New York attorney
Dick Gregory, Chicago entertainer
Mrs. Grace T. Hamilton, Atlanta housewife
Gladys Harrington, New York social worker
George S. Harris, Chicago businessman
Aaron Henry, Clarksdale, Miss., pharmacist
Rev. R.A. Hildebrand, New York minister
Donald Hollowell, Atlanta attorney
Mrs. Ruby Hurley, Atlanta NAACP
Rev. E.F. Jackson, Washington, D.C., minister
Rev. E.W. Jarrett, Gadsden, Ala., minister
Bernard Jefferson, Los Angeles judge
Mrs. Emily Johnson, L.A. businesswoman
John H. Johnson, Chicago publisher
Dr. Jack Kimburough, San Diego dentist
Jewel Lafontant, Chicago attorney
Westley W. Law, Savannah, Ga., mailman
Dr. T.K. Lawless, Chicago dermatologist
Louis Lomax, New York author
Dr. Benjamin E. Mays, Atlanta educator
Harold L. Miles, Chicago police captain
Billie Mills, Los Angeles councilman
Della Mitchell, High Point, N.C., beautician
Natalie Monagas, Philadelphia musician
Cecil B. Moore, Philadelphia attorney
Fred H. Moore, Charleston, S.C., attorney
Rev. H. Randolph Moore, Los Angeles minister
Allan Morrison, New York journalist
Dr. James Nabrit Jr., Washington educator
Jesse Owens, Chicago businessman
James V. Paschal, Atlanta businessman
Matthew J. Perry, Columbia, S.C., attorney
Cecil F. Poole, San Francisco, U.S. attorney
Lincoln G. Pope Jr., Mass. state representative
Jackie Robinson, New York businessman
George Schuyler, New York journalist
Harvey N. Schmidt, Philadelphia attorney
Cornelius Scott, Atlanta editor
Marshall L. Shepard, Philadelphia councilman
Rev. Robert L.T. Smith, Jackson minister
Mrs. Muriel Snowden, Boston housewife
Vaino Spencer, Los Angeles judge
Rev. A.K. Stanley, Greensboro, N.C., minister
Chester E. Stovall, St. Louis welfare director
Dempsey J. Travis, Chicago banker
Richard M. Walker, Boston businessman
Willis F. Ward, Detroit attorney
Dr. Clinton E. Warner, Atlanta physician
Bennetta Washington, Washington educator
James L. Watson, New York attorney
Rev. S. Leon Whitney, Jackson, Miss., minister
Roy Wilkins, executive secretary NAACP
Howard B. Woods, St. Louis, Mo., editor
Abe Woodson, San Francisco athlete
Malcolm X, New York minister
C.R. Yates, Atlanta businessman
Whitney Young Jr., New York, Urban League
Paul Zuber, New York attorney

The Big Man Is Martin Luther King Jr.

"HURRY up, there go our followers," says Whitney Young, executive director of the National Urban League. His wry warning points to the single overriding fact that confronts every Negro leader today: the leadership is locked into a course of action by the militancy of the rank and file.

Overwhelmingly, the leaders endorse the major Negro goals—economic equality and opportunity, and complete integration. Overwhelmingly, they agree with the rank and file's means to a solution—non-violence, reliance on corrective legislation, and negotiations with the white leadership. Overwhelmingly, they concur that the need for progress is urgent. "My definition of now is yesterday," says Cecil Moore, lawyer and NAACP leader in Philadelphia.

Indeed, the leaders have to be in full agreement with the rank and file on all these matters; for if they weren't, the rank and file would soon find others to lead them. This is what the statistics of the NEWSWEEK Poll say loud and clear.

To get a reading on the attitudes of Negro leaders, and how the leaders are rated by their own people, the poll moved in two directions. For the first part of the answer, from a list of some 500 people nominated by Negroes across the land, 100 were selected as representative Negro leaders (list at left); these were then interviewed, with the same questionnaire used for the rank and file, by NEWSWEEK correspondents in 25 cities. For the other part of the answer, both the rank and file and the leaders were themselves asked to rate individual Negroes and civil-rights organizations as to the effectiveness of their leadership.

The Summit: In the Negro's eyes, one leader and one organization tower above all others in the field. The leader is the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.; the organization is the NAACP.

King gets an 88 per cent favorable rating from the Negro rank and file and a 95 per cent favorable rating from the 100 leaders in NEWSWEEK's sample. There are a handful of dissenters like Atlanta student leader Horace Julian Bond, who complains that King has "sold the concept that one man will come to your town and save you." But a devoted and overwhelming majority agree with Earbie Bledsoe, a St. Louis construction foreman. "He has proved himself to be a leader of the Negro people and gives his life for the cause. There is no greater love than to fight for his brother under any conditions."

The NAACP rates a 91 per cent favorable response from rank and file and leadership alike. Both groups emphasize that this 54-year-old veteran of civil-rights leadership has proved itself over the years. As Mrs. Ruth Batson of Roxbury, Mass., states the case: "When nobody was doing anything, the NAACP was out there fighting, fighting, fighting."

What about the much-publicized Black Muslims and their leaders Elijah Muhammad and Malcolm X? How much appeal is there in the impassioned Muslim plea for separatism?

The verdict: almost none.

As a matter of fact, 41 per cent of rank-and-file Negroes simply don't recognize the Muslims by name, and even many who are familiar with the name are hazy on the Muslim cause. Mrs. Edna Mae Murchinson of Philadelphia says: "I don't know nothing about them. Some people say they eat fish and grow beards."

"Crazy": The Black Muslims are rejected as an organization by better than 8 to 1. "They're crazy," says Mrs. Carrie Allen of Union Springs, Ala. "I don't dig them," says Gloria Burns of Washington, D.C. "They're trying to tear down what we've fought for for years," says Mrs. Esther Simpson of Mount Vernon, N.Y.

When asked specifically about the Muslim's doctrinal goal—a separatist, black-only state—a resounding 22 to 1 majority of Negroes score this as another form of segregation. Influential Chicago disk jockey and entertainer Holmes (Daddy-O) Daylie says: "I don't believe in segregation in any form by any race—if I sit down at the piano I use all the keys to get beautiful music." Only in the caldron of Northern slums do the Muslims find any backing; and even there, only 13 per cent favor them. The rest, in essence, hold with Robert Murray of Jackson, Miss., who says: "If they ain't got nothin' to give me I don't want no part of it."

After Martin Luther King and the NAACP, the popularity ratings of other Negro individuals and organizations take a dip, especially among the rank and file. The 51-year-old Urban League, for example, is rated favorably by 54 per cent of the rank and file and by 77 per cent of the leaders. The Congress of Racial Equality (CORE)—which was born in New York in 1942 and rose to prominence with the Freedom Rides of 1961—gets 59 per cent of the rank-and-file vote and 78 per cent of the leaders'. The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC or "Snick")—which was born in 1960 out of the Greensboro, N.C., sit-in campaign—is rated favorably by only 18 per cent of the rank and file, and 74 per cent of the leaders.

These lower ratings do not reflect opposition, however. What they signify is simply that one-third to three-quarters of the Negro rank and file are unsure of what these organizations are and what they have done. Even Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference goes unrecognized by a third of Negroes polled. Clearly the roots of the Negro revolution lie not so much in the strength of its leadership as in the consciousness of the rank and file.

Some findings on other individual Negro leaders:

▶Harlem Rep. Adam Clayton Powell got plus marks from 51 per cent of the rank and file, 52 per cent of the leaders. But some down-rate him. New York piano mover Raymond Telefair says: "When things get thick he thins out."

▶U.S. Circuit Judge Thurgood Marshall wins 64 per cent approval among the rank and file and a sky-high 94 per cent among the leaders. Basil Wilmington Brown of Highland Park, Mich., assessed him this way: "He was great because of the many, many years of legal work culminating in the segregation decision in the Supreme Court."

▶Best-selling writer James Baldwin, high priest of the Negro's anguish, gets a favorable reading from only 40 per cent of the rank and file but goes up to 67 per cent among the leaders.

▶Among Negro entertainers, it is the militant ones who get the highest marks. A relative newcomer like Chicago comedian Dick Gregory, who was conspicuously jailed during the Birmingham riots, scores higher (62 per cent favorable) than such an internationally known name as Harry Belafonte (58 per cent).

In short, it is a dictate of this social revolution that the leaders must prove themselves on the civil-rights battlefields —and the poll statistics make it clear that the leaders have won their spurs the hard way. Compared with 4 per cent of the rank and file, 21 per cent of the leadership or their families have gone to jail sometime during the fight for civil rights. Thirty-nine per cent have joined in sit-ins; 54 per cent have picketed a store; 62 per cent have marched in a demonstration; and 70 per cent have boycotted stores. Mrs. Ruby Hurley, the NAACP's Southeastern regional director in Atlanta says: "There are easier ways to make a living."

All through the leadership interviews ran the common theme of urgency. "Progress shouldn't be made yesterday," said Massachusetts' Attorney General Edward W. Brooke. "You don't stop beating your wife with all deliberate speed, you stop right now," added Philadelphia Councilman-at-Large Marshall L. Shepard. Seven out of ten Negro

Who Are the Leaders—How They Rate

| Ratings by Rank and File | | | Ratings by the Leaders | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Favorable | Poor | | Favorable | Poor |
| 88 | 1 | Martin Luther King Jr. | 95 | 1 |
| 80 | 1 | Jackie Robinson | 82 | 2 |
| 79 | 1 | James Meredith | 81 | 1 |
| 78 | 1 | Medgar Evers | 92 | 1 |
| 68 | 1 | Roy Wilkins | 92 | 0 |
| 64 | * | Thurgood Marshall | 94 | 1 |
| 62 | 2 | Ralph Bunche | 87 | 2 |
| 60 | 1 | Dick Gregory | 80 | 3 |
| 56 | 3 | Harry Belafonte | 73 | 2 |
| 55 | 3 | Lena Horne | 68 | 2 |
| 53 | 3 | Floyd Patterson | 50 | 9 |
| 51 | 7 | Adam Clayton Powell | 52 | 16 |
| 40 | 1 | James Baldwin | 67 | 3 |
| 15 | 29 | Elijah Muhammad | 17 | 65 |

*Less than 1 per cent

leaders (compared with 50 per cent of the rank and file) agree that the pace is now too slow; and 42 per cent of them confess to feeling differently lately about getting personally involved in the revolt. "I used to feel that I as a minister shouldn't get involved. But when I saw these young students willingly and cheerfully going to jail I felt ashamed. Now I feel it's a disgrace not to get involved," says the 64-year-old Shepard.

Shopping Lists: But involved how? The leaders offer an extensive battery of specific proposals for winning the fight. "A Negro should be employed in the registrar's office and the polls kept open every day," says the Rev. E.W. Jarrett of Gadsden, Ala. "Complete unification of all civil-rights groups" is the need, according to New York lawyer Paul Zuber. "Better roles for Negroes in TV and movies," suggests Dick Gregory. "Open occupancy laws," urges New York businessman Jackie Robinson. "Congressional legislation requiring an educational-desegregation plan," is one thing the NAACP's Roy Wilkins wants. And the National Urban League's Whitney Young calls for nothing less than "a massive domestic Marshall plan giving special preferential aid to Negro citizens, the same conscious effort to include that the society historically has exhibited in exclusion."

But specific proposals will be listened to by Negroes only insofar as they fall within the clearly held consensus that civil-rights progress must be made. The magnitude of this hope and determination means that the leadership could not compromise any of the goals, even if it wanted to.

The leaders know victory will not be easy. Better off materially, they are nevertheless more aroused than the rank and file over unfair rents, and all the other hallmarks of discrimination. They invest significantly less blind faith in the omnipotence of the President or even the demonstrations to cure all these evils. Three out of four of them are sharply conscious that the demonstrations could give rise to the violence they deplore. And almost directly opposite from the rank and file, they are overwhelmingly convinced that if it came to outright race war the whites would win. But paradoxically, the leadership answers even more hopefully about the outcome of the struggle. By a 23-to-1 margin the leadership believes that a white attitude which has already gotten better will improve even more dramatically in the next few years. "I must believe it or blow my head off," says Dr. Daniel A. Collins, a California Urban League board member. And Philadelphia pianist Natalie Hinderas says: "You can suddenly see the silver lining."

What the Negroes Think of Whites

WHAT does the Negro think of the white world around him? How does he feel about the white man? Forty questions were aimed at finding out. Chief conclusion: the Negro considers the white man his greatest burden, but the burden grows lighter every day.

At the lower end of the economic scale, he tends to be distrustful of the white man and his motives. Only one in four rank-and-file Negroes thinks the white man sincerely wants to see him get a better break. Forty-one per cent think the white man wants to keep the Negro in his place, and 17 per cent say the whites simply don't care.

On the upper levels, and among the Negro leadership group, the degree of trust rises sharply, though it is by no means an overwhelming vote of confidence. Middle- and upper-income Negroes of the North give the whites a 33 per cent favorable vote, while their counterparts in the South make it 45 per cent. The leadership group votes "favorable" by a bare majority.

Fear Pattern: In expressing their feelings about the white man, a good many Negroes think that he has been pushed into patterns of discrimination by fear—fear of losing his job to a Negro, fear of intermarriage, even fear of losing a servile class to wait on him.

Morris Narcisse Jr. of New Orleans said: "The poor white man especially thinks a Negro might get his job." John Fontenot of Los Angeles observed: "They think they going to get too many two-toned babies." "They're afraid they'll lose their maids," said Richard Harris, a Louisville, Ky., trackman.

Others think the white just naturally wants to feel superior. "Without the Negro, the white man has no one to look down on," said Mae Powell of Washington, D.C. "He certainly can't look down on the Jew. The Jew made an ass of him." "White men have gotten so they think they own the whole world," said Mable Ratcliff, a Brooklyn laundress. "They're not going to settle for smiles and talk, no!"

Negro Optimism: In spite of all this, however, the Negro is clearly optimistic about the future he wants to share with the whites. Fifty-two per cent think the white man's attitude toward the Negro has improved over the last five years and 73 per cent feel his attitude will continue to become more accommodating in the next five.

"The American white man has a conscience and the non-violent method appeals to that conscience. Nobody tolerates kicking a man when he's down. Like Medgar Evers, no one condones shooting a man in the back," was a typical response.

All in all, the Negro puts more trust in the white man's government and institutions than he does in the individual.

Of all whites, Roman Catholic priests, who conduct extensive and little publicized settlement work in Negro communities, are most trusted (by 55 per cent of Negroes). Contrary to supposition, Negroes think well of Jews. But the Negro himself is not free from bias. Puerto Ricans are considered harmful (by 20 per cent, with 70 per cent saying they are not sure).

The Negro is divided on white churches in general. Fifty-four per cent say they don't know whether churches

Bob Adelman

Ted Williams

'We are now not afraid . . . we have woke up'

have been helpful or not and the rest are split down the middle (23 per cent to 23 per cent). Labor unions get mixed reviews with only 38 per cent thinking they are helpful.

Negroes judge the shifting patterns of the white man's attitude in the smallest of details. Mrs. James Lowe of Washington, D.C., remembers the time when "the white man would not use a capital 'N' in Negro."

Thelma Brown of Houston, Texas, sees progress in a tin cup.

"My husband says they have one cup for kegs of water at work now—nobody thinks anything about it."

For Dorothy Hampton, a 28-year-old welfare case, there hasn't been any change at all.

"What they really feels on the inside never changes. Eventually they will wind up calling you a nigger."

Underneath the trust and hope for the future felt by the Negro leadership is a dark warning. In the low-income areas and urban slums, resentment toward the white man is deep, bitter, and potentially explosive. Six per cent of low-income Negroes outside the South feel the white man really wants to see Negroes improve themselves. The large majority of this Northern slum group (81 per cent) think the whites want to keep the Negro down or simply don't care one way or the other.

10-to-1 Odds: If protests and jailings do bring open conflict, the typical Negro is not only willing to fight, but he even thinks that he can buck the white man's numerical odds (10 to 1) and win.* Some are confident because "God is on our side," but most say they would win simply because Negroes are better street fighters. "I think the average Negro can handle about ten whites," said John Jones, a Bladenboro, N.C., carpenter. "Ten Negroes, if they are real men, can chase 50 white men in the lake—if they just stand up for their rights," said a Chicago housewife who lives on a pension. And a St. Louis woman handicapped the 10-to-1 bet this way: "You give a Negro a good, sharp knife and he can get you ten whites any day."

"Besides," echoed Leola Williams of West Palm Beach, Fla., "there are also nine scary whites to every Negro."

So far, the threat remains only a threat. While prepared to use violence, most Negroes (63 per cent) think the white man will come around eventually through persuasion. But an alarming number (22 per cent) today feel he will yield only to force.

"The white man is all mix up," said a 70-year-old Chicago woman living on a pension. "He'd like to do better, but he's all mix up."

*Four per cent of Negroes interviewed claimed census figures were wrong and 2 per cent said there are actually more Negroes than whites anyway.

Daniel Purefoy—Carolina Times

Boycotts: Weapon of the Future?

| | Total | Non-South | South | 100 Leaders |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Have you stopped buying in certain stores in town because they won't hire Negroes? | | | | |
| YES | 29 | 24 | 30 | 55 |
| NO | 71 | 76 | 70 | 45 |
| Have you stopped buying certain companies' products because you have heard they discriminate against Negroes? | | | | |
| YES | 19 | 14 | 18 | 52 |
| NO | 81 | 86 | 82 | 48 |
| If asked, would you do the following? (Percentage affirmative) | | | | |
| Picket a store? | 47 | 54 | 40 | 57 |
| Stop buying at a store? | 63 | 66 | 59 | 66 |

Dislikes: Targets of the Present

| | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| What two or three white leaders and organizations do you dislike the most and trust the least? | | | | |
| Ku Klux Klan | 31 | 32 | 28 | 42 |
| (White) Citizens Council | 26 | 20 | 27 | 52 |
| Ross Barnett | 8 | 8 | 8 | 11 |
| George C. Wallace | 8 | 10 | 6 | 10 |
| Barry Goldwater | 3 | 5 | 1 | 8 |
| Orval Faubus | 2 | 2 | 1 | 5 |
| American Nazi Party | 2 | 2 | 1 | 10 |
| John Birch Society | 3 | 3 | 1 | 15 |

The Future: Not How Much—But When

As certain as the rhythm of the seasons, the Negro revolution will outlive the summer of its birth. It will not end when the leaves redden, when the cotton is baled, when night comes charitably early to hide the slums of Harlem and the South Side and Buttermilk Bottom from themselves. It will go on.

It will go on, says a New Orleans insurance executive, "for the same reason the original thirteen colonies took up arms against George III. For, like the colonies, we have beseeched. We have implored. We have supplicated. We have entreated . . . In short, we are writing our Declaration of Independence in shoe leather instead of ink."

Given his choice, the Negro would prefer ink—on bargaining agreements with whites, on court pleadings, on the ballot—and he will use it wherever he can. But the white man won't always bargain, and Negroes are losing their patience with gradualism. ("The moderates don't mind if Negroes get a better break," says Mrs. Laura Turpin of Washington, D.C., "but 25 or 30 years would be all right with them.") The courts are slow. And the power of the ballot is restricted for the Negro, nationally at least, by his own monolithic attachment to John F. Kennedy and his party. Negro leaders—unable to bargain with the GOP—can only try to roll out a massive Kennedy vote and hope for leverage by sheer weight of numbers.

So the Negro will go on fighting for his rights with his shoe leather—and with his wallet. There is an immense reservoir of support for a boycott campaign, with 62 per cent of all Negroes waiting—so they say—only to be asked. There are manpower pools almost as big for sit-ins, mass marches, picket lines, and, if need be, going to jail—a reserve that means no city with a substantial Negro enclave is immune.

Walk Tall: The Negro feels his faith in mass protest has already moved mountains. If nothing more, it is enough to make a man walk taller. "Anything I want," says Dane Vick, a blind pensioner in Oklahoma City, "the white people are respectful. Now the whites say 'yes sir' to me." Even more, the Negro is convinced that demonstrations work. "The leaders sitting down together would, of course, be the best way," says Mrs. W.F. Jeltz, minorities representative for an Oklahoma City employment service. "But we found it didn't work and sit-ins did."

Violence will remain a constant risk of the revolution. Underlying the confident and hopeful consensus in the Newsweek Poll is a minority marked by portents of alienation, hostility, and danger. One Negro in five thinks the cause cannot be won without violence, and some are already fighting mad. Mrs. Clyde Durham, a St. Louis housewife, says: "Them white folks get scared when a Negro gets mad, and we gonna have to get good and mad and let them know we mean business."

Danger Signs: The flash-point is likeliest in the Northern slums, where one Negro in four thinks violence is inevitable, where one in eight approves of the Black Muslims, where one in two thinks the white man wants to keep him down. ("Maybe up here they just show us one side of their face," says a Detroit truck driver, "but we understand what they mean.") More often than Negroes elsewhere, the Northern slum-dweller sees a desperate streak in the demonstrations; the Negro is simply "tired of being pushed around." More often than Negroes elsewhere, he is likely to push back.

But in the mainstream, the church-oriented, middle-class Negro leadership and an overwhelming majority of the rank and file, North and South, are committed to moderate means, to persuasion where possible, to non-violent protest where necessary. For all this sense of restraint, they will not settle for less than across-the-board victory. Even if the President's civil-rights legislation passes Congress intact, the revolt will not be over. To the Negro majority, it is simply not enough. When a Negro demands freedom, he means freedom from all the disabilities that go with a dark skin.

For the future, the crisis point will come if and when the irresistible force of Negro protest meets the immovable object of white intractability. In polls for The Washington Post, Louis Harris found majorities of white Americans in favor—at least in principle—of taking Federal action to secure the Negro's rights. But the white man's commitment thins in practice. Three in five don't think the Negro is ready to hold a better job or live in a better neighborhood, and nearly three in four feel Negroes are moving faster than whites will accept them. The white man's resistance is particularly strong at the prospect of a Negro moving into the house next door to his; just as deeply, the Negro wants the right to move there if he chooses. The combination makes housing potentially the most explosive of all the issues at stake in the Negro revolution.

The Final Door: The final question will be not so much what the Negro will settle for—he is united and insistent—as how much the white man will give him. Negroes think that he will change, that he will start treating them better because of his conscience, because he fears their militancy, or simply because he is an American. But whether or not the white man is willing to open the final door, the Negro will not stop knocking.

"I want to be a whole man this very instant," says Dr. Daniel A. Collins, a Mill Valley, Calif., dentist. And Susie Huzzard, a Cleveland domestic, has her own definition of freedom: "I want some of these flowers before I die."

Edward Lettau—ABC

EDITORIAL LIFE, 8/23/63 R+R Rel.

LWD ✓
VJ ✓
PA ✓ WB ✓
ML ✓
BP ✓

The Longer March to Real Equal Rights

The March on Washington is coming next week (pp. 63–70). Negro leaders count this as the major protest of the current Negro revolution. If it is brought off peaceably as planned, it ought to go down in history. But in any event, the Great March undoubtedly will make most white Americans feel distinctly uneasy. And that, of course, is its purpose—just as all the hundreds of local demonstrations in the past few months have served to wake the nation to the Negroes' grievances.

Has the nation perhaps been sufficiently awakened already? The President has spoken out eloquently about the moral crisis. There is hope that some kind of civil rights bill will be hauled through the Congress in spite of diehard indignation. There is heartening progress toward desegregation in dozens of places in the Southland. The white reaction to the Negro revolt so far has been almost entirely peaceful and broadly sympathetic.

And yet, while the Negroes intensify their fight for equal opportunity, the growing unease of whites—an apprehensiveness that will surely increase in the next few weeks—threatens to retard further progress. It boils down to a feeling that the Negro is "going too far." In a recent Gallup poll six out of 10 whites felt that Negroes are hurting their own cause with undue militancy.

Most Negroes don't think so. They know that protest is a legitimate function of a living democracy. They suspect that "going too far" can also be translated as being "uppity," the white Southerner's term of contempt for a Negro who has the temerity to act like a white man. Thus the complaint cuts no ice with the Negro. He has only to apply for a job in the North or for a motel room in the South to find evidence that he has not gone far enough.

It is a characteristic paradox of American history that the Negro in 100 years has gone far enough—to learn that he is entitled to go farther. The law, if not justice, has generally been on his side. Set free to rise by the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments, Negroes, with white help, established the N.A.A.C.P. in 1910, attacked discrimination through the courts, and crowned their achievements with the 1954 Supreme Court school desegregation decision. Meanwhile, the National Urban League, working without public fuss, encouraged Negroes to qualify themselves for good jobs and persuaded businesses to take on Negro employes.

The Negro's tenacity has harvested some remarkable profits. A century ago only one Negro in 10 was literate; today, nine out of 10 are literate. A century ago Negro children in the 17 southern states and the District of Columbia were lucky if they got the most pitiable kind of segregated schooling; today more than 200,000 Negro children in those states attend biracial schools. In the 1950s alone Negro enrollment in colleges and professional schools increased 86% (vs. 48% for whites). In 1939 a Negro man earned a mean annual income of $460; 22 years later he earned $3,075, a rise of 568.5% (while the white man's income rose 362%, from $1,112 to $5,137).

Much recent progress, especially in the crucial job-opportunity sector, is the result of the new pressures of the Negro revolt. Why then do so many normally sympathetic whites, who approve of the progress, suddenly question whether the Negroes are pushing too hard? This question centers in the North, where discrimination has not been a matter of white policy or even intention. Instead it has been a fact, and a very complicated fact with which northern whites are just coming to grips. Job discrimination exists in the North, mostly because certain unions have barred Negroes. Housing discrimination, despite state prohibitions, still keeps Negroes bottled up in ghettoes, which in turn have produced de facto school segregation.

Sparked by the successful Negro demonstrations against the more obvious wrongs in the South, Negro leaders in the North have been combatting de facto discrimination with tactics that their white sympathizers are now questioning. Sit-ins and picket lines at the mayor's and governor's offices, at construction sites and beaches, have occasionally been provocative blockades rather than orderly protests. More important, some Negro leaders have adopted a slide-rule approach that advances Negro rights at the expense of others. By demanding preferential treatment (something akin to "war reparations") and quota-hiring (say, 25% of a company's employes "must" be Negro), the demonstrators offend even the most softhearted liberals. Similarly, the demand for transporting Negro and white children out of their neighborhoods to districts all over the city, so as to achieve a balanced mixture of the races in all schools, has the smack of reverse discrimination that can be called Crow-Jimism. These slide-rule methods of artificial race mixing could be as evil as segregation in the long run.

There is a sounder approach. First, job training. Already the building trades unions are beginning to open apprenticeships to willing Negro beginners; already some companies are going out of their way to hire Negroes, even at the risk of losing efficiency for a time. Second, housing opportunities must be opened for Negroes. As their earning power increases, so will their family mobility and their chance to educate their children in better neighborhood schools with a more natural mix of white and Negro children.

If there is a legitimate complaint about Negroes pushing their fight too far, then, it concerns only their methods, not their goals. The March on Washington, after all, is aimed at dramatizing a sorrowful human condition. Take away the myopic slide-rule generals and the relatively few brickbat artists and you will find an army of Americans—19 million of them—who for too long have languished in a corner of our society like branded aliens, forbidden to associate with decent people.

In his bitter remonstrance against the power structure of his day, an unhappy Shylock had something pertinent to say about human relationships. He spoke as a Jew, but his words could be translated for today's American Negro: did he not have eyes, hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? Was he not fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer? "If you prick us," he cried, "do we not bleed? If you tickle us, do we not laugh? If you poison us, do we not die? And if you wrong us, shall we not revenge?"

Revenge is surely not the issue. The goal most Negroes want—genuine equality of opportunity—will be achieved because the white conscience also wants it, and because that goal is permanently set by the system of law, freedom and democracy to which Americans of all races are committed. The Negroes who are "going too far" because they have been pushed too far will regain their lost support as they modify their tactics with some plain common sense. As for the millions of other Negroes—like Shylock, they are flesh-and-blood men, speaking to men of flesh and blood. Decency, honor, Christianity—indeed survival—require that we listen.

R&R Rel.
Current
Aug. 1963

RACISM IN THE U. S.

HOW ONE NEGRO MEETS IT

In response to an invitation to speak at the annual convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Mr. Meredith delivered an address which evoked a sharp rebuke from many listeners. Later, in tears, he said that the reaction to his speech had upset him far more than any of his ordeals at the University of Mississippi. Following are excerpts from the text of his speech as distributed by the N.A.A.C.P.

James H. Meredith

"My purpose here tonight is to provoke.

"I want to provoke you into eliminating the greatest dissatisfaction that I have with the whole movement to eliminate the racial problem in this country. My greatest dissatisfaction today is the existence of the very low quality of leadership present among our young Negroes and the childish nature of their activities. Students all around the world are waking up. Now is your turn. . . .

"In twenty years Mississippi is going to be the Negro showplace of the world and the United States of America is going to be truly the land of the free and the home of the brave. However, this is not going to be so merely because I say that it will be so. It will be so because and only because you accept the challenge before you. Not only is it a challenge to you members of the college chapters from forty-eight states and to you youth branch members from forty-nine of our states represented here tonight, equally it is an opportunity for you to serve the cause of the advancement of mankind. Yes, and above all else, it is an obligation that you must fulfill and a responsibility that you must meet.

"Regretfully, I must admit that I am most sadly struck by the low quality and ineffectiveness of our Negro youth leaders. It must be acknowledged, however, that this is due largely to the interference in and intrusion on youth activities by 'so-called' adult youth leaders, who seek to conduct and direct student activities instead of playing their proper role of advising and supervising these activities. As a matter of fact, I am firmly convinced that our youths of today are fully capable of plotting their own destinies and I intend to do my best to see that their unwitting adult progress blockers are pushed aside so that they can move forward.

"The two great shortcomings of our youth are discipline and knowledge. There is that thing about knowledge that makes for discipline, and that thing about discipline that makes for effectiveness. I can't help but mention the Tokyo demonstrations. Three years ago the President of the United States planned a trip to Japan. The student government associations of Japan wanted to prevent the President from coming and thereby weaken the ruling Japanese government, causing it to be replaced. They called out a million student demonstrators. I was downtown Tokyo on that day and saw with my own eyes the largest demonstration the world had ever seen. Didn't anyone tell me about this. I saw it myself. As far as the eye could see, I saw complete order and discipline. Every student had a leader. Every leader knew who his followers were and every follower knew who his leader was. There was something magic about this order and discipline. The bystanders and onlookers did not pile in and make a mob. No, they were captivated by a frame of mind the likes of which I had never seen before, nor have I seen after. The students were successful. . . .

"Now, let us turn to one of the biggest fallacies hindering the progress of the Negro. That is the idea that age necessarily brings with it knowledge and wisdom. Many instances I can think of where the parents work their skin to the bone trying to send Billy and Sue through school to learn the latest methods of efficient living and Billy and Sue finish school and let Mama and Papa continue to live the rest of their lives without the benefit of the new methods of hygiene or the techniques of economizing, simply because they are older than 'we' and we can't tell them anything.

"Further, there is not much to this business about maturing judgment either. We are familiar with the story of George Washington leading the colonial forces against the French and Indians during 'The French and Indian War' at a very early age. At 25, Alexander the Great had conquered the world; at the same age Booker T. Washington had founded Tuskegee Institute; at 30, Napoleon was master of all of Europe, a feat never matched by any other man; at the same age the President's brother is a Senator in the United States Senate. Think about it.

"You know, the Negro youth has that 'yeah maybe, but not me' attitude. Bull! Anyone one of you burr heads out there could be the owner or manager of a large department store, president of a corporation, or even mayor of the city of Chicago. Only believe, all things are possible, if you only believe.

"Let us not kid ourselves, we not only have to believe, we've got to know something too. For the first time since I've been at the University of Mississippi, I am going to voluntarily speak on the subject of money. You all have heard about my wife's new Thunderbird haven't you. Well, I did a little checking around and I found that millions of new cars are sold every year in this country, and I've looked high and low and you know something, I have not found a single soul that I felt deserves one of these new cars more than my wife, who has stuck with me unceasingly throughout my entire ordeal.

"Maybe I should emphasize the importance of what I am about to say for the next few minutes. It may sound like I'm bragging or it may just sound so simple until you will take it lightly. Negroes have a tendency to look for everything that is significant to be very complicated. The most efficient and effective way of doing things is usually, if not always, the simplest. I can readily say that I have never done anything in my life that was hard for me to do, and I can definitely assure you that I do not intend to start now.

"I learned my management techniques from the best teacher of them all, my father. He was the first of my family to ever own a piece of land. He is a man that never earned enough money in a year's time to require the filing of an income tax. Yet, he is the same man to whom all members of the community turned when in need, always to be helped.

"Back in 1958, long before many of you ever heard of the University of Mississippi, my rating officer in the United States Air Force wrote in his evaluation report on me that 'Sergeant Meredith is the most financially responsible individual I have ever known.' That same year, at the age of 25, I completed my seventh year of military service. My pay was then $180 per month, the highest that I had ever received, yet, up to that time I had bought and paid for two cars and one truck, two farms and the house in which I was living. Literally, I could account for at least nine out of every ten dollars that I had ever made.

"You think I am bragging. Well, I ain't. I am teaching and in ten years I want every Negro in America to be bragging because he has a home, clothes, a car, and money in the bank. And if you think that I have been talking simple, just wait until you hear the system used to economize.

"Let us start with the little money first. Hair oil: a small bottle cost 50¢, large bottle with ten times the amount $2.50; savings $2.50. Cigarettes: I don't smoke so I save the whole amount, but let's get to you. One pack –35¢, one carton $2.75; savings 75¢. Count this up for a year's time and you have a pretty good piece of money. Clothing: the last suit I bought was a nice summer suit. $23.50 from one of them cheap stores that my broke high class Negro friends would not be caught in. Damn fools. This same suit, including the color, was purchased by one of my friends from the exclusive men's shop with the credit charge plate on sale for $49.95. The two suits were cut from the same cloth, sewed on the same machine, distributed by the same wholesale agency. There is no item on which I could not make a similar comparison.

"The area in which the real big savings opportunities exists and in which the greatest inefficiency is found among the Negro is in buying automobiles and furniture. I can say without any doubts in my mind that for each $1000 spent by the average Negro buyer, I could save a minimum of $300. How do you do it? First, since very few Negroes can pay cash for items in this category, you have to establish a good credit rating. This is a must, especially for the man, and should be done definitely at least by age 21. The first time you get a job, open a bank account. If you cannot save more than one dollar a week, put that dollar in every week. What you are really trying to do is impress the banker. Because one day you are going to want to make a loan, the bank is the best possible source of loans for a poor man and when you apply for a loan the first thing the banker is going to do is check your savings record to see how regular you are.

"Next, to build a good credit rating, buy something on credit. Even if you have the cash to pay immediately. For example, your parents give you fifty dollars to buy a suit. Buy the suit on a ninety-day option plan. You buy on credit with an agreement that if you pay the balance in ninety-days there will be no interest charge. You pay twenty dollars down, put the remaining thirty dollars in the bank, draw it out ten dollars each month and make your timely payment to your creditor. At the end of a ninety day period you will have a credit rating of 'A,' plus the reputation and prestige of doing business with a bank. You will then have a file with the Credit Bureau and your credit reference can be checked and you can get credit anywhere in the United States. And all this did not cost you one dime. . . .

"Brothers and sisters, this might sound childish and like fancy to you. I hope not. I have never been more serious in my life. The procedures, methods, and the techniques that I have described to you tonight are not dreams or fancy ideas. These have all been tried by me and worked. I think it will work for you. Life is simple, not complicated.

"Now, we move to the big question of the day. How to best accomplish our objective—full citizenship. I feel it my duty to my country and my responsibility to my people to express my reasoned position on this vital subject. I intend to criticize no person or no group, instead I simply want to inform you of how I think I can best use my energy to accomplish our goal. I think the greatest result will be realized by using my energy to advance the Negro community in the political and economic areas. My chief weapon will be educational development and training for the great mass of our Negro population.

"What about the great controversial issue of a march on Washington, D. C.? . . . My position is that I support any action on the part of an oppressed group to indicate its dissatisfaction or to secure redress of its grievances.

"Concerning the proposed march on Washington, I will say that it is my conclusion, based on long years of study of the legislative process, that in my opinion the march would not be in the best interest of our cause. I want it clearly understood that I have not opposed the proposed march, instead I have expressed an individual opinion. Further, I think that this issue is primarily a political issue and I think that the advice of the Negro politicians should be sought and their recommendations should be given due consideration. By Negro politicians, I am referring to the five Negro representatives in the United States Congress, the Negro legislators of the various states, and the Negroes in high government positions, plus the leading Negro politicians both in and out of power—Republicans and Democrats.

"No matter how much power the Barnetts and the Wallaces may claim that the Federal Government is usurping and centralizing in the Washington government, the fact still remains that the government of the United States is a federal government and not a unitary government. The members of Congress do not represent Washington. They represent the individual states of the Union and the individual Congressional districts. . . .

"In conclusion, I want to say to you here tonight that I do believe. Above all things, I do believe that this world can be made into a better place in which to live. I do believe that the Negro has a destiny to be the leading spark in saving this world and advancing the cause of human civilization. Further, I am confident that we will develop the racial pride, community pride, and family pride necessary to accomplish our mission. From this year forward and from no other, let us judge our peers. Let us draw a line on our heritage in 1963 and mark it with pride. In my eye sight, the most illegitimate of the illegitimate Negro deserves the right to recognition equal to the bluest of the blue of the black blue bloods.

"Finally, along this line of pride and recognition I will soon personally get to test the depth of the sincerity of our white neighbors. You know, since the very first week I entered the University of Mississippi, I have been being compared to the American astronauts, who ventured into outer space. Recently, I attended an affair in New York City at which one of the speakers was Mayor Wagner. He said in his speech that the only person that he could compare me with was the latest American astronaut and that his card showed a mark for me that was surpassed by none. After my graduation on August 18, 1963, I will anxiously await my invitation from the Mayor of New York City announcing my ticker tape parade date. Or will it be the same old story. 'But, you are a Negro.'

"Further, I look forward with high expectations to my 'open car caravan' from the White House to the Capitol, where I will address a joint session of Congress. Certainly, I must know first hand as much about the nation's number one internal problem as the astronauts knew about outer space." (Address, Annual Convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Chicago, Illinois, July 5, 1963)

R+R Rel

Current
Aug. 1963

MAKING DEMOCRACY WORK

CAN THE PEOPLE SHARE IN RACE DECISIONS?

The New York Times' bureau chief in Washington:

James Reston

"One of the persistent complaints of decent and intelligent Americans in the postwar period has been that they felt helpless to do anything personally about the great problems of their country.

"They worried vaguely about communism, unemployment and all the flash-points of the world from Korea to Berlin, but aside from tolerating high taxes and the military draft, most of them felt unable to participate in the solution of the things that worried them.

"This complaint, however, no longer has much validity, for the race crisis in the nation now provides a tangible opportunity to get engaged personally in the central domestic issue of the age.

"Inequality in American life is not a remote problem like Vietnam, or a mysterious problem like the controversies over missiles and outer space, or a theoretical problem like economic growth or deficit spending. It is a problem of right and wrong. It is present in almost every community in the nation. And everybody can do something about it.

"In fact, it is widely accepted in Washington that unless private citizens raise the moral question in their communities, churches, business associations, labor unions, school meetings, service organizations, newspapers, etc., government alone cannot pass effective civil legislation and may not even be able to assure public safety.

"This is why the President has not only been drafting legislation recently and conferring with political leaders of both parties, but also meeting with groups of businessmen, labor union leaders, editors, preachers and lawyers.

"What has been happening here in these meetings at the White House can easily be repeated in every city, town and village in the nation, if even a remnant of the fair-minded people will insist on raising the issues in all their organizations.

"Peaceful Negro demonstrations against the humiliation of segregation can influence many Congressmen, but the balance of power in the Senate of the United States rests with Senators from states where there are few Negroes and no Negro demonstrations.

"Senator Bourke Hickenlooper, Republican of Iowa, for example, is a key figure on whether the Senate can break a filibuster and open up privately-owned stores, restaurants, movies, lunch counters and lodgings to all citizens. But he is much more likely to respond to appeals for equality among the white majority in the lonely towns all over his state than he is to small Negro demonstrations in Des Moines.

"Two mistakes are being made in the present crisis: It is being left too much to the politicians and the Negroes; and it is being viewed too narrowly as a political battle to pass civil rights legislation.

"The burden of removing the hypocrisy of inequality is even more the responsibility of the whites, who have perpetuated discrimination, than of the Negro; and civil rights legislation is not an end in itself but merely the means to the end, which is a free and equal society.

"The tragedy of Negro emancipation 100 years ago was that the abolitionists thought of it as an end in itself and were not prepared for the social and economic problems that followed political victory.

"The same is true of the current race crisis. We may be much nearer to a political victory than many people supposed, but the problems of providing not only civil rights for the Negro but the education, the jobs, the housing and the social order to sustain equality of opportunity will still exist.

"A Negro may have the right of access to all schools, restaurants, houses or lodgings, but if he doesn't have the education, he is not likely to have the skill to get a job; and if he hasn't got a job, he is not likely to have the money to buy the things or patronize the new facilities that open up to him. . . .

"Here again private citizens can help. The task is immense, but anybody who can write a letter or go to a union meeting or even walk in a parade can do something about these inequalities." (The New York Times, June 23, 1963. See Readers Service, Item 1.)

Current
Aug. 1963
R+R Rel.

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY FOR NEGROES

The idea that equality for Negroes is no longer enough is being increasingly heard throughout the civil rights movement. Many feel that there must be a temporary imbalance in favor of Negroes if there is to be true equality of opportunity.

IS EQUALITY IN EDUCATION ENOUGH?

Dr. Fischer, who is president of Teachers College, Columbia University, raises the issues involved in compensatory education for Negroes in Education in Depressed Areas.

John H. Fischer

"The temptation is always strong to say that the Negro child should be seen merely as any other child, respected as an individual, and provided with an educational program that will best meet his particular combination of needs. Of course the Negro child, like any other child, is entitled to be treated as an individual. Such treatment is the only sound basis for projecting his or any other child's education, but the easy generalization does not always come to grips with the whole truth.

"The American Negro youngster happens to be a member of a large and distinctive group that for a very long time has been the object of special political, legal, and social action. This, I remind you, is not a question of what should be true, or might have been, but an undeniable and inescapable fact. To act as though any child is suddenly separable from his history is indefensible. In terms of educational planning, it is also irresponsible.

"Every Negro child is the victim of the history of his race in this country. On the day he enters kindergarten, he carries a burden no white child can ever know. . . . We are dealing here with no ordinary question of intercultural understanding, although admittedly cultural difference is part of the difficulty. Nor are we concerned with only the usual range of psycho-educational problems, for the psychological situation of the Negro child is affected by quite special social considerations.

"I recognize the hazard in speaking of 'the Negro child.' It is equally unsatisfactory to speak of 'the white child' or 'the Puerto Rican child' or 'the Spanish-American child' as though any child could be encompassed in a stereotype. . . . But when all the variability is conceded, it cannot be denied that every American Negro child must expect to encounter certain problems which none of our other children face in quite the same way. . . .

"Many of the Negro children who now come to school are the victims of their parents' lack of knowledge and of schooling. The parents in turn are the victims of a situation over which they have had little or no control themselves. Parents and children alike elicit sympathy and attract charity, but praiseworthy as these responses may be, they form no adequate approach to the education of the disadvantaged urban child. The response of the community and the school must be based also on objective knowledge. . . . Teaching reading, . . to a first-grade child who has never seen an adult read anything requires an approach quite different from one appropriate to a child in whose home books are as normal as food.

"Similarly, a child who has never known sustained conversation with his parents must actually learn the skills of continuing discussion before he can learn much else in school. . . .

"In respect to the development of intellectual competence, many Negro children face special problems. . . . During years of oppression, first under slavery and later under more subtle forms of discrimination, the opportunities for large numbers of Negroes to apply their own rational powers with initiative and freedom to important problems have been far more limited than the opportunities available to other racial groups. Many Negro children, therefore, carry the disabling scars of the culture in which they were nurtured, a culture which encouraged the use of muscles and not only discouraged but often penalized those who sought to use their minds creatively. The school must take all of this into account and build programs and provide opportunities which not only reflect these facts but move aggressively to compensate for them. . . .

"This implication for policy and practice cuts more than one way, however, for just as certainly as no person should be subjected to discriminatory treatment which depresses him because of his race, so it follows that none should be given preferential treatment simply because his complexion or his ancestry is different from another's. A practical application of this principle may arise if a school organizes classes according to the academic ability of students. If . . . it should develop that one classroom contains pupils largely of one racial group while a second classroom is composed mostly of another, the school should not be criticized for the result. If, on the other hand, the school authorities have used an ostensibly educational device simply to justify some predetermined racial arrangement, the action is totally indefensible. . . .

"A second guideline for the development of policy and practice centers about the concept of equality of opportunity. 'Equality of opportunity' . . . means much more than a schoolroom desk for every child. It connotes, rather, a condition in which every American may rightfully expect to find himself in fair competition with every other American. This condition is achieved and maintained by the operation of a host of agencies and forces, some political, some social, others economic or cultural. . . .

"In the cases of some Americans, and in that of the Negro American most dramatically, our traditional system has failed for a long time in countless ways to provide that equality of opportunity that should be the condition of all our people. . . . Especially is this true of children whose parents and grandparents were deliberately, systematically, and by law denied what is now clearly recognized as fully equal treatment.

"Is it not a reasonable contention—and a just one—that to compensate for past injustice, we should offer these children educational services beyond the level of what might be called standard equality?

"Could it be that to achieve total equality of opportunity in America we may have to modify currently accepted ideas about equality of opportunity . . . ? Is it conceivable that some of our children are entitled to more and better educational opportunities than most of the others? In fact, of course, the question has already been answered. Thousands of mentally and physically handicapped children, regardless of race, regularly receive teaching service, physical facilities, and supporting services more extensive and more costly than those furnished children who are considered physically and mentally normal. In the cases of many Negro children—and the generalization would apply also to certain other minority groups—we may need to substitute for our traditional concept of equal educational opportunity a new concept of compensatory opportunity. . . .

"I doubt that anyone is in a position now to say precisely what the concept of compensatory educational opportunity would mean in every case, but my purpose here is not so much to answer the question as to raise it for discussion." ("Educational Problems of Segregation and Desegregation," Education in Depressed Areas)

IS EQUALITY IN EMPLOYMENT ENOUGH?

A weekly newsmagazine:

Newsweek

"With constant urging from press and pulpit, and with pressure from government, it now seems almost ordained that more Negroes will be hired in better jobs. Some companies will integrate for moral reasons; others will act out of self-interest, for Negroes are both customers and employes; still others will move defensively.

"But even those businessmen who have decided to act are still troubled. For lack of experience and for fear of the unknown, they aren't sure exactly how to go about creating equal opportunity. How many Negroes should a company hire? In what capacity? And with just how much fanfare? . . .

"Even if such immediate problems were overcome, it wouldn't be enough to satisfy most Negro leaders. To make up for years of deprivation, poor schooling, and collapsed incentive, they say, colored workers should be given a leg up. Like all new things, the idea is being approached gingerly by management—and some are actually adopting it. It goes by the name of 'compensatory hiring' or 'compensatory discrimination.' When a white and a Negro apply for the same job, says a Chicago personnel director, 'all other things being equal, we'll take the Negro.'

"The idea has been around a while, but it started to spread after a speech in New York by Whitney M. Young Jr., executive director of the National Urban League (see page 14). . . .

"Guichard Parris, one of Young's assistants, expanded: 'It's time to discriminate in the Negro's favor for five or ten years . . . The veterans of World War II got a break—the GI bill and extra points in Civil Service examinations—because they were out of the mainstream of the economy for three or four years.' His point: Negroes have never been in that mainstream." ("Jobs for Negroes: How Much Progress in Sight?" Newsweek, July 15, 1963)

The head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference:

Martin Luther King

"Temporary special provisions for Negroes are urgently needed to bring about a greater racial balance. . . . Discrimination in reverse [is] a good idea." ("Protestant Heritage," National Broadcasting Company, June 30, 1963)

The national director of the Congress of Racial Equality:

James Farmer

"It is no longer acceptable . . . for an employer to say there are no qualified Negro applicants for a job. The employer . . . is now obligated to find a qualified Negro. If he cannot . . . he should train a Negro for the job." (Address, Annual Convention of the Congress of Racial Equality, Dayton, Ohio, June 28, 1963)

A statement issued by Whitney M. Young, the executive director of the National Urban League:

Whitney M. Young

"An intensive special effort may appear to be in conflict with the principle of equal treatment for all. But such effort is required to overcome the damaging effects of generations of deprivation and denial and to make it possible for the majority of American Negroes to reach the point at which they can compete on a basis of equality in the nation's increasingly complex and fast-moving industrial society. . . .

"The intense needs and problems which are evident in so many Negro communities around the country are a direct result of past and present discrimination and exclusion based on race.

"Thus, as a matter of historic equity, compensatory effort is justified and may well be the only means of overcoming the heavy aftermath of past neglect." (Statement, National Urban League, New York City, June 9, 1963)

The Joint Committee consists of members of the New York chapters of the Congress of Racial Equality and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Urban League of Greater New York, the Workers Defense League, the Negro American Labor Council, and the Association of Catholic Trade Unionists.

New York City Joint Committee for Equal Employment Opportunity

"Unions with registered apprenticeship programs should accept, as part of the total number of apprenticeships available annually in each trade, a number of qualified applicants from minority groups proportionate to their number in the population of the city, that proportion doubled in the light of the fact that the non-white unemployment rate is double that of the white workers and because an imbalance of decades must be corrected." (Statement, Joint Committee for Equal Employment Opportunity, New York, July 12, 1963)

The chairman of New York City's Commission on Human Rights:

Stanley H. Lowell

"I say that one has to be conscious of color. . . . Such an approach is necessary to help Negroes win better jobs and effect a true racial balance. We have to recognize the fact that the consciousness of color must be taken into account to remedy the wrongs of 100 years." ("Newsmakers," WCBS-TV [New York City], June 30, 1963)

The former Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, now Senator from Connecticut:

Abraham Ribicoff

"Those who claim that X number of jobs or Y percent of jobs must be set aside for Negroes are not favoring equality of opportunity. They are saying that opportunity doesn't matter, that merit doesn't matter, that only arbitrary numbers and percentages matter. That point of view will undermine the whole effort to achieve equality in this country." (Address, United States Senate, Congressional Record, June 27, 1963)

ARE THERE ENOUGH JOBS TO GO AROUND?

An editor of The New Republic:

Murray Kempton

"[The] Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters is aged and fading; it never had more than 15,000 members and no more than 5,000 of these are working now. . . .

"The porter has always been poor and a menial; segregation created his job; the Pullman Company hired Negroes as porters because Negroes were inexpensive. . . . [But] their union has raised their pay scale to a basic $436 a month which has made a porter's job one fit for white men, so fit in fact that occasionally a white youth comes to the Brotherhood in search of a union card; it cannot be given him, because there are not enough jobs for the old members, let alone new ones. There will be no white porters, and there will be no Negro engineers; the rule for employment on the railroads is not opportunity but seniority."

A. Philip Randolph of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, now vice-president of the AFL-CIO and president of the Negro American Labor Council would "plan a march that would be unlimited in aim, and that would remember above all the needs of the poor and displaced, whatever their color.

" 'The Negro people are just one other depressed area,' he said the other day. 'As long as there is unemployment, it's going to hit us. The Negro is in the position of the white hod carrier and the white longshoreman. I should like all the unemployed to come with us. We complain because the building trades have no room for Negroes, but the real trouble now is that these unions are designed for profit through scarcity. If the crafts were open to us, that could not, in the present economy, create more than 40,000 jobs.' " ("A. Philip Randolph," The New Republic, July 6, 1963)

The head of the New York City office of the Fund for the Republic, writing in the Saturday Review.

Joseph P. Lyford

"There are many voices that talk for the unemployed, disused Negro in the black corners of his Northern cities, but there are very few leaders, white or Negro, who have crossed his threshold to learn about his most immediate discontents and what he wants right now, this afternoon, this very moment. The demands of Northern Negro 'spokesmen' are beginning to have more and more the ring of liberal middle-class sociology, and they seem increasingly remote from those Negroes who are beginning to understand that, even if every racial barrier fell tomorrow, there would be no jobs for most of them, young or old.

"The Northern Negro faces a different set of nightmares from those of his brother in Alabama. The achievement of every remaining civil right, and his final admission to American society, will not solve the fundamental misery that is our special gift to the Negro of the city. The fact is that our republic has little use for the people it has prevented from getting a decent education, through design or neglect; and our automated future offers little prospect of work to the high school graduate as well. The Negro has joined a new and integrated race of Americans, the race of the poor. In some ways, this affiliation is of more concern than the fact that he is black. . . .

"The point at issue now is not whether the Negro of the North will take to the streets in his battle for citizenship. The question is when and how it will happen, whether there will be leadership and preparation and sanity in the plan, or whether there will be nothing at all, not even hope, but only the customary spasms of rage on Harlem and West Side streets. If there is to be a plan, it will have to be built around the real interests of the Negro, who wants work, who wants enforcement of the law against the owner of the slum, and who worries about good teachers rather than racial percentages in the classroom." ("Where Are the Leaders?" Saturday Review, July 6, 1963)

Union News.
A&R Rel. Aug. 1963

Showdown on Racial Justice

ALL OF A SUDDEN, the pressure which has been building up over the years for fair treatment of racial minorities has erupted into a national crisis with which almost everyone is concerned.

Many people — white as well as colored — are demanding immediate action on issues which have been ducked for a hundred years.

Why?

Why now? Why after so many years of gradual change should there be so much demand for instant change in race relations? Had not we best move more slowly?

The answer is "No!"

America must proceed with considerable haste to correct the injustices which it has imposed on dark-skinned people.

GRADUALISM won't work. History seems to demonstrate that it never has worked. Of course, some progress can be made by gradual change, but at some point either peaceful or violent revolution must take place to force a major breakthrough. Justice does not seem to come about automatically, even in a nation such as the U.S.A. with a highly developed and basically fair system of courts. It seems that the unjustly treated have to raise a considerable commotion before judges and juries get around to really dispensing the justice they theoretically always stand for.

To put it another way, the squeaking wheel gets the grease.

The Negro people of America are now demanding — in a thus far peaceful revolution — that they get fair treatment. The American Negro is sick and tired of excuses and delays. He has given up on the old method of being subservient and humble before the whites in the hope of eventual kind and fair treatment.

Union people ought to understand the Negro revolution. Union people had to carry on a form of revolution during the nineteen thirties to make a substantial breakthrough for fair treatment of wage earners. Of course there had been some gradual progress in earlier years in the way of improved working conditions and better labor laws, but it took the mass actions of the thirties to bring major changes.

Tired of injustice, wage earners in the thirties engaged in some rather unorthodox behavior. For one example, Auto Workers staged sit-in strikes in the assembly plants. This was an illegal action, an action verging on the violent, an action which seemed awfully disrespectful of the "right" of private property. But it worked; suddenly management moguls, Congressmen, judges and governors saw their way clear to extend justice to working people!

The somewhat high-handed methods of union people in those days served to oil the wheels of justice.

THE PRESENT revolt of the Negro people is of the same order. They and a few white friends have quietly asked for justice down through the years. They have made some progress. On paper, they have achieved equal rights in most states, but in practice most white people have looked the other way while the dark-skinned have been mistreated.

So finally the Negroes — like the union people of 30 years ago — have gotten a bellyful and have started raising a commotion to force white people to take action toward fair treatment. The Negroes have dramatized the issue so that whites no longer can ignore it.

Now, instead of pecking along at the problem, the responsible white leadership of America is having to attack the problem on a broad and urgent basis.

The primary example of white leadership movement in the direction of fair treatment is President Kennedy's program of legislation on civil rights now being debated in Congressional committees. (See separate article on this page for a listing of the legislation asked.)

Before submitting his program to Congress, President Kennedy addressed the American people with an appeal to conscience, a request for the cooperation of the people in the meeting of what he called "the growing moral crisis in American race relations."

Fair treatment of the people of all races is, of course, a moral issue.

A hundred practical reasons for fair treatment can be listed — better foreign relations, better economic conditions, elimination of slums and crime, etc. — but the real reason people of all colors should be treated alike is simply because it is morally right.

However, morals often have to be backed up by laws. It is immoral to steal — but still we have to have laws against stealing. The President's civil rights proposals simply put legal force behind moral rightness. Time has demonstrated that racial discrimination has not been

What Kennedy Asks

President Kennedy has asked Congress to pass civil rights legislation providing six key things:

- Equal voting rights in federal elections; abolition of phoney literacy tests used in several Southern states to prevent Negroes from voting; establishment of court appointed referees to see that the vote is not unfairly denied.
- Equal access to public accommodations, such as hotels, restaurants, stores, theaters.
- Stepped-up school desegregation, greater federal powers to enforce desegregation which has dragged along with only limited progress in the nine years since it was ordered by the Supreme Court.
- A Community relations service to counsel, negotiate between racial groups and help local communities solve racial problems.
- Right to withhold U.S. funds when it is found that the money is used in a discriminatory way; this would apply to contractors on government orders.
- Establishment of a fair employment practices agency to prevent racial discrimination by employers or by unions in hiring and in job conditions.

Who Speaks for the Negro?

made by gradual change, but at some point either peaceful or violent revolution must take place to force a major breakthrough. Justice does not seem to come about automatically, even in a nation such as the U.S.A. with a highly developed and basically fair system of courts. It seems that the unjustly treated have to raise a considerable commotion before judges and juries get around to really dispensing the justice they theoretically always stand for.

some rather unorthodox behavior. For one example, Auto Workers staged sit-in strikes in the assembly plants. This was an illegal action, an action verging on the violent, an action which seemed awfully disrespectful of the "right" of private property. But it worked; suddenly management moguls, Congressmen, judges and governors saw their way clear to extend justice to working people!

The somewhat high-handed with only limited progress in the nine years since it was ordered by the Supreme Court.

- A Community relations service to counsel, negotiate between racial groups and help local communities solve racial problems.
- Right to withhold U.S. funds when it is found that the money is used in a discriminatory way; this would apply to contractors on government orders.
- Establishment of a fair employment practices agency to prevent racial discrimination by employers or by unions in hiring and in job conditions.

issue.

A hundred practical reasons for fair treatment can be listed — better foreign relations, better economic conditions, elimination of slums and crime, etc. — but the real reason people of all colors should be treated alike is simply because it is morally right.

However, morals often have to be backed up by laws. It is immoral to steal — but still we have to have laws against stealing. The President's civil rights proposals simply put legal force behind moral rightness. Time has demonstrated that racial discrimination has not been wiped out simply because it is morally wrong.

FURTHER demonstrating the fact that squeaking wheels get grease has been a sudden outburst of activity among many non-government organizations in support of fair race relations. Since the Negro demonstrators "squeaked" in Birmingham and elsewhere, there has been a flurry of conferences in churches, labor unions, service clubs, chambers of commerce, trade associations and other organizations regarding the race crisis. Everyone seems to be getting in on the act, looking for ways to improve the lot of the long-mistreated minorities.

As a result of this flurry of activity, it has become in many quarters "stylish" for white Americans to support fair and equitable treatment of racial minorities. This within itself is good — to make the right thing to do seem to be the popular thing to do.

Of course we are a long way from the really fair treatment of minorities. Prejudice is deeply rooted in many people (of whatever color or religion). Many of those who pay lip service to racial fairness look at the same time for methods of circumventing the very resolutions they pass. And many others are not even paying lip service to the principles of fair play — they are bitterly and violently resisting the idea of giving the dark-skinned an even break.

Yet we probably are on the threshold of a great breakthrough. The minorities, particularly the Negroes, have made it rather plain that they will tolerate mistreatment no longer. The whites have been forced to re-examine their consciences. Change must and will come.

Who Speaks for the Negro?

Half a dozen major organizations speak for American Negroes today. None speaks for all and there are arguments about how much support each has, but it is obvious that each has a broad following.

They range from the diplomatic Urban League, which seeks mostly to negotiate better jobs and community conditions for Negroes, to the Black Muslims, who teach hatred of the whites and segregation from the whites.

Here is a rundown of the six:

Urban League — This is a bi-racial organization, made up of whites and Negroes, with chapters in 65 cities. It was founded in 1910 and much of its support comes from wealthy whites (including the Rockefeller fund). Mainly it seeks civil rights progress through bi-racial consultation and cooperation. Particularly, it seeks to persuade employers to hire Negroes. It conducts job-training and social welfare programs.

Some Negroes accuse Urban League of playing an "Uncle Tom" role, of begging rather than demanding justice. Urban League leaders deny this, insist that they are pushing hard for equal rights. Also, Whitney Young Jr., the national director, points out that after all the protesting and picketing by other groups, someone has to sit down and negotiate with the whites, and that this is Urban League's role.

NAACP — These well-known initials stand for National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. It, too, is an old-time organization, founded in 1909. It is the largest civil rights organization, with 400,000 members in 1,200 chapters.

During most of its history, NAACP has been the principal pleader for civil rights in the courts. Drawing on the services of brilliant attorneys, it has carried most of the civil rights cases, including the school desegregation case, through the courts. It also has been a leading force in demanding fair employment practices on the part of management and labor in the employment field.

In recent months, NAACP has participated in some of the protests and demonstrations. It also plays a major role of financing and providing legal representation for some of the more militant demonstrators from other organizations who get arrested. Medgar Evers, the Negro who was assassinated in Jackson, Miss., a few weeks ago, was an NAACP field representative.

Southern Christian Leadership Council — Not too many people recognize that name, but they do recognize the name of the Rev. Martin Luther King, its leader. This is a loosely organized group built around the inspirational leadership of the Rev. Mr. King, who first came to prominence in the Montgomery bus boycott of 1956. A masterful teacher of the non-violent resistance technique, this Baptist minister preaches that violence is morally wrong but that non-violent demonstration is a way to bring attention to the problem of racial injustice. He teaches love of the whites, as a Christian concept. However, he concedes that "love" in this sense is quite different from "liking" or "affection."

King deeply impresses people, white or black, who hear him. His sweet reasonableness, his charitable outlook mixed with firm determination to secure justice for his people, his precise and clear way of stating his thoughts, are most convincing. He insists that Negroes should pray for the whites who mistreat them, because the whites are doing wrong and need divine assistance to see the right.

CORE — Congress of Racial Equality is more than 20 years old but gained little national attention until very recent years. Comprised mostly of nervy young people, both black and white, it is the organization which has been most notable for carrying on sit-ins and for picketing businesses which practice discrimination. Like Martin Luther King's organization, it preaches non-violence; in fact its national director, James Farmer, is a disciple of Mahatma Ghandi.

CORE carefully trains its sit-in participants. They are subjected to gruelling practice sessions in which they are abused and sometimes slapped around by their instructors. This is to prepare them for the abuse they will take when actually engaged in sit-ins They are trained in methods of defending themselves against blows (such as clasping the hands behind the neck, wrapping elbows in front of face) but are instructed not to hit back.

Farmer says that the Urban League serves Negroes as their State Department, the NAACP as their Justice Department and the CORE as the non-violent Marines.

SNCC — The Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee (nickname, "Snick") was formed in 1960 by college students, at a meeting called by the Rev. Mr. King. But King has been unwilling to move fast enough to satisfy the youngsters. Brash and disorganized, Snick sends shock troops into Southern towns to start segregation protests and voter registration drives. The students consider themselves fortunate in their cause when they can get a few bloodied noses, beatings at the hands of cops and a large number of its demonstrators in jail.

Black Muslims — This organization is an extremist group which combines some practical ideas with a mystical religion. Its leader is a man calling himself Elijah Mohammed and its chief spokesman is a rapid-speaking young man who calls himself Malcolm X.

This group asserts that there is no hope of making peace with the whites, that they have proven over and over again that they are not to be trusted. The Black Muslims want to set up a separate black state — presumably they want to apportion out a section of the nation as their separate preserve They assert that the white race is on the way down and out anyway, due to its own immorality and lack of sense of justice.

The Black Muslims tell Negroes to have pride in themselves, to live more morally and cleanly, to improve themselves physically, mentally and spiritually, to build up their own businesses in preparation for their destiny of self-rule.

Incidentally, there is no connection between the Black Muslims and the Muslim religion which has many millions of followers throughout Africa, the Near East and Southeast Asia.

WHY NO INTEGRATION FOR THE AMERICAN INDIAN

Here is one group generally forgotten in all the excitement over racial equality.

In many areas, American Indians are far more segregated than the Negroes are.

Those on reservations, for the most part, are ill-housed on poor land, with little hope of bettering their lot where they are.

Yet those who leave to find jobs in the cities often find the going rough.

Inadequate skills mean low pay. That leads to slum dwelling. To Indians, ways of white employers frequently seem unreasonable.

Result: For every three Indians who move out on their own, one goes back to the reservation.

The rising furor over equal rights for Negroes is turning attention now to the plight of still another U. S. minority—the American Indians.

Nobody is demonstrating in their behalf, or organizing massed marches on Washington to better their lot. Yet Indians by the tens of thousands are living in rural slums, more squalid than the worst so-called Negro ghettos.

Most of the more than half a million American Indians are just about as segregated now as they were 350 years ago when white settlers began pushing them out of their tribal homelands. Most still live with other Indians, on or near reservations or Government-controlled land. For these Indians, there is no integration, and no big drive for it.

At a time when energetic campaigns are under way to open up new jobs to Negroes, and actually give them preference over qualified whites in some instances, the Indians still trail far behind the rest of the nation in job opportunities, in incomes and in a host of other things.

For example, the median family income for reservation Indians last year was just under $1,500. That is less than half the median family income for Negroes, and far below the nearly $6,000 for all U. S. families, including whites.

In many cities and areas, efforts are being made now to force the integration of Negro and white youngsters in public schools. In some localities, Negro and white children are being transported miles from their home neighborhoods to assure that they attend racially balanced schools.

While this is going on, what's happening among school-age Indians? About a third of them still attend Indian schools that are operated by the Federal Government. There are about 270 such Indian schools scattered across the U. S.

The Government has been trying to hasten the integration of Indian children by closing down their separate schools as rapidly as the youngsters can be placed in public schools. For a time, this program moved ahead fairly well. But it has hit a plateau in recent years. As it is now, close to two thirds of the Indian youngsters attend public schools—often assisted by federal subsidies that try to give them economic

One side of Indian life—a side most tourists see—is the colorful ceremony of tribal dances. Indians are proud of the culture of their past and cling to the ways of their ancestors. For many of them the ways of the white man are sometimes bewildering.

—Western Ways Photo

equality with their white classmates. But many of the young Indians find themselves under extreme handicaps.

Some have to travel long distances from their reservation homes to reach the public school. Some are unable to speak English. They encounter other physical and cultural obstacles when they venture into public schooling.

As for adult Indians, the U. S. Government tried for years to integrate them in predominantly white communities through a relocation program to get them off the reservations and into cities. It is clear now that that program has met with only moderate success, and has had many failures.

In some places, Indians still find themselves discriminated against, just the way Negroes complain of discrimination. Because of low incomes, better neighborhoods often are closed to them. They find themselves forced by circumstances to live in the poorest slums. Also, in many cases, Indians have encountered tremendous problems in trying to fit themselves into jobs for white employers.

What's the trouble? Authorities differ, but it is evident that many of the things Negroes now complain about have applied to Indians for years when they tried to leave the reservations and move to the cities to make their own way.

Job Hunting: "Indian Has a Tough Time"

The late Oliver La Farge, an expert on Indian affairs, summed up the plight of the Indian job hunter this way in his book, "A Pictorial History of the American Indian":

"An Indian seeking employment has a tough time. Thin-skinned, proud, shy, and thoroughly uneasy in his new situation, he is readily discouraged, and usually appears stupid and unable to talk. Until employers have had experience with Indians, they are likely to be prejudiced against them. The foreman's way of giving orders may be normal to us, but shockingly insulting by Indian standards. The idea of absolute regularity, of turning up every day at the exact same hour, has to be learned. Once Indians have got past all these hurdles and learned how the system works, they do very well, and are particularly desired in jobs requiring fine manual skill."

Indians who get jobs near reservations are likely to take unscheduled vacations to attend tribal dances or family gatherings. This seems normal behavior to them. By their employers, it is very often considered irresponsibility.

As a consequence of all these problems and misunderstandings, about a third of the "relocated" Indians end up back on the reservation—where they have only two thirds the life expectancy, half the level of education, less than a third the income, and seven to eight times as much unemployment as the national average for all Americans.

For Many, Home's a Hogan

About 380,000 of the 550,000 Indians in the country still are on or near reservations.

Most of them live in hovels, shantylike hogans or tarpaper shacks. Few reservation homes have bathrooms, or even running water. About 90 per cent of the housing is considered substandard. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Philleo Nash, calls it "truly shocking." Says Mr. Nash:

"Most reservations are places of little opportunity. Life on a reservation can be grim and harsh."

A look at some of the medical statistics tells part of the story. The infant death rate among Indians in 1961 was 43 per 1,000 live births, compared with 25.3 per 1,000 for the U. S. population in general. There were 285 cases of tuberculosis per 100,000 Indians, compared with 37 in the general population. Deaths from tuberculosis were 21 per 100,000 Indians and only 5.7 per 100,000 in the U. S. generally.

Despite such conditions, the fact that most Indians are still segregated results largely from their own choice.

In the beginning, they were pushed around by the whites, driven from the best lands and forced onto reservations on some of the poorest. For years now, they have been free to leave the reservation any time they want to, but the majority of them prefer to stay among their own people.

Many individual Indians have made outstanding achievements in business, in the arts and athletics, in the professions, even in local and national politics. But, as a people, most of them seemingly do not yearn for assimilation or integration into the white man's life. Persons with Indian ancestry are proud of it, consider it a mark of distinction.

Like Negroes, the Indians are full citizens of the United States—although in two States, Arizona and New Mexico, they did not get the right to vote until after World War II. They are as free to move about the country as anybody else. They are subject to the draft for service in the armed forces,

(continued on next page)

—USN&WR Photo

In sharp contrast to the splendor of tribal ritual is the drabness of existence on many reservations. Most housing is primitive, worse than the city slums. Says the Commissioner of Indian Affairs: "Life . . . can be grim and harsh—" and they do serve, some with distinction. Several hold the Congressional Medal of Honor.

INTEGRATION: AMERICA'S INDIANS

[continued from preceding page]

In fact, the Indians who have left the reservations permanently to take jobs in cities and towns all over the U. S. —an estimated 170,000—have exactly the same legal privileges and responsibilities as do other Americans. But for the 380,000 still living on or near reservations, it is an entirely different story.

They are called "federal-service Indians." As such, they have the same privileges as other citizens, but not the same responsibilities. Many special Government programs not available to other people have been set up just for the federal-service Indians.

There are about 290 regular Indian reservations in the country, and an additional 35 pieces of land that are occupied by Indians under Government control. Most of these tracts are relatively small. Only 12 of them involve areas of more than 1 million acres. The largest reservation by far is that of the Navajos, comprising tracts of land in Arizona, New Mexico and Utah that total 15 million acres.

All these reservations and related areas are under the administration of the U. S. Bureau of Indian Affairs, which has been operating since 1824.

In its earlier days, the Bureau was a kind of diplomatic service to deal with the powerful and sovereign Indian tribes. Later on, it took over part of the job of "pacifying" the Indians, and helped herd them onto the reservations. For many years now, its principal job has been to try to help the Indians, to raise their living standards and prepare them for life in the white man's society.

What U. S. Spends on Indian Programs

The task of the Indian Bureau has grown steadily through the years. There is now one Federal Government employe working full time on Indian affairs for every 20 federal-service Indians. Between 1789 and 1947, the U. S. spent 2 billion dollars on the Indians. Another 2 billion has been spent since 1947. By 1967, an additional 1.5 billion will have gone into various programs.

The biggest single item of cost now goes for health. The U. S. Public Health Service provides complete medical care for all federal-service Indians. The annual cost to the Government: about 66 million dollars.

Sixty-two million dollars annually is spent on education.

About 70 million dollars a year goes to construct buildings, build roads, provide utilities, undertake irrigation projects and such services.

Other items include 34 million dollars for "resources management," which means the Government's administration of the timber, oil and mineral resources on the Indian lands; more than 9 million for welfare; 8 million for job assistance and occupational training; another 8 million for administrative expenses and for a special loan fund.

All this does not include money spent indirectly by other Government agencies, or amounts spent by State and local governments. Nor does it include the income that many tribes receive from timber, oil, uranium and other resources on their reservations. Some tribes—the Navajos, for example —get substantial earnings this way. The value of all such assets has been estimated at around 6 billion dollars.

A Gift Plan That Failed

Look more closely at how the money is spent, and you run into some real tangles. One of the biggest has grown up out of what is known as the "heirship problem."

—Bureau of Indian Affairs Photo

One third of all Indian children still attend Indian schools that are operated by the Federal Government.

—Wide World Photo

This Indian worker on a pipeline is typical of those who have taken jobs off the reservations. But one out of every three who leave eventually goes back.

Indians such as these (below) on a street corner in Gallup, N. M., have the same rights as all U. S. citizens. But, for most Indians, there is no yearning for complete integration.

—Morath-Magnum Photo

—U. S. Public Health Service Photo

From cradle to grave, the Government provides federal-service Indians with complete medical care, cost-free.

—Western Ways Photo

Indian cowboys rounding up the herd on a reservation ranch. Now Government is trying to industrialize the Indian lands.

Nearly 80 years ago, someone had the idea that the way to solve the Indian problem was to divide the Indian lands and give each Indian a plot of ground to farm. Overlooked was the fact that most Indians were hunters, not farmers. That oversight has plagued the Government ever since.

The Indians were unable to make a living on the land. So the Government had to continue its "trusteeship," manage the individual tract for the Indian by leasing it to somebody else and give the Indian owner the tax-free income that resulted. The system worked fairly well for a while.

But, by now, the land has been handed down from generation to generation so that some small plots of 80 or 160 acres have literally hundreds of owners. The land can't be sold because that would require the unanimous agreement of all the heirs, and many of them cannot be found.

So, regularly, the Government mails tens of thousands of small checks—many for 25 cents or less—to all the known heirs. The cost of preparing and processing each check is often more than its face value.

Only Congress, by a special law, can put an end to this tangle. Meanwhile, the Bureau hires more people, buys bigger and better computers—and each year there are more heirs, and more checks to mail.

It is clear at a glance that higher and higher spending by Government hasn't begun to solve the problems of the reservation Indians. The complex heirship problem is only one example. Many other things have been tried down through the years, but thousands of those on the reservations still live little better than their grandparents did.

Relocation—a New Life

The Government's main goal for the Indians in recent years has been to get them off reservations and into the mainstream of American life.

Starting in 1952, the Bureau of Indian Affairs undertook a national program to relocate in major cities of the West and Midwest those Indians who were interested. Help was furnished not only to the Indian job hunter, but to his family as well. It included transportation costs, subsistence grants until the paychecks started coming in, and special guidance in finding a place to live and adjusting to new surroundings.

At the outset, things went along fairly well. Most of the first volunteers were Indian veterans of the armed forces who had already brushed up against modern life, and often had acquired useful skills. But when the program began to reach other Indians, difficulties mounted.

One of the biggest was lack of skills. In 1956, Congress authorized the Bureau to provide Indians with vocational training, on-the-job training and apprenticeship training. The cost is paid by the Government—including transportation, tuition, health insurance, tools and supplies, plus subsistence for the trainee.

Nevertheless, the program was far from a spectacular success. Now relocation is being played down. The special programs are still in effect, but they are usually referred to as "employment assistance" rather than "relocation." The new idea seems to be this: If the Indians will not go where the jobs are, maybe the jobs can be brought to the Indians.

Now, Industries for Reservations

The Kennedy Administration is stressing the economic development of the reservations. Industries are being encouraged on or near Indian lands, with subsidies often offered as an inducement. Enterprises sponsored and financed by the tribes are being encouraged, too. Credit is being made available by the Government. Surveys are in progress to try to find out what type of undertaking might succeed on the reservations. One of the most promising: tourist trade.

(continued on next page)

[continued from preceding page]

INTEGRATION: AMERICA'S INDIANS

So far, these various efforts have created about 1,300 jobs. And everybody agrees that at the present pace it will be a long time before this, by itself, will solve the problem of unemployment on the reservations.

End Special Programs?

An entirely separate question, but one that is getting a great deal of attention now, is whether the Federal Government should begin to withdraw from its special programs for the Indians.

In 1953, Congress passed a resolution fixing it to be the policy of Congress "as rapidly as possible, to make the Indians within the territorial limits of the United States subject to the same laws and entitled to the same privileges and responsibilities as are applicable to other citizens of the United States," and that "the Indians within the territorial limits of the United States should assume their full responsibilities as American citizens."

The following year, the Indian Bureau put together a list of more than 200 tribes or groups it considered fully ready to take over management of their own affairs. Since then, federal guidance of about 50 of these—mostly small groups living in California—has been "terminated" by Congress. In all, about 13,000 Indians have been affected.

The termination idea quickly ran into a hornets' nest of opposition. At first, the new policy was interpreted to mean that, whether they wished it or not, these tribes and groups were to be terminated—with their members no longer eligible for Indian Bureau services. In 1958, the Interior Department softened the policy. Now the Government steps out of the picture only when a group consents. A few groups are terminated each year, but the pace is slow.

Opposition From the Tribes

Opposition to the termination program has come mainly from the Indians. Even the most advanced tribes seem reluctant to have the Government end its guardianship.

Many of them see this step as a threat to their security. They fear that they will not be able to pay taxes on their lands, which, under federal trusteeship, have been tax-free. They are wary about being subject to the jurisdiction of some States which, they say, have discriminated against Indians and denied them civil rights. Also, they are reluctant to see the end of such benefits as free medical care. Defenders of the program point out that Indians may still live together on reservations if they choose. That's the answer given to those who worry that the end of Government guardianship will bring the end of Indian culture. But then the Indians who choose to stay on reservations will run their own affairs, and stop receiving special benefits.

The battle over termination of federal responsibility is far from over. In 1961, when the Kennedy Administration came in, a special task force was assembled to study the entire Indian problem. In meetings with Indians, it was found that they did not even want to talk about the possible end of special federal services for them.

At one meeting, John O. Crow, now Deputy Commissioner of Indian Affairs, said: "We have reached the point where we can't talk about it to each other; we don't want to talk about it; and if we do talk about it we have rather harsh words on the subject."

The task force concluded that the U. S. had the cart before the horse—that the termination of services should be made a long-range goal, to be reached only after economic development and greatly strengthened educational programs have equipped Indians to get along on their own.

Congress is not fully satisfied with this vague timing for the end of the Indian programs. There is considerable concern that subsidies and continued Government management of their affairs will not prepare the Indians to assume the full responsibilities of citizenship. Critics say such things are more likely to discourage initiative and make the Indians even more dependent on the Government.

Congressional committees are constantly trying to get the Government to move ahead with termination of tribes that appear ready. The House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs repeatedly asks the Indian Bureau to draw up long-range plans for the termination of each tribe.

After a Century, a Long Job Ahead

So far, these requests have not produced results. Meanwhile, all but overlooked in the tension over Negroes' rights, the reservation Indians remain just about as badly off as they were a century ago. It looks as though it will take many years and a lot more money before the entire Indian population is ready to assume the full role of citizenship.

—Western Ways Photo

THE INDIAN AND THE NEGRO IN AMERICA

From "Democracy in America," 1840, by Alexis de Tocqueville:

"The Negro makes a thousand fruitless efforts to insinuate himself among men who repulse him; he conforms to the tastes of his oppressors, adopts their opinions, and hopes by imitating them to form a part of their community. . . . The Indian, on the contrary, has his imagination inflated with the pretended nobility of his origin, and lives and dies in the midst of these dreams of pride. Far from desiring to conform his habits to ours, he loves his savage life as the distinguishing mark of his race and repels every advance to civilization. . . .

"The Negro, who earnestly desires to mingle his race with that of the European, cannot do so; while the Indian, who might succeed to a certain extent, disdains to make the attempt. . . ."

—Black Star Photo

Post Magazine
September 7, 1963

A+R Rel.

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST
FOUNDED BY Benj. Franklin

WHAT NORTHERNERS REALLY THINK OF NEGROES

By Stewart Alsop
and Oliver Quayle

In Los Angeles, Alsop interviews a pair of house builders, Ward Peterson and Norman Larson.

Washington Editor Alsop and public-opinion-expert Quayle pooled their talents to discover the real reaction of the white North to the growing racial crisis.

The white North is no more ready to accept genuine integration and real racial equality than the deep South. This conclusion may seem sweeping. But it is based on a lot of legwork—specifically it is based on 500 lengthy interviews in 12 statistically typical voting districts in the East, the Middle West and the West Coast. The statistical results of these interviews, and the answers to a number of the key questions, accompany this report. But the conclusion stated above is not based on statistics alone. It also is based on the way people in the North talk about racial equality.

Here, then, is the way people talk. Here are the phrases you would hear again and again and again all across the North, if you spent many hours ringing doorbells and asking people for their views on the race problem:

"They been held down too long, but they're pushing too hard."

"The colored got rights, just like us whites, but I don't see why we got to mingle together."

"They're human beings just like the rest of us, but I wouldn't want one living next door."

Ray Yoshiyama of Gardena, Calif., feels Negroes "have not worked their way up."

Negroes are "Americans like the rest of us," according to Clay Thomason of Toledo, Ohio.

August de Santolo of Mount Vernon, N.Y., believes that hard work and not demonstrations is the way to get ahead in life.

"They're just human beings like the rest of us, but I wouldn't want one living next door."

"It says in the Constitution (or the Bible) that all men are equal, but they're not ready yet."

"There's some good, some bad, just like the rest of us, but I don't care for all this violence."

"Sure, they deserve a break, but look what happens to property values when they move into a neighborhood."

Each of the above sentences contains one small but significant word—"but." That word expresses the amazing and almost universal ambivalence of the northern white American's reaction to the racial crisis. The "but" neatly divides his mind into two parts.

One part of his mind mistily recalls that "all men are created equal"—it is surprising how many people use that phrase, or a variant. The other part of his mind insists that "some are more equal than others." If there had been no Negro drive for equality, there would have been no civil-rights bill. But what is very striking is the way in which the Negro drive—the demonstrations above all—has tended to alienate the northern white, to make him nervous and unhappy, to convince him that "the colored are getting out of hand." In case of widespread racial violence in the North, no matter who throws the first brick or draws the first blood, the alienation could very easily become total.

There are, of course, some whites in the North who have a one-part mind, an undivided mind. There are a good many people like Mr. Claude Tassell, of Toledo, Ohio, for example. "Boy, you fellows really want all the answers, don't you?" Mr. Tassell remarked to one of us. "OK, here goes. I think white people are a little superior. The Negroes are like savages. Have you seen them chanting and dancing in these demonstrations? Then you know how I feel. I believe in segregation really—now that you've asked. They should live by themselves and they should want to live by themselves. The trouble is, they don't want to. They want to feel equal to the whites."

Mr. Tassell is by no means alone. Of the people interviewed, a surprising 16 percent were convinced that whites are innately superior to Negroes—another 27 percent thought Negroes were inferior, but because of education and environment. (Two persons out of 500 thought the Negroes were superior. "The Negroes are physically superior," explained one. "When was the last white heavyweight champ? And the experts say there's no difference in intelligence. So the Negroes must be superior.") Like Mr. Tassell, the people of the 16 percent are, in general, unconditional segregationists.

There are also people like Mr. Clay Thomason, of Toledo, and Mrs. Marie Honcharik, an attractive housewife in Yonkers, N. Y. Mr. Thomason hails originally from Paducah, Ky., and he wants it clearly understood that "I'm no nigger-lover." But, he says, Negroes "are Americans like the rest of us." He admires President Kennedy for his civil-rights stand, and believes that it should be a Federal offense "to deny a person because his skin is black." Mrs. Honcharik recalls that "ever since I was a little girl I remember looking at colored people and feeling sorry for them." On every major civil-rights issue, she is on the side of the Negroes.

A minority of extremists

But Mr. Thomason and Mrs. Honcharik, as all-out integrationists, are in the minority too—a minority of 23 percent, according to our sample. Thus taken together, the people like Mr. Tassell, who say an unconditional "no" to Negro demands for equality, and the people like Mr. Thomason and Mrs. Honcharik, who say an unconditional "yes," comprise less than 40 percent of the northern white population. The rest, three people out of five, say "Yes, but . . ." And the more you talk to these people, the smaller the "yes" sounds, and the bigger the "but."

A couple of neighbors, Mrs. Clarence Main and Mrs. Nancy Kalk, both of Redondo Beach, Calif., are fairly typical yes-butters. Mrs. Main and Mrs. Kalk disagree on a number of points. Mrs. Main would vote for President Kennedy in 1964, while Mrs. Kalk prefers Barry Goldwater. Mrs. Main approves the accommodations section of the Kennedy civil-rights bill, and Mrs. Kalk is against it.

Mrs. Kalk believes that Negroes "should have more rights," but she is convinced that "they're just creating hate by the way they're pushing this," and she suspects that "it's pushed by the Communists." Mrs. Main feels that "these people deserve to be Americans—they pay their taxes and fight for their country the same as we do." But despite this she too thinks that "they're pushing too fast."

That curious phrase—"they're pushing too fast"—is a phrase the ringer of doorbells hears from coast to coast, and more than any other phrase it is the key to the white North's attitude toward the racial crisis. It is the key to what the present writers, about halfway through our project, began to call "the other side of the but." But first let us have a look at "this side of the but," the "yes" side. This is the side which is most easily reduced to statistics, which is one reason why the liberalism of the white North on the race question tends to be grossly overestimated by most people.

For example, those who were familiar with it (more than a third had no idea what it was about) approved Kennedy's civil-rights program by a two-to-one margin. They approved the key public-accommodations section by three to two. They agreed with Kennedy (as against Goldwater and the southern leaders) that civil rights is a matter for the Federal Government, rather than the states, to deal with. And they were in favor of the Supreme Court's school-integration ruling by a decisive three-to-one margin.

Public-opinion-sampler Oliver Quayle talks to Mrs. Marie Honcharik in Yonkers, N.Y. "Ever since I was a little girl," she says, "I remember looking at Negroes and feeling sorry for them."

Claude Tassell of Toledo, Ohio, says he believes in segregation, because "Negroes are like savages" and should want to live apart.

These figures seem to suggest that the white North is solidly liberal, tolerant and high-minded on the race question. And in one sense the figures are not lying. There is a basic difference of attitude between the white North and the segregationist South. The difference is most marked in the attitude of white northerners on the public-accommodations section of the civil-rights bill.

It was usually necessary to explain the accommodations section—"President Kennedy wants to make it against the law for the owner of a hotel, store or theater to deny service to a person because of race." Once explained, the reaction was very often the same—"That seems OK to me," or "I see nothing wrong with that." Often people sounded puzzled, as though wondering why the issue had ever been raised. Most white northerners, even passionate Negrophobes, take for granted the right of Negroes to be served in public places.

Many of the people we talked to also recalled going to school with Negroes—"never did me no harm," said one old lady, and several remarked that "that color don't rub off in school." These differences in attitude between the white North and the segregationist South are genuine, and they are important. But there are ways in which the white North and the segregationist South see eye to eye, and these similarities are also genuine and important.

Here we come to that phrase we heard again and again—"but they're pushing too hard." What does the phrase mean?

Many people, when they use the phrase, have the Negro demonstrations in mind. A great many people regard the demonstrations as somehow disgraceful, like a dirty house. "What must they think of us abroad?" several people asked. Mrs. Peterson, a housewife we interviewed in Southern California, feels that "the colored people are playing straight into Khrushchev's hands," by undermining the American position abroad.

In some people the Negro demonstrations have also created an underlying layer of simple physical fear. A lady in the Bronx was aghast when asked whether the Post could take her picture to go with her rather mild views on the race question. If her name were used, she said, "the colored will come and knife my kids."

The phrase also expressed another sort of fear—the fear that Negroes will "push" into white jobs, white schools, white neighborhoods; perhaps—for intermarriage is a widespread bugaboo—into white hearts.

This is the "other side of the but." And there is a very marked difference between the two sides of the but. On the "yes" side there is an abstract desire to see justice done to the American citizen whose skin happens to be black. But the desire is abstract; it is not deeply felt. On the other side there is the question: "How will it affect me?" And if the answer is that Negro advance may endanger social status, or a job, or the value of a house, the desire for abstract justice evaporates quickly, and the desire to "keep the colored in their place" appears instead. That desire can be very deeply felt.

The touchiest subject of all

If a politician's constituency is white by a big majority, and if he wishes to commit political suicide, there appear to be three easy ways to do so. One is to espouse the demands of some Negro organizations for exchanges of white and colored students by bus, to end "de facto segregation." When a lot of people in the New York area volunteered complaints about this scheme, we added a question about it to our interview. But we dropped the question later, because everybody, including those strongly pro-Negro on every other issue, denounced the idea. The feeling against job quotas for Negroes, we discovered, is almost as strong. But the touchiest subject of all, because it affects more people than any other, is the subject of housing.

Again and again we had the same experience. A person would seem a very paladin of racial tolerance. In favor of the accommodations section of the civil-rights bill—"How would you feel if you were turned out of a restaurant because of the color of your skin?" In favor of better treatment for the Negroes—"They been held down too long." In favor of the Supreme Court integration decision, and willing to have his or her children go to an integrated school—"That color don't rub off." And then the question about housing, and a pause, often embarrassed, and then, in the words of a kindly-faced man we talked to in a Los Angeles suburb: "Look, mister, the colored move into an area and values go down twenty percent, even more—I just can't afford that."

The statistics speak for themselves. Of those with an opinion in the matter, 77 percent of the people we interviewed, more than three out of four, believed that a white man should have the right to refuse to sell his house to a Negro on the basis of race. We found the same lopsided reply to our question everywhere we went, from coast to coast. It is remarkable that any politician who has favored anti-discrimination statutes in housing survives in office.

The motivation for this reaction is partly, but only partly, economic. Mr. H. Gene Creecy of Toledo pointed out that if he sold his house to a Negro "all the others in the neighborhood will automatically go down from $2,000 to $4,000." But he also said, "Personally, I don't want to live beside them—they're different, that's all."

Another Toledoan, Mr. Elmer Dowling, a retired accountant, considered the problem in terms of the life after death: "I wouldn't want to live near one, but of course if I die and go to Heaven I know I'll have to live with them then. I might feel the same way I do down here, but

"Look, mister, the colored move into an area and values go down twenty percent, even more.

THE ALSOP-QUAYLE POLL

To produce this report, Oliver Quayle selected 12 "barometric" voting districts in the East, the Middle West and the West coast, for 500 interviews in depth. Alsop and Quayle were assisted by Quayle's staff of trained interviewers, but they did more than half the interviews themselves, since their purpose was to interpret, report and analyze, as well as to produce statistics. The statistical results of their project are also interesting, however, and in some cases startling. Here are the most pertinent ones—with "no opinion" responses eliminated in every instance:

What kind of a job do you think President Kennedy is doing? Robert Kennedy?

| | President | Robert Kennedy |
|---|---|---|
| "Excellent" or "pretty good" | 57% | 48% |
| "Only fair" or "poor" | 43% | 52% |

If the election were being held tomorrow, would you probably vote for:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Kennedy | 64% | Kennedy | 57% |
| Rockefeller | 36% | Goldwater | 43% |

What do you think are the most important issues facing the United States?

Race 33% Foreign-policy problems 22% Taxes 16% (rest scattered)

What do you think of the President's civil-rights program?

Approve 63% Disapprove 37%

What do you think of accommodations section (explained by interviewer)?

Approve 61% Disapprove 39%

What do you think of the Supreme Court's decision on school integration?

Approve 75% Disapprove 25%

Is civil rights a matter for the states or the Federal Government?

States 36% Federal 64%

Suppose you yourself had school-age children, other things being equal, would you prefer that they went to integrated school, all white, or would it make no difference to you?

Integrated 17% All white 42% No difference 41%

Do you think a Negro should have the right to buy a home anywhere, or do you think a white man should have the right to refuse to sell to a Negro?

Negro should have right to buy 23%
White should have right to refuse 77%

Do you think there is a basic difference between the white and Negro races?

White superior innately 16%
White superior because of education 27%
Races about the same 57%

Do you think the Negroes in this country are treated too well, not well enough, or about right?

Too well 11% Not well enough 38% About right 51%

if the Lord says to me I have to make a choice, I'd live with them just to be with Him."

Some whites complain that anti-discrimination statutes really discriminate against whites. "Look," said a jaunty businessman in blue slacks, who lived in the Bronx and refused to have his picture taken, "suppose I won't sell you this house because I don't like the look of you. So you're white, so OK. Suppose you're colored. So if I refuse to sell it to you, I'm in trouble, maybe bad trouble. There really ought to be a National Association for the Advancement of White People."

Others complain that Negroes "don't keep up their places." There seems to be a widespread notion, easily disproved by a tour of any Negro middle-class area, that "the colored throw their garbage on the lawn." Such complaints are most likely to be voiced by sloppy housekeepers in rundown areas.

In fact, contrary to the mythology of the liberal intellectuals, on the race issue as on other issues, the poor are apt to be a lot more reactionary than the reasonably well off. A person with a neurotic hankering to hear rabidly racist views should avoid the comfortable suburbs with well-kept lawns, and he should not ring the doorbells of people with Jewish or Anglo-Saxon names.

He should go, instead, to the working-class areas, especially where Negroes are moving in, and especially where there are immigrants and minority races other than Jews. There is a widespread feeling among the minorities that the Negroes, in the words of Mr. Ray Yoshiyama, of Gardena, Calif., "haven't worked their way up." Mr. Yoshiyama spent his boyhood in a wartime detention camp, and he is proud that he now makes a decent living as a market gardener. Hard work, not demonstrations, he thinks, is the way to get ahead.

Mr. August de Santolo, of Mount Vernon, N. Y., who came over from Italy as a boy and is proud of his successful sons, feels much the same way. So do Mr. and Mrs. Leslei Toths. Mr. Toths is a refugee from Hungary, and he and his German wife are intensely proud of their $25,000 house in Culver City, Calif. The value of their previous house in another suburb depreciated badly when Negroes began to move in, and the memory rankles. "The Negroes are pressing too fast," complains Mr. Toths. He feels they should realize "that white people are a thousand years ahead in culture."

Northern whites, in short, are willing enough to share a restaurant or a hotel with Negroes, and they will even share their schools—although better than two out of five said they would prefer to send their children to all-white schools. But aside from the three sticking points mentioned earlier, there is also an underlayer of mixed fear and prejudice. This underlayer is far more prevalent in the white North than the writers of this report had realized before they set out on their tour. And for the first time, the racial issue has suddenly become the dominant issue in this country. Last year one of us asked 500 people, "What concerns you most?" Race was way down on the list. Now it easily leads all the other issues, including the survival issue of war and peace.

What, then, with a presidential election year coming up in 1964, is the probable political impact of the racial issue?

One of us recently asked that question of New York's shrewd Sen. Jacob Javits. Surely, the reporter said, in view of the way so many northern whites talked about the Negro question, it was a dangerous thing for a politician, like Javits himself, to be an all-out advocate of civil rights?

"Sure," said the senator, "I know they talk that way. But they don't vote that way."

This is the Javits Rule. Our sample strongly suggests that the Javits Rule remains valid. President Kennedy himself (belatedly, according to his critics) must now be counted an all-out advocate of civil rights. He must be counted with the one-in-four minority in the white North who say an unconditional "yes" to Negro aspirations, as against the three out of four who say "yes, but" or "no."

Logically, therefore, the civil-rights issue, as the dominant issue today, ought to hurt the President politically, perhaps even wound him mortally. But, at least in the north, the hurt to the President seems hardly more than a pinprick.

Seven percent of the people we talked to gave his stand on the race crisis as a reason for liking the President, against 11 percent who disliked him for the same reason. The spread in Robert Kennedy's case was markedly wider—5 percent to 12 percent—which suggests that the Attorney General acts as a useful lightning rod for his brother, where the race issue is concerned. Remember, moreover, that we interviewed only whites, and what the President has lost among whites has certainly been balanced at least in part by what he has gained among Negroes.

Kennedy is still popular

Moreover, in our sample, President Kennedy inflicted on both Sen. Barry Goldwater and Gov. Nelson Rockefeller a political "murder most horrible," although the murder of Goldwater was notably less horrible than Rockefeller's. In voting districts which voted 50 percent for Richard Nixon in 1960, in two states (Ohio and California) which Kennedy lost in 1960, and with the pro-Kennedy Negro vote excluded, Kennedy beat Rockefeller two to one, and Goldwater by a spread of 14 percentage points.

The real question, then, is not whether the racial issue has already hurt the President badly; it hasn't. The real question is whether the Javits Rule can be broken by circumstances and an astute opposition. Suppose, for example, that there is really bad racial trouble in the North before next year's election. This is not impossible, as anyone who has smelled the atmosphere in the streets of our big cities can attest.

Even bad racial trouble would not bring the white North to support a racist segregationist on the southern pattern. The real northern Negrophobes are so small a minority in the North that any candidate carrying the label "anti-Negro" would be doomed from the start among the majority of whites. But suppose Kennedy's opponent presented himself as a moderate, a middle-of-the-roader—a yes-butter, like the white majority. And suppose he succeeded in implanting in the minds of the yes-but majority the notion that on racial matters the President is an extremist, a Negro yes-man, indifferent to "the rights of the white majority," intent on forcing Negroes and whites to live together.

I just can't afford that."

Under these circumstances, is it possible that the Javits Rule might be broken, and that the racial issue might be used to encompass the defeat of an extremely popular President?

No one really knows the answer to that question, of course. But after all our walking and talking, the writers of this report are convinced that the racial issue is a sleeper—an unpredictable but potentially decisive political factor. The white North does not really feel strongly about such issues as the civil-rights bill or the Supreme Court's integration decision. The white North feels very strongly about such far more personal matters as housing and social integration. These are the kind of strong feelings that really can cause election upsets.

The writers of this report are convinced of something else as well. For the time being there is simply no way to reconcile the aspirations of the new generation of Negroes for real integration and true equality with the resistance to those aspirations of the majority of whites. For a time this country will simply have to live with the irreconcilable.

The finding that astonished us most—we went back and rechecked it to be sure it was correct—was that only 38 percent of the people we interviewed feel that the American Negro is treated "not well enough." More than six out of 10 feel that the Negro is being treated "about right," or even "too well."

These six people out of 10 have no understanding of the brutal meaning of the statistics cited by the President: "The Negro baby born in America today, regardless of the section or state in which he is born, has about one half as much chance of completing high school as a white baby, born in the same place, on the same day; . . . twice as much chance of becoming unemployed; about one seventh as much chance of earning $10,000 a year; a life expectancy which is seven years shorter and prospects for earning only half as much."

As long as six out of 10 northern whites are unaware of such facts or indifferent to them, the gulf between what the Negroes want and what the whites will accept will continue to be very wide. It is much wider today than most people realize, which is why the racial crisis in this country is more dangerous than most people have yet discovered.

The danger lies less in violent Negro action than in violent white reaction. It is easy to imagine the kind of political oratory, perhaps sweetly reasonable in seeming, which would ignite all the fears and prejudices which lie on "the other side of the but." The racial crisis today is like a controlled cancer. The excitements and temptations of a presidential election year might cause the issue to be exploited in such a way that the cancer might get out of control. That is a risk the responsible leadership of both parties should weigh most seriously. THE END

Surrounded by his sons and farm equipment, truck-gardener Wayne Bressler of Monroe, Mich., sits for his interview by Washington Editor Alsop. Some 500 such interviews contributed to this report.

LOOK, 9/10/63

LWD, VJ, PA, ML
BR
R+R Rel.

A NEGRO WRITER TELLS

WHY THE NEGROES CONTINUE TO

The current Negro uprising was brought on by the total collapse of the Negro's faith in the basic integrity of the white power structure, and is directed against both segregation and the entrenched Negro leadership

DIRECT ACTION is now the major weapon in the Negro's arsenal. The Negro march on Washington, a predicted 100 thousand strong, is to urge passage of the Administration's civil-rights bill. But the arrival of this horde of us is more than a show of support for this particular piece of legislation; it is a major battle in the Negro Revolt. Our march—as was our march against Birmingham's Bull Conner—is a defiance, a further determination "not to let nobody turn us round."

The capital stage is set for a definitive encounter:

The Administration interposed the civil-rights bill only after the tragedy of Birmingham. President Kennedy told the nation, in essence: Enact this bill, or face more demonstrations, perhaps violence.

Southern legislators cried blackmail and vowed not only to filibuster the bill, but to imperil other Administration bills as well.

Negro leaders momentarily abandoned their internecine wars and hoisted the umbrella of unity under which we all march to Washington together. The President has welcomed us, but are we really wanted there? The Administration invites our prayers, but is wary of our presence. The Kennedy brothers have certified our desires, but would just as soon do without our demonstrations—particularly if, in the President's own word, we plan to get "unruly."

Against this backdrop, the bill, at stage center, will pass or fail, in part or in whole, and its passing or failing will create yet another dilemma. Should the bill pass, it will be taken by the Negro as further evidence that the nation acts only when we create a crisis. If the measure fails, the defeat will be taken as final proof that this nation will not yield under any circumstances. These are chilling alternatives because each of them is based on the Negro's spiritual estrangement from this republic. But that—the Negro's estrangement and the reasons for it—is precisely what the Negro Revolt is all about.

The current Negro uprising represents a drastic change in technique, the racing of thousands of Negroes from the courtroom into the streets and marketplace in search of the manna tree called "integration." It was brought on by the total collapse of the Negro's faith in the basic integrity of the white power structure, and is directed against both segregation and the entrenched Negro leadership.

Up to 1955, the Negro protest movement was centered in the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. It was chained to legalism and had an essentially middle-class outlook. The NAACP had obtained magnificent legal victories, but the implementation of the court decisions was proceeding with all deliberate footdragging. Clinging tenaciously to its conservative approach, the NAACP found itself seeking court orders to force recalcitrant Southerners to obey previous court orders. And the Southerners proceeded to flout both the first court order and the command to obey it.

Then came the Montgomery bus boycott and Martin Luther King. Swift on their heels came the Supreme Court ruling ending discrimination in intrastate public carriers. The sit-ins followed—and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. Swift on their heels came the end of segregation at hundreds of lunch counters across the South. The Freedom Rides and the Congress of Racial Equality brought the Federal fiat ending discrimination in terminal facilities. The pragmatic black masses began to wonder if public demonstrations were not the only route to equality. They were obviously the shortest.

This set off fierce rivalry among civil-rights organizations for funds, memberships and public acclaim. The NAACP's propaganda machines began to turn out press releases reminding the nation that the NAACP had staged sit-ins long before CORE and Martin Luther King came on the scene. This was true, but the NAACP never explained why it abandoned such an effective weapon.

The claim to direct-action techniques was further clouded when several officials of the NAACP became openly critical of such demonstrations. NAACP's board chairman, the Rt. Rev. Stephen Gill Spottswood, called the sit-ins "signal flares." Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of NAACP, pointed to the Freedom Rides and predicted that the funds needed for such "forays" would soon dry up. And Wilkins's administrative assistant, Dr. John A. Morsell, flatly told the 1960 NAACP convention: "We can hardly advocate or condone a policy of mass civil disobedience, except under such extreme conditions that would warrant complete abandonment of the entire philosophy of operations which has sustained us for fifty years."

During 1962 and early 1963, the revolt sputtered. CORE went broke posting bails at Jackson, Miss. Despite nonviolent demonstrations by hundreds of Negroes, Martin Luther King failed to achieve desegregation of bus terminal facilities in Albany, Ga. And the penniless workers for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee sloshed through the bayous of Mississippi in search of Negro voters and a good hot meal. There were minor skirmishes, but no real battles. Things got very quiet; they became very mean. The Black Muslims alone barometered the bile boiling in the Negro's guts.

Then came Birmingham, and the collective snap of the Negro's spirit boomed like thunder across the nation. Interracial couples in New York separated for reasons they couldn't explain. White liberals realized that their Negro friends were deliberately avoiding them. White editors discovered that Negro writers were too choked up to create anything but damnation of the white man. Comedian Dick Gregory stopped being funny and made his audiences weep with guilt. A Negro construction worker in Brooklyn assaulted a fellow white worker who had been calling him "Sambo" for six months without incident. Then Medgar Evers was murdered.

Negroes all over the land, in every town, looked under their municipal rugs and found that the segregation they have known was there all their lives. They marched in the streets—some quarter of a million of them in upwards of 40 cities—to shout, "Now or never!" And it was to calm the black crowds that the President introduced his eleventh-hour civil-rights bill.

REVOLT

BY LOUIS E. LOMAX
Author of NEGRO REVOLT and THE RELUCTANT AFRICAN

So now a hundred thousand of us are marching on Washington singing, "We shall overcome some day." The chances that we will get unruly are slim. We will march, pray, sing freedom songs, listen to long speeches from our leaders and visit our congressmen. But because they are bound by a compromise, our leaders will not have us sit in on Capitol Hill, as Martin Luther King indicated we might. If the bill passes, it will give us more Federal aid against pockets of segregation already under siege. Should the bill fail, Negroes will resort to much more hell raising until segregation falls in the interest of public order, safety and the national image.

But the bill is not our only concern as we come to Washington. We are also gathered to warn the nation that it would be fatal to underestimate the Negro's determination. Our commitment against segregation is total—dangerously so. The Negro Revolt is on exact schedule. Thanks to Bull Conner's dogs, things are moving along better than most of us thought they would be at this juncture.

The revolt's victory over the Negro leadership class is complete. In July, Roy Wilkins presided over a runaway NAACP national convention that committed black mankind to direct action and then hooted down everybody—including Chicago's Mayor Richard Daley and Negro Baptist leader Dr. J. H. Jackson—who bore the taint of moderation. To his eternal credit, several weeks before the convention, Wilkins hied off to Jackson, Miss., and got himself put into jail.

Even the conservative Urban League has resorted to direct action. Its New York leaders were bruised and bloodied during the storming of a police barricade at Harlem Hospital.

The revolt's thrust against segregation has yet to result in total victory. But it will. One day soon, Negroes will go to "white" theaters in Savannah, Ga.; they will eat integrated hamburgers in Greenwood, Miss.; black women will try on dresses before they buy them in Birmingham, Ala.; our children will attend integrated schools in Danville, Va.; Negro travelers will use integrated washroom facilities in Albany, Ga.; and we are going to eat grits and greens at a roadside café in Cambridge, Md. All of this will cause deep troubling, but it will come about.

When visible, legal segregation is ended, Negroes must come to grips with the fact that they are an underdeveloped people. We Negroes, on the whole, are not ready to assume the responsibilities that are inseparable concomitants of the freedoms we seek. There are reasons for this, and the Negro's "cultural gap" has everything to do with what has happened to the black man in America since his reluctant migration from Africa. But that was almost four hundred years ago. To be sure, we are still scarred by what happened then, and since, but democracy is as demanding as it is infectious, and the Negro is by no means relieved of the imperative to further change things by becoming a much more responsible citizen than he now is. The American Negro must be taught and is ready to be taught.

Can the present Negro leaders do the job within the Negro community they are now doing against the white establishment? Frankly, I doubt it. They are too protest-minded, too caught up—and rightly so—in removing segregation. But a younger crop of Negro leaders who can do an intracommunity job are already waiting in the wings.

THE REV. JAMES BEVEL asked a Negro in Birmingham, "How the hell you going to say you love God, and you don't even vote? Jesus

continued

DRAWING BY AUSTIN BRIGGS

The young leaders of the future have been shot at and jailed

don't need no freeloaders. He had enough of them at the Crucifixion. If you want to help God's kingdom come on earth, you register at the polls tomorrow. Meanwhile, let your daughter stay in jail with the rest of the demonstrators until our change comes."

"Praise the Lord! I sure will do just that," the man said and walked away.

DIANE NASH is Mrs. James Bevel. On lonely nights, she and Jim sit around—after they have put their little child to sleep—and match jail records. They also "town-drop," swapping accounts of their adventures in Southern cities where they have gone to tell Negroes to stand up, scrub up, be somebody and vote. And there is friendly rivalry in the Bevel family. Jim works for Dr. King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and Diane works for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC).

IKE REYNOLDS and Mary Hamilton of CORE are modern highwaymen. You will find them up and down the dusty roads of the deep South conducting Freedom Rides and Marches. You will also find them sleeping in the homes of the black masses, telling them of the need to look up and become a part of a great new thing. And they and the people they serve become one with the troubled earth.

NORMAN HILL, Velma Hill, Gladys Harrington, James Horton and John Parham are the young people who not only organized the Harlem Hospital demonstration in New York, but also went scurrying to find Negroes who could qualify for the breakthrough jobs they sought. Norman Hill, his wife Velma and Gladys Harrington are CORE people; James Horton is part of the new look among NAACP-ers, and John Parham is the type of Urban Leaguer who will get their much-touted "crash program" off the drawing boards.

BOB MOSES came back home to New York for a few days last summer. But he didn't return to get the job his Harvard education says he should have. Bob came to raise money for his fellow SNCC workers in Mississippi. Bob wired every dime he could raise back to the young men and women tramping through Mississippi and Alabama conducting voter-registration programs among Negroes. Bob Moses himself went hungry in New York; a friendly white magazine editor had to take him out to dinner and make him eat.

DORIS DERBY, 22, teaches school in Yonkers, N. Y., and is studying for her master's degree at Hunter College. Two years ago, she joined the "movement" and became an SNCC worker at Albany, Ga. Come September, Doris is headed for the deep South, where she will use the latest methods of adult education to teach illiterate Negroes how to read and write, and how to vote.

DOROTHY COTTON, 25, holds a master's degree in speech from Boston University. "Click, click, click"—one can hear her heels as she walks across the upper ramp of a Birmingham, Ala., motel. The night has fused into early morning; Martin Luther King and his top aides are asleep. But Dorothy is awake. She has just bedded down her key student leaders. In a few hours now, she will awaken them, and they will all be in church by nine o'clock, leading freedom songs and transmuting young Negro frustration into dignity. Shortly before noon, Martin Luther King will walk on the stage and ask, "Do you want to be free?" And Dorothy Cotton sees to it that three thousand children are there, ready to shout "yes." Then they march off to jail.

CLARENCE MITCHELL, JR., 25, ran for the State Assembly from the Baltimore Negro ghetto on the "sit-in" ticket. He hired his 18-year-old brother as his campaign manager and licked both the Negro conservatives and the segregationists to become the first Negro to sit in the Maryland House of Delegates since Reconstruction.

These are names to remember. These men and women are all under 30, they all are poor, they lead by living with the people, and—other than Clarence Mitchell—I doubt if any of them has ever had a cocktail with a white liberal. Most of them have been beaten and shot at; most of them have been to jail. These will be the leaders of the future. They, and others like them, will guide the Negro over the debris of the past into first-class citizenship.

These young leaders will not walk alone. The big-name leaders will still be with us, leading attacks on lingering aspects of discrimination. And when the legal battles and street demonstrations are settled and over with, the Southern Negro schoolteacher can emerge into the open once again. Then the Negro Revolt will have come full circle, and Negro teachers can train tomorrow's statesmen, just as they clandestinely trained today's revolutionaries. It will be a great day when these Negro teachers are released from fear and put back in harness where they belong. They can combine with the young leaders and tell Negroes the tribal truth: that the only way to get up and go is to get up and git!

But the times are a bit tender now for this. A man who is blocked from the washroom is hardly in the mood to be told that he should drink less and vote more; a black child whose best job prospect is to become manager of a white household cannot be blamed too much if she doesn't widen her horizons to dream of becoming a chemical engineer. People who live out their lives on the brink of terror and insecurity can hardly be expected to become responsible citizens.

Soon now, we will be able to write about these American horrors in the past tense. There will be no clear break, a morning when we will wake up and find segregation gone. There will only be continuing change and progress. By protesting, we Negroes are ushering in that change and progress, and we must ready our young for the new day we are bringing on.

We Americans, black and white alike, have sinned—but there is greatness in our guilt. Never before has a society tried to absorb so large and, for whatever reasons, troubling a minority. This is the first time a nation has attempted so drastic a social change, so quickly and with the anticipation of spilling so little blood. Let the truth be told: This entire nation is on a long Freedom Ride. Some of the children are reluctant to get on board, but, as Govs. George Wallace and Ross Barnett proved, they are of no mind to be crushed and left behind. The Negro Revolt is America reaching for immortality. It is within our grasp, and we will capture it if we prove to be men of level heads and compassionate hearts. END the treaty is ratified, by the continued assurance that the professional military voice of the Joint Chiefs will be heard in its naked, unadorned, unveiled form—unanimous or not—in the legislative branch of the Government.

"Litterbug!"

9/19/63

All of this adds up to the provision of a hot line of communication, direct from top U.S. military planners—the Joint Chiefs—to a specified group in Congress.

The right of a member of the JCS to go to Congress is not new. The law recognizes that, after just informing the Secretary of Defense, a member of the Joint Chiefs may make recommendations to Congress relating to the policies of the Department of Defense.

What is new about the hot line concept is that, if it is approved, Congress would direct the Joint Chiefs to make reports, routinely, of the military views on related defense issues—before decisions are irrevocably made.

HOT LINE AND DECISIONS

How such a permanent setup might work out can be seen in a few examples of recent defense issues. In the TFX controversy, for instance, Congress was confronted with a fait accompli: A huge, basic contract had been signed and sealed before the contrary views of military analysts were even made known to congressional committees. Had there been a hot line in this case, presumably the decision would have been held up until the intensive investigation later ordered by Congress had been carried out.

Congress also would have had a greater—perhaps a formative—role in decisions like those involving the Skybolt, the B-70, trimming of forces overseas, in which action was taken before Congress was notified in each case.

In addition, if Congress could have been kept abreast in this way of military views on developing risks in Cuba, this might have prevented an intelligence bobble like the Bay of Pigs fiasco.

Many of America's top military men, thus, are hoping that the Admiral's suggestion will lead to some basic changes, whereby the voice of the Joint Chiefs of Staff will be heard loud and clear over what would amount to an authorized hot line—direct from them to Congress.

Sgt. Donald M. Hamblen, a Marine's Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STANLEY R. TUPPER

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1963

Mr. TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, an article appearing in this week's issue of Newsweek on one individual's personal courage should be of interest to all Members.

I am speaking of an account of Marine Sgt. Donald M. Hamblen of Augusta, Maine, who, through great determination, made his first parachute jump with one leg and thus earned his right to remain in the crack 1st Force Reconnaissance Company of the U.S. Marines.

I am proud of this constituent of mine and I am sure that this man's personal bravery and intestinal fortitude will be a great example to many others with similar handicaps.

The article follows:

MARINE'S MARINE

Now it was time for the ultimate test. Marine Sgt. Donald M. Hamblen had dashed 50 yards, hoisted a fellow leatherneck across his shoulders, and carried the "casualty" back to the starting point—all in 40 seconds. He had proved he could run 3 miles in 36 minutes, clamber up a 20-foot rope, scramble over obstacle courses, dive with scuba gear strapped to his back. Now he had to make his first parachute jump in nearly a year.

Korean veteran Hamblen's last jump—his 215th—had nearly ended in disaster when he snagged a 12,000-volt power cable. The rugged marine, 31, escaped with his life, but his left leg—ripped by shrapnel in Korea—was so badly burned that it had to be amputated just below the knee. His 12-year Marine career seemed over. Crippled in the line of duty, he was eligible for a lifetime monthly pension of $225.

But Hamblen had other ideas: he spent 6 months in the hospital recuperating, had himself fitted with an artificial leg, and talked dubious officials into letting him remain in the corps.

Then, striving to rejoin his old outfit—the crack 1st Force Reconnaissance Company—he faced and passed every trial. Only the parachute jump remained.

Last week, Hamblen strapped on his "tin leg," combat gear, and chute and hurled into the sky from a helicopter 1,250 feet over California's tiny Lake O'Neill. Expertly plucking the shrouds, he guided himself to a perfect landing.

Back at the base, Hamblen explained: "I just want to be a good marine." His commanding officer felt that was an understatement. "He's a Marine's marine," said Capt. Patrick J. Ryan. Welcoming him back to the fold, Hamblen's buddies agreed it was one of the happiest landings in the history of the corps.

R+R Rel.

A Statement on Law and Race Relations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT GORE

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 19, 1963

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement on law and race relations, issued on July 7, 1963, by 130 deans and professors of southern law schools.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A STATEMENT ON LAW AND RACE RELATIONS

As lawyers and law teachers in the South, we wish to call the attention of our fellow citizens to the role of law in dealing with a current and long-lasting problem.

Our country, North and South, now shares in one of the great changes in history. The readjustment of the relations of Negroes and whites here is but a minor phase of a worldwide readjustment of peoples. It is of the utmost importance that we carry forward our part of the change with the ancient virtues of wisdom and justice and moderation. An understanding of the role of law in the change can contribute something to this end.

Law is a means by which a free people advances justice and maintains order. Without it there would be either despotism or anarchy. The first paragraph of the Constitution of the United States states these twin purposes of justice and order, to "establish justice" and "insure domestic tranquillity."

The advancement of justice through law comes about at times through public protests against injustices believed to exist, as our history has often illustrated. The privilege of protest is guaranteed by the first article of the Bill of Rights which protects "the right of the people peaceably to assemble" and "to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." The denial of this peaceable right by officers of the law is itself a violation of the law.

The equality of all citizens in the exercise of civil rights is guaranteed by the Constitution and by the principles of a free people on which our Government rests. The denial of equal rights to a part of our people is a violation of our law and our principles.

These matters, basic to our Government and embodied in our national law, have occasionally been obscured by the false idea that our national law may be disregarded and put aside by State officials or private citizens. The men who founded our Government perceived this danger and put into our Constitution a provision to meet it. The words of the Constitution deserve to be repeated now when some would ignore them:

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof * * * shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

Observe that the Constitution and Federal laws are made "the supreme law of the land," and that the judges in every State are bound by them "anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

The idea that our national law may be disregarded has been put forward in different forms. One form is the so-called doctrine of interposition of the State between the Nation and the individual citizen. This doctrine under its old name of nullification was rejected over a hundred years ago by President Andrew Jackson. Its natural consequence, secession, led to the tragedy of the Civil War. Its uses by the 50 States today would pull our country to pieces. It is a backward doctrine that is as out of date as feudalism.

Another form the idea takes is that the 10th amendment to the Constitution reserves to the States and denies to the United States all power over local matters. The 14th amendment, however, requires the States to exercise their powers with full regard to the elements of fairness the later amendment specifies. These elements of fairness demanded by the 14th amendment include "due process of law" and "the equal protection of the laws." Whatever may be the broad powers reserved to the States by the 10th amendment, these powers must be exercised in a manner consistent with due process and equal protection.

A similar false idea recently asserted is that the invalidation of the separate-but-equal doctrine is not binding, because it is not compelled by the express words of the Constitution but only by what the Supreme Court has said the Constitution means. This argument leads on to anarchy for it implies that every person is entitled to interpret the law for himself and to act accordingly. Here again the Founding Fathers, knowing that under a system of law there must be a body with the power of final interpretation, answered the argument for anarchy by placing the power in the Supreme Court. The judicial article of the Constitution begins:

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court" (with such inferior courts as Congress may establish).

It makes plain that the judicial power vested in the courts extends to the interpretation of the Constitution itself:

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, and the laws of the United States."

Nearly 150 years ago it was held, through Chief Justice Marshall, that the Supreme Court of the United States, not a State supreme court, is the final interpreter of national law.

Yet another form is an appeal to the terms of the statute of a State, or to a promise by a candidate in a political campaign that he would resist the enforcement of national laws he disliked. The reliance on the terms of a State statute is footless in light of the constitutional provision that the laws of the United States are the supreme law of the land. The appeal to a campaign promise is overridden by a greater oath. For the successful candidate when sworn into office takes an oath with the people as witnesses to uphold the Constitution of the United States. The official who would deny controlling effect to our national law violates his oath of office as well as our fundamental law.

Men who have taken the oath of office are under an even more manifest obligation than the ordinary citizen to observe the law. In violating the law, they inflict a grave injury to our country at home. These men inflict an even graver injury on our country abroad. They discredit it and give aid and comfort to our mortal enemies in these dangerous times. These thoughtless persons, while not in the camp of our enemies, do our enemies' work.

There is the other element of law that must be observed, "to insure domestic tranquillity." Order is no less an essential part of law than justice, and civil duties are as basis as civil rights. Lawlessness breeds lawlessness on both sides. It may quickly get out of the control of those who initiated it in a minor way and turn into uncontrolled mob violence. Those who in their zeal for change would violate the law hamper the means by which their purpose may be achieved. They, too, defeat the ideal inscribed over the building of the Supreme Court of the United States, "Equal Justice Under Law."

A Dangerous Diagnosis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH HARVEY

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, September 19, 1963

Mr. HARVEY of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Wall Street Journal of September 19, 1963:

A DANGEROUS DIAGNOSIS

For a good while now the administration's economic doctors have had a simple diagnosis for many of the Nation's ills: We've just lost our old zip. If the economy could only regain its old growth rate, unemployment would dwindle and Federal budgetmakers could go back to using black ink.

Proceeding from this analysis, the Government prescribes and applies such supposed zip producers as ever-easy money and ever-rising Federal spending. Strangely, the ills they talk about refuse to go away.

What's wrong? One of the clearest answers to the question comes, oddly enough, from an economist within the Government itself. Writing in the current Federal Reserve Bulletin, Federal economist Clayton Gehman explains that the original diagnosis is faulty. Not only that; it can be downright dangerous.

In the past half dozen years the economy has been doing a lot better than its critics claim. In fact, says Mr. Gehman, "growth in U.S. economic activity in recent years has been close to long-time rates."

How can this be? Mr. Gehman would seem to be flatly contradicting the recent manpower report of the President, which noted that the annual growth rate of the Nation's goods-producing industries fell from 3.4 percent in the 1947–57 decade to 1.5 percent in the period from 1957 to 1961.

The answer chiefly lies in the way some statisticians use statistics. For one thing, this 1947–57 period reflected some unusual conditions, such as the Korean war buildup, that could not reasonably be expected to continue.

But that's not all; the 1957–61 period is a peculiar choice for economic comparisons, too. A business expansion was reaching its crest in 1957, while 1961 marked the low of a recession. So to say that the economy wasn't making headway during that period is a little like saying that a man who, in crossing the Alps, has moved from one mountain's crest to the bottom of another hasn't made much upward progress. It's quite true, but hardly significant.

For the fact is that the economy, after 1961, moved a long way toward a second crest. Extending economic statistics through 1962 and into 1963 makes the recent period look far better. Our growth rate then comes much closer to matching that of the postwar decade despite the special circumstances present in that earlier period.

If the economy has been doing so well of late, someone is sure to ask, why does it have surpluses of materials, productive capacity and—most painful of all—manpower?

The reason, as Mr. Gehman explains, is that the economy has not only been growing bigger but has been getting more efficient. This stems from more than the introduction of new automated equipment. It also results from such factors as improved control of inventories and more systematic scheduling of production. No longer are unneeded materials and products allowed to pile up so high in warehouses.

In this more efficient economy, some resources are not only unemployed. Old factories, to find a place, may have to be rebuilt; some workers will have to retrained. Easy money and big budget deficits are likely to be of little help. In any circumstances, there's a poor prescription for solid economic growth; its failure in the 1930's should have made that clear.

In the current circumstances, the prescription may only lead to increased trouble. For it is the economy's stock of unemployed resources that the Government is always citing as our protection against sharp inflation. The inflated demand, so the reasoning goes, will be easily absorbed by the unused supply of materials, manpower and factories. But the idle supply of usable, effective resources is simply not as big as it's cracked up to be; sooner then some people think, these resources can be stretched past their limit.

Still, the Government goes on administering its inflationary monetary and fiscal remedies for our ills. And things are never too hopeful for a patient whose doctor starts out with a faulty diagnosis.

Annual Orchard Picnic of Senator Byrd of Virginia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STROM THURMOND

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, September 19, 1963

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the September 17 issue of the Nashville Banner contains an editorial which strongly endorses the recent address of the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] at his annual picnic at Berryville, Va. I join, Mr. President, in commending the able chairman of the Finance Committee on his eloquent address on that occasion, and ask unanimous consent that this editorial praising his speech be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOVERNMENT EXTENDS POWER ON DIET OF BIG SPENDING

Every year Senator HARRY F. BYRD invites a few thousand people to a picnic in his apple orchard at his home in Berryville, Va. The 41st such event was held on the last day of last month, and the host sounded—or resounded—a warning which all Americans should heed.

In essence, he said the Federal Government is too big and too powerful, capable of consolidating and extending its controls through a program of big spending.

"The arm of the Federal Government these days," Mr. BYRD said, "has a long reach and no one is escaping the force of its centralized power. In earlier years Federal might was developed more subtly; now it grabs control openly. The Federal Government at the moment is seeking control over voting laws, State legislatures, schools and business.

"Name an area of endeavor and there is probably a Federal subsidy to go with it."

As examples of the present power complex of the administration, the Virginian cited the Presidential crackdown on the steel industry "when the Central Government made unprecedented use of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Federal grand jury, and threats to withdraw and withhold Federal contracts from companies which dared not to conform to administration price control."

Then there was the President's recommendation that he should be authorized to cut taxes by Executive order and spend money on projects for which no appropriations had been made. Both would have been bold seizures of powers belonging only to the Congress. Fortunately, as Mr. BYRD notes, both were rejected, "but they are still being demanded."

The list of Federal encroachments into every area of American life is endless, still the Federal Government keeps pressing for more.

"Power," the Senator said, "feeds on power. And the Warren Court has equaled, if not exceeded, the executive branch in usurping and centralizing power in the Federal Government."

In between these two forces—the executive and judiciary—stands Congress, which may 1 day be freedom's court of last resort. Only a legislative body dedicated to preserving its own constitutional prerogatives can

A&R Rel.

Reprinted from NEW YORK TIMES MAGAZINE SECTION September 22, 1963

'Rearing Children Of Good Will'

By EVELYN S. RINGOLD

"THE real problems of prejudice will come up when we begin to live together and know each other face to face. When the gross prejudice of dogs and hoses is past, the second and third levels of prejudice will be revealed—the subtle stereotypes about skin color and living habits, the 'Negro-likes-watermelon' kind of myth. These 'gentle' prejudices will segregate us as surely as signs reading 'For Whites Only.'"

This was the alert of Dr. Samuel Bullock, psychiatrist and keynote speaker at the recent national workshop on "Rearing Children of Good Will," held for the fourth consecutive year at Radnor, Pa., under the sponsorship of the National Conference of Christians and Jews.

Men and women charged with the gargantuan task of helping children to get along in rapidly changing neighborhoods and schools came to Radnor from their pivotal positions in classrooms, parent groups, community and church centers of 17 different states. At the lunch tables, on the lawn between sessions, and in the more formal working groups, members raised the problems of racial tensions, school integration and equal rights as they saw them affecting children in their own homes and schools:

A parent in a middle-income housing development in New York City sends her son to public school with the Puerto Rican and Negro children from adjoining streets, although many other apartment residents have transferred their children to private schools. One afternoon, her son brings home a Negro playmate. Afterward, a note is slipped under the door: "Nigger lover." "What do I do about a 'next time'?" asks the mother.

Evelyn S. Ringold, a free-lance writer, spent three days at the Radnor workshop gathering material for this report.

A Negro child comes to a South Philadelphia school from a home of poverty, squalor and outside toilets. "He comes to school hating the white landlord, the white storekeeper, the white anybody—as his parents do. How do I prepare this child to live outside the Negro ghetto?" asks his school principal.

"My children are pro-Negro," says a Westchester father, "but they no longer bring home colored friends the way they did in grade school. My kids tell me there's a real split now. It's not prejudice, they say, but different interests, different behavior. Do I have a role in this situation?", he wonders.

"I have two boys in junior high school," a Negro nurse tells me at lunch. "They're bright. I don't want to send them to Negro colleges in the South." But she's not sure the neighborhood school, segregated in practice, although not in theory, will prepare the boys for entrance to a Northern college.

"Thousands of children in our city school system go from kindergarten to twelfth grade without seeing, knowing or sitting next to a child of another skin color, another religion, or a substantially different income bracket," a school official tells us. He wants to know: "How will these children be prepared to meet with differences as adults?"

IF the questions at the workshop could have been reduced to one master question, it might have been: If adults are more prejudiced than they realize, how do we break the chain in order to create new attitudes in our children?

"By better child raising" is the prompt response of scores of psychiatrists, social workers and teachers. Their viewpoint is expressed by Dr. Leon J. Saul, author of "The Hostile Mind" and professor of preventive psychiatry at the University of Pennsylvania. Dr. Saul found, in a continuing study, that attitudes of prejudice in at least 80 per cent of children are formed before they register in kindergarten.

"We must continue to work at every point along the life cycle," Dr. Saul adds, "even with the grandparents." One of the original forces behind the workshop, Dr. Saul emphasized that it is designed as a "starting point" in re-educating the adults who must, in turn, educate our children.

George Schermer, former head of Philadelphia's Commission on Human Relations, who has addressed several of the workshops, says:

"When you talk about disadvantaged kids in congested slums—Negro or white—it's a waste of time to say the answer is in the home. The home doesn't have it! If you're looking for an institution that's big enough, with power and resources, public school is the answer."

Dr. Bullock, keynote speaker of the workshop, also selects the schools as the logical focus for change:

"We might as well calm down and accept the fact that adult attitudes won't change overnight. But the law sanctions our children coming together in the schools—and this is the real meaning of integration. Our children will know each other at school in day-to-day living, in one-to-one relationships."

THREE of the most significant contributions to the workshop came from public school principals facing the imperatives for changes within their own schools.

Mrs. Beatrice Chernock is principal of the Henry School in West Mount Airy—a Philadelphia neighborhood with handsome fieldstone houses, shade trees and integration that works. Mrs. Chernock came to the Henry School in 1957. Negro families were moving into the area in great numbers. It is a truism among trained observers that once a school becomes substantially Negro, it will rapidly become all Negro. Mrs. Chernock did not accept the truism. Nor did she support segregated schooling—even on a voluntary basis.

"The composition of the sixth grade today," she says, "is a direct reflection of the hostilities and fears that were in the Henry School when I came—white families withdrawing their children, white teachers requesting transfers. But look at our kindergarten this year; the balance is 50—50. A family—whether white or Negro—now buys a house in our neighborhood because it is integrated—this is what they want for their children.

"Grownups sometimes forget," she says, "how important school is in the life of a child. I stand on the corner each morning and greet each child by name. Every child needs to know his worth, but the Negro child, in particular, needs to build pride in himself. When he sees that all the heroes in the history and story books are white, he finds less reason for pride."

Parents have done their part. At unusual "P.T.A. meetings," Negro and white families, under psychiatric leadership, aired their fears about living with one another.

THROUGH all this, Mrs. Chernock was "never really concerned about the kids. I knew I could get through to them. Children are ready to enjoy other children of all kinds if we leave the way clear. My aim was to involve the parents and help them find freedom from prejudices and fears."

A Negro mother in Mrs. Chernock's school says: "My children were going to school with white children. They had new attitudes. I was out of step with them. I got into school affairs, and it has changed my whole life!"

A white parent who moved into the neighborhood one year ago feels: "We are five years ahead of the times. We are living in the world as it will be when the violence and fighting are finished."

ANOTHER principal, Mrs. Olive Snead from the Durham School in South Philadelphia—"the school had been all-Negro so long, no one could recall whether it was 50 or 60 years ago that white children had been in the classrooms"—knows from experience that "parents can initiate change." Two years ago a group of white parents enrolled twelve white children in her school, bypassing the center-city school with the high median I.Q. and cultural homogeneity characteristic of the "better" suburban schools.

"We didn't even know the Durham School existed around the corner," relates the mother who "found" the school while doing an errand. "Our kindergarten-aged child was already enrolled in the center-city school. But I asked why send him across town when we have a neighborhood school? I visited Durham with a group of interested mothers and fathers. We found it clean, the classes orderly, the children so painstakingly scrubbed and their clothes so beautifully ironed that we might be hard put, in our more casual households, to equal the effort. We found accelerated classes for the brighter children, and special after-school programs for slower readers. Mrs. Snead is an impressive educator who knows that any parent, white or Negro, wants quality education for his child."

The white children who went to Durham accepted the situation almost without comment, report the mothers.

From Mrs. Snead's point of view there have been important gains from this microcosm of integration. She is concerned, as Mrs. Chernock is, with the need to give the Negro child a sense of his own worth, but she is even more sensitive to the necessity for releasing him from the dynamics of hatred.

"THE children in my school come from a black ghetto. The children rely on what they learn from their elders. They come to school with the burden of being left out, of being second-class citizens. They come with the indoctrination that 'whites are no good.'

"I know, from my adult experience, that white people are helping. But I must provide this knowledge for the boys and girls in my school. They must know some white children so they will not flinch when they go out into the white world. There are families in my school who have never been more than ten blocks north of their homes. That's why one small second-grader, on a visit to a white school, grabbed my skirt: 'Don't go 'way, Mrs. Snead. I'm scared.'

"Now our Negro children are discovering for themselves that a white child is like any other child. At first some of the colored children would stroke a blond child's hair and clamor for the white children as partners. But soon they settled down to routines.

"I believe it can be the small memories of childhood that keep one from bitterness as an adult," she reflects. She wondered what one kindergarten child would remember someday about his visit with a white family. The children were playing while the mother prepared dinner and set the table. "Get ready for dinner," she said. The visiting child hesitated.

"I'm colored," he announced.

"I'm white," the mother replied. "Now let's wash up and get to the table."

MRS. THEDA WILSON, a gentle-voiced, gentle-mannered woman with a deep, unsentimental understanding of children, was the first Negro principal in Wilmington, Del. Her school served a low-income housing development of white, Puerto Rican and Negro families. Mrs. Wilson told the workshop that the difference in skin color is not the foremost problem. It is the sameness of the children's handicap—the uniform background of "disadvantage" which will hamper their economic fitness and their ability to survive in a competitive society.

"I was convinced that if we could see their world as these children see it, we might find new ways to reach them, and new ways — as a result — to teach them.

"We learned through their drawings, through their own words, that in many families Daddy didn't go out to work. He had no job. Mother did. We learned that these children had little conception of money. 'I wish I had a hundred cents to buy food for us', wrote one first-grader. The children 'wished' for a dog, a cat, goldfish — anything to love, but one little boy wanted 'a wild cat to protect me'.

"We learned that a child is happy 'when Daddy is working, so we can buy groceries', that many like 'the breadman best. He's kind'.

"Many of our children came from large families where the older sisters and brothers were accustomed to helping out with younger ones. We duplicated this situation at school—the same class would have 5-year-olds, 6-, 7-, and even 8-year-olds placed where they could give to, and get from, each other."

THE children had a language of their own. "Colorful," admits Mrs. Wilson, "but limited as a tool in learning." One day in class she used the word "faucet." None of the children understood her until a 6-year-old piped up: "She means spigot!" The children used "mess around" in at least twenty different ways, Mrs. Wilson explained, "so we wrote 'mess around' on a chart, and whenever a new meaning came up, we'd list it. We emphasized language because it is the base upon which other learning rests.

"By the end of three years we had raised the median I.Q. in the mixed age groups by nine points.

"It was the most thrilling period of my life in education. Teachers began to see these children as they are, to see that they have important needs. It's up to us to give children from disadvantaged homes a better past, and hope for a better future."

* * *

WHAT do workshop members take home with them after five days? No packaged solutions, as Dr. Eagen had forewarned. But many found a new way of seeing others' problems; a new freedom in expressing views, with the expectation of frank statements in return; a heightened awareness that children are listening to unspoken as well as outspoken prejudices; the exciting and heartening knowledge that our public schools are finding new ways to help children get along.

WHAT IS THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CHRISTIANS AND JEWS?

NCCJ is a civic organization engaged in a nation-wide program of intergroup education. It enlists Protestants, Catholics and Jews who without compromise of conscience or of their distinctive and important religious differences work together to build better relationships among men of all religions, races and nationalities. Its operation is civic and social although, obviously, the roots of the brotherhood which it seeks to build are in the moral law and in religious faith.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE OF CHRISTIANS AND JEWS, INC.
43 West 57th Street • New York 19, N. Y.

What Next? Five Negro Leaders Reply

After the march on Washington, after the bombing in Birmingham, five principals in the civil-rights campaign discuss what action is called for now.

R+R Rel.

On Aug. 28, some 200,000 Americans — mostly Negroes, but including many whites—converged on Washington for the largest civil-rights demonstration the country has ever seen. Now, as the echoes of the march fade into history — and the echoes of the Birmingham bombing reverberate— these questions emerge: Where do Negroes go from here? What are the next steps in the civil-rights campaign? The New York Times Magazine put these questions to five Negro leaders. Here in alphabetical order are their answers.

'MORE EFFECTIVE TECHNIQUES'

By KENNETH B. CLARK

Professor of Psychology at City College

THE Aug. 28 march demonstrated the discipline, the seriousness, the persistence and the insistence of the bulk of American Negroes and some whites that racial injustices must now be eliminated from American life. Yet it is possible that the "success" of the march could confuse the issue and delay the attainment of the goal of racial equality. Some Negroes could interpret the demonstration as evidence of direct political power and believe the fact that it occurred will magically produce the desired results. And some whites could congratulate themselves on the fact that Negroes were permitted to let off steam harmlessly.

Such ideas, although comforting, would be serious misinterpretations of the meaning of the current civil-rights movement. Any political or other actions based upon them would be in error and probably tragic in their consequences.

IN a most disturbing sense, a society which permitted the perpetrators of 28 bombings in Birmingham to remain free and unpunished, a society which permits the convicted killer of a Negro woman to complete his harvest before enjoying the luxury of six months in a white prison, a society in which the highest elected official of a state incites the primitive passions of his people for personal political gain, a society which can continue to accept flagrant and subtle forms of racism in the same generation in which the horrors of death camps were exposed to the world is a society in serious trouble.

Negro organizations and their white allies must now develop precise and more effective techniques to deal directly with the areas of resistance to racial injustice in America. They must consolidate and conserve past gains and use them as the basis for removing the existing inequities. Specifically:

Ways must be found to make the Congress of the United States and the various state legislative bodies more sensitive and responsive to the present mood of urgency.

Serious negotiations with the leaders of American labor and of individual unions should be initiated and sustained.

If these discussions do not result in the elimination of patterns of racial exclusion from the American labor movement then more direct action techniques must be developed and used until these goals are obtained.

More systematic organized and sustained forms of selective patronage should be used by Negroes to eliminate the remaining forms of racial discrimination in employment and in places of public accommodation.

The problem of residential segregation has to be attacked by direct action and effective protests against the discriminatory practices of banks, real-estate groups and offending landlords.

Police brutality must be curbed and law-enforcement agencies and officials made to understand that it is their duty and responsibility to protect all citizens impartially. If this cannot be done by reason it must be done by disciplined civil disobedience.

Desegregation of schools, from the elementary through graduate and professional levels, must be accelerated. The present snail's pace of grudging tokenism should give way to a pace more consistent with the letter and the spirit of the May 17, 1954, Supreme Court decision and the trained manpower needs of the nation. Here, too, it may be necessary, unfortunately, for Negroes to develop and use appropriate, nonviolent direct-action approaches.

Massive pressure for voter registration among Negroes in the South must be developed and sustained without regard to the risk. The executive and judicial branches of the Federal Government must protect the constitutional rights of Negroes to vote and participate in their government. These rights either must be enforced by representation sanctions against the states or Negroes must find some way of withholding the taxes paid in these states in direct proportion to their representation. Taxation without representation is still tyranny.

As for the next steps, apathy, indifference, battle weariness, return to inertia and wishful thinking are some of the major dangers to be counteracted. The momentum of the Negro surge for equality during the past few years and particularly during recent months has been admirable—but also exhausting. The challenge now is to sustain the dynamism of recent demonstrations until the legitimate goals are achieved.

'WE CANNOT AFFORD TO FAIL'

By JAMES FARMER

National director of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE)

GOVERNOR WALLACE of Alabama is probably most to blame for the outrage of Birmingham. However, Wallace is not alone. All of us share the blame because we have not done enough to end racial injustice. I have not been able to sleep since Birmingham because I have not done enough. Those who are not on the picket lines share the blame. Those who remain silent share the blame. Those who are neutral share the blame.

Birmingham will not stop the movement. It will not slow it down, rather it will help speed up the process of mass involvement of the Negro community. (Continued on Page 91)

JOBS WITHOUT BIAS—Negroes must "demonstrate in the streets" until they attain this goal, says an integration leader.

For pictures of a Southern Negro vote drive, turn page

The Southern Negro Drives for the Vote

TARGET AREA—This house in a Negro enclave near Plaquemine, La., is typical of the homes in the region where registration workers call. An open sewer runs in the foreground.

"The most important step a Negro can take is in the direction of the ballot box," the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. has said. Traditionally, Negroes of the rural Deep South have been reluctant to register, some out of fear of physical or economic retaliation, others out of apathy born of deprivation and the absence of any real choice among the segregationist candidates of a one-party system. Now thousands of volunteers, assisted by a handful of professionals, are conducting voter registration campaigns that, they hope, will assure the Negro a voice in government. This mammoth, occasionally dangerous, task was once almost the sole province of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Today, the N.A.A.C.P. has been joined by the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, the National Urban League, and state and local groups. In all, 27 registration campaigns are in progress across the South. They are coordinated and financed by the Voter Education Project, an organization with a budget of $262,000 underwritten by several Northern foundations. This new concern for the rights and responsibilities of full citizenship already has made itself felt in other phases of the Negro's struggle. It will assume overriding importance as the legal efforts of the Justice Department and other forces eliminate discriminatory disfranchisement. The pictures on these pages are scenes of a typical registration drive—this one conducted by CORE in the Sixth Congressional District of Louisiana. —CLAUDE SITTON.

CANVASS—Danny Mitchell, a member of the CORE task force in Iberville Parish, tries to persuade a resident to register. The group has numbered about 45, most of them volunteers.

REHEARSAL—Bette Poole, right, helps a would-be voter practice filling out registration forms. Negroes have been turned down, CORE workers say, for failing to dot an "i."

CRAM SESSION—Registrants must pass a "citizenship test" with six questions chosen from a list of 42. Here, Mimi Feingold, a CORE volunteer, coaches a prospective voter.

Photographs by BOB ADELMAN

ON LINE—Negroes wait outside the registrar's office in Clinton, La. CORE organizers charge that the office is open only at inconvenient hours, and that delays prevent the processing of more than 20 applicants a day. About 30 per cent of the South's 5,000,000 Negroes of voting age are registered, against 60 per cent of the South's 17,000,000 possible white voters.

RALLY—In a Baptist church in Clinton, Negroes clasp hands to sing "We Shall Overcome," the theme song of the civil-rights drive. The rally was called when two newly registered voters (including the woman second from left in this picture) lost their jobs—for having registered, they said. The outcome was a Negro boycott of the two employers, a doctor and a storekeeper.

PROTEST—Some of the 200,000 in the March on Washington.

What Next?: A Symposium

(Continued from Page 27)

No longer are we just a few scattered militants and intellectuals. Now the revolt has cut across the formerly divisive lines of class, cultural achievement and education. To a greater extent than ever before, even the timorous, the former "Uncle Toms," have been swept along in the tide of Negro self-consciousness and revolt against discrimination. They have become involved not so much by choice as by necessity. The realization has come to most Negroes that there is no escape for them as individuals. We are in what might be called the "everyman" stage of development in the struggle.

The problems are obviously enormous. To mention just two: (1) Sloganeering is frequently mistaken for a program. (2) A dangerous racial polarization in the national community seems possible.

TO combat the first problem, more sweep needs to be given to the present revolutionary struggle by analysis and criticism and creative thought, as well as by more detailed planning.

Real differences in point of view should be expressed and encouraged. Unity of goal should not be mistaken for uniformity of action and approach.

In combating the second danger, the march on Washington was a good first step. Its interracial character was impressive. Now we need steps to make constructive use of the millions of potential white allies according to the stage of their present commitment in the struggle. Ways must be found to let each add his thrust to the movement as far as he is at present willing to go, without hampering or holding back those who are willing to go further. Churches and unions must be encouraged to go beyond lip service and to take specific action for equality.

Direct - action demonstrations will be continued, but objectives should be more clearly pointed out in each campaign—both for better understanding among the demonstrators and for greater appreciation and support among the general public. In addition, means of maintaining the discipline of nonviolence need to be tightened. We require schools and workshops in every area of the country to train demonstrators and potential demonstrators in the discipline of nonviolence. We need, also, to train special cadres to monitor each mass demonstration, to stop trouble before it occurs, to isolate difficulties and move the demonstration on.

OUR ultimate objective is equality — economic, political, educational, cultural, social. These things will not be achieved merely by breaking down the barriers of segregation and discrimination. The wounds inflicted by 350 years of deprivation will not be erased automatically. Nothing short of a massive program of remedial education and training for skills can even begin to solve the problem. The nation cannot afford to fail to take the necessary compensatory steps to advance those whom it has deprived over the years. Such a program requires billions of dollars—perhaps as much as $3,000,000,000 a year for a period of five or 10 years—in order to be effective. Money in that amount can come only from the Government. It may be the President's prime opportunity to achieve lasting greatness.

'IN A WORD—NOW'

By MARTIN LUTHER KING Jr.

Founder of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference

VICTOR HUGO once said that progress is the mode of man; that when it is blocked, just as an obstacle in a river makes the water foam, so an obstacle to

(Continued on Following Page)

CHRISTMAS CARDS
FROM
THE METROPOLITAN MUSEUM OF ART

A new catalogue of the famous Metropolitan Museum of Art cards. Paintings from early Italian and Flemish masters to Renoir and Van Gogh, medieval tapestries and ivories, Persian manuscripts, Byzantine gold and enamels, primitive woodcuts, prints and drawings by Rembrandt, Dürer, and Tiepolo, and a festive variety of designs from ancient Greece, China, India, Japan, and pre-Inca Peru.

☆ The cards, printed in limited editions under the direct supervision of the Museum, cost from 5 to 95 cents each. Mail the coupon below, together with 25 cents, for the 40-page catalogue—which also illustrates Museum jewelry and other unusual Christmas presents.

The Metropolitan Museum of Art
255 Gracie Station, New York 28 T15

Please send me the Museum's new catalogue of Christmas cards, 25¢ enclosed

*Name*_____

*Address*_____

Macy's
IT'S SMART TO BE THRIFTY

Your Imported
100% WOOL KNIT
VAMP BAND
by CapAdors
IS AT MACY'S
6 for $3.99

A Warm Gift For All Winter Sports

Everyone, from little sister to granddad will love wearing this wonderfully warm vamp band. Keeps your ears comfortably cozy, your hair neatly in place. Stretch knit for snug fit, hand-fashioned seams for looks. White, black, red, beige, royal or gold.

Come, write or phone LA 4-6000. On C.O.D.'s within our delivery area, add 50¢ for handling. Outside delivery area, add 50¢. Dept. 124.

Macy's Manhatter Bar—Street Floor • Macy's Herald Square—The World's Largest Store and the Macy Store near you.

ORDER BY MAIL OR PHONE: EL 5-6687

WIDTHS FROM AAAAAAA to C
Sizes 6 to 12

Crown

Very new, straight Continental heel plus slashed calf collar make a fresh looking pump. Black suede or Brown suede with calf covered 2¼-inch heel.

26.95
plus $.50 pp

no extra charge for large sizes

mooney & gilbert INC.
17 WEST 57th STREET
N.Y.C.
FITTING THE NARROW HEEL

FREE CATALOG TM-929 shows many other styles. 5.45 to 29.95. Money back if returned unworn within 10 days.

(Continued from Preceding Page)
progress makes humanity seethe.

Any plan for the future, therefore, which seeks to calm troubled waters will have to sweep barriers away, rather than pour oil over turbulent tides.

The hundreds of thousands who marched in Washington marched to level barriers. They summed up everything in a word—NOW. What is the content of NOW?

Everything, not some things, in the President's civil-rights bill is part of NOW.

IMMEDIATE and effective Federal action to curb the shocking police brutality in the South is an urgent part of NOW. Just lately, the Department of Justice has indicted leaders of the civil-rights movement in Albany, Ga., and Birmingham, Ala., alleging that false statements were made under oath. This zealousness to punish Negroes for statements is in sharp contrast to the inaction of the same department in hundreds of cases of extreme police brutality.

The right to vote is part of NOW. To walk unafraid to the ballot box and cast a free vote remains still a myth in most of the South.

Unemployment is a form of brutality, especially violent for those who live on the edge of poverty. Negroes have twice as much of it as others. NOW means jobs, F.E.P.C., training, leveling obstacles of discrimination and the creation of new jobs by public works.

These are some of the imperatives of NOW. If they are met, the passionate determination Negroes have recently made so manifest can be mellowed without being compromised. Then slower, long-range planning can begin.

THE far-reaching solutions for lifting the "weight of centuries" will necessarily involve systematic liquidation of ghetto life, loans and grants to provide equal opportunities for the unequally equipped, adult education, remedial clinics for damaged families and individuals and integrated housing construction on a scale commensurate with the extent of slums, rather than with the extent of budgets.

The present spontaneous, largely disorganized and spasmodic methods of piecemeal approaches, differing from city to city, and with a variety of tempos, will have to give way to broad national planning. A nation which could put more than 11,000,000 men in arms in a few short years, which poured torrents of sophisticated munitions from hundreds of thousands of coordinated facilities and deployed them in war, has the capacity to master a problem of much less complexity. It needs only the same will it possessed when it felt its existence threatened.

The long-deferred issue of second-class citizenship has become our nation's first-class crisis. We can deal with it now, or we can drive a seething humanity to a desperation it tried, asked and hoped to avoid.

'FILIBUSTER OF THE PEOPLE'

By A. PHILIP RANDOLPH

President of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters and the Negro American Labor Council

THE objective of Aug. 28 was more than civil-rights legislation. The full march was a challenge to the conscience of the country; it was a creative dialogue between Negroes and their white allies, on the one hand, and the President, the Congress and our American democratic society, on the other. Its aim was to achieve a national consensus not only for civil-rights legislation— but for its implementation.

Historically, the social forces of revolutions have been expressed through human beings. Hence, the leadership of the civil-rights revolution cannot escape the moral responsibility for the maintenance of the highest order of unselfish, courageous and uncompromising fidelity to the ideals, values, hopes and faith of this sacred crusade for the recognition of, and respect for, the God-given human rights of Americans of color.

What then, is to be done?

First, Negro civil-rights leadership must maintain unity without uniformity.

Second, the coalition of the Negro community with the labor and church communities that supported the march must be preserved, broadened and deepened. If freedom is indivisible then the fight for freedom by those forces devoted to freedom should be indivisible. Negroes — like other minority groups — cannot win their rights alone. The coalition of moral forces represented by civil rights, labor and church groups is unquestionably one of the most powerful instrumentalities yet devised to help create that ethical basis for interracial brotherhood which is imperative to give meaningfulness to civil-rights laws.

Third, demonstrations in the streets—a recognized American tradition—by Negroes and their white allies must continue without relaxation until basic, tangible progress in the acquisition of jobs and apprenticeship training for jobs in industry, unions and government, and the abolition of race bias in public accommodations, schools and housing is made.

HAD it not been for demonstrations in the streets of Birmingham, Ala., and other cities in the North and South. it is quite unlikely that President Kennedy would have submitted his package of proposals for civil-rights legislation to the Congress. If street demonstrations were necessary to secure this action by

IN A QUANDARY ABOUT YOUR MONEY?

Now... You Need Not Be!

...when you purchase a SALVATION ARMY ANNUITY

All your doubts and fears will be alleviated. You will start getting your annuity checks regularly. The amount never varies and it is guaranteed for the rest of your life!

YOU RECEIVE THESE BENEFITS:

★ Guaranteed income for life up to 7.4% depending upon age, for any amount from $100 up.
